It is regretted that index references to material in three sections of volume 79 were not revised to take account of the changes in column numbering as between the Daily part/Weekly Hansard and the bound volume.

For entries with references between:

1. Columns 270 and 306, the numbers should be one or two lower than those given in the volume index.

2. Columns 735 and 841, the numbers should be two lower.

3. Columns 859 and 990, the numbers should be two lower.

Corrections will be incorporated in the index to the whole session 1984/85.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

London Regional Transport

1. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much was lost in the last financial year by London Regional Transport, as a result of fraud; what improvements he expects during the coming year; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): LRT estimates that about £21 million was lost through fraud last year, compared with about £40 million in 1982. This improvement will be further enhanced by LRT's planned investment of £135 million in a new Underground ticketing system which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State approved last week.

Mr. Greenway: Will my hon. Friend accept that when people get away with fraud it means higher fares for everybody else? Will she congratulate LRT on tackling the problem so much more determinedly than the GLC ever did? [HON. MEMBERS: "Come off it."] Oh yes, there is no doubt about that. Under the GLC £50 million was lost. When will penalty fares come into operation, and will they apply equally to tubes and buses?

Mrs. Chalker: Penalty fares will apply to buses as well as to the Underground when they are introduced, which I hope will be by 1989, when the new Underground ticketing system will be fully in position. I believe that every Administration have sought to tackle fraud, and I am glad that LRT is now having even more success in tackling fraud than was achieved in the past.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Minister consider concessionary schemes for the unemployed and the poor in London, who are perhaps tempted into travelling free on the Underground for the simple reason that they cannot afford the fares?

Mrs. Chalker: I can see no justification for that, whatever the hon. Gentleman might say. As he well knows, fares have to be paid by someone, and the further concessionary fares are extended the greater the burden upon the ratepayer.

Mr. Chapman: I welcome the reduction in what presumably can only be an estimated amount of fraud on LRT, but will my hon. Friend give the House an assurance that LRT will take other initiatives in this matter, including measures to control access to LRT stations?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend is right. Part of the new Underground ticketing system requires new entry and exit barriers in the central areas. The new ticketing machines will make it easier for the public to obtain tickets and mean shorter queues. When nobody is on duty, a permission-to-travel ticket will be available giving the name of the station and the time of issue. Those are all measures which will help to reduce fraud and make the system more efficient.

Mr. Snape: What evidence can the Minister offer the House to justify the reduction in the amount of fraudulent travel which she has just outlined to the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway)? Is she aware that in Westminster tube station, for example, not a million miles from here, her brand new, much-vaunted ticket machines are usually emptied by about 8 pm and then switched off, that there are frequently no staff at the station to sell tickets, and that there are frequently no staff at destination stations to collect them? Will she accept that standards of fare collection and attempts to reduce fraud have fallen dramatically since LRT came into being, and, indeed, many passengers are now getting a worse service from LRT than ever they received from the GLC?

Mrs. Chalker: I regret that, unusually for him, the hon. Gentleman is a little muddled. He asked me for evidence, but that evidence came from LRT. As I think the hon. Gentleman knows, LRT has always undertaken regular surveys into the level of fraud. It has carried out such surveys year in, year out, and has found that the current level of fraud has thankfully been reduced from £40 million to about £21 million. However, that figure is still far too high. All the hon. Gentleman's other complaints about the lack of machines working at certain hours and the lack of ticket collection and so on, at Westminster tube station, which I use regularly — he often sees me in the Underground tunnel—will be dealt with by the new ticketing system. I should be glad to explain it to him after Question Time.

Road Maintenance

2. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Transport what effect the lane rental experiments being carried out by his Department are having on the time taken by contractors to complete major maintenance projects.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): Last year's four lane rental experiments were a marked success. The actual time on site was cut on average by a quarter compared with conventional contracts. This much reduced traffic disruption. Given this, I have decided to use lane rental for a further 12 schemes this year.

Mr. Gregory: In view of the scheme's obvious success, will my right hon. Friend apply it to junction 8 on the M1, so that the same conditions apply?

Mr. Ridley: Yes, Sir. We have decided to invite tenders for junction 8 on the basis of a lane rental scheme with very heavy penalties for being late and very great rewards for being early. But even at this late stage I am looking at ways and means of improving the situation at junction 8, if possible.

3. Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has recently discussed road maintenance requirements with the local authority associations.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend and I often meet leaders of the local authority associations. Also through the standing committee on highway maintenance and the local transport expenditure group there are regular contacts at official level on maintenance issues.

Mr. Marshall: Will the Minister confirm that although local authorities have spent more on road maintenance than planned for in public expenditure White Papers for several years, road conditions continue to decline? There is ample and clear evidence that the Government are not providing enough rate suport grant for local road maintenance. What steps does she propose to take to remedy the situation?

Mrs. Chalker: It is true that many local authorities have spent more on road maintenance than was envisaged. It is a question not of the amount of money that the Government make available through rate support grant, but of the way in which some of those local authorities have become accustomed to spending it. I am very concerned about the state of many of our roads. I realise that there is an unacceptable backlog and I am doing all that I can, through the Department, to ensure that something is done about it. I have no control over local authorities which do not spend rate support grant on the most necessary items, such as the maintenance of local roads.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Is my hon. Friend aware that a significant proportion of the growing number of cycle accidents is caused by poor road conditions? Will she, in her discussions, bear in mind the needs of cyclists?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and that is why, when we ask for policies and programmes, and hold discussions with local authorities — and I go round the country every year doing that — we specifically ask for those very minor measures which can sometimes make all the difference between a safe and an unsafe ride.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Have not the local authority associations expressed concern about the equalisation of services across the metropolitan counties after their possible abolition? Is the Minister satisfied that there will be adequate power then to enable proper road maintenance to be carried out in the poorer parts of the metropolitan counties?

Mrs. Chalker: As I believe the hon. Gentleman knows, the way in which maintenance is carried out, often by the metropolitan districts within the metropolitan counties, varies widely. I am satisfied that when the resources are paid direct to the metropolitan districts they will carry out much of that basic road maintenance, which is essential for safe riding, more speedily and probably better. My officials are currently engaged in seeing just what needs to be done in different metropolitan districts. Those districts vary, but on the whole they are extremely competent and do the work well.

Mr. Higgins: Has my hon. Friend noticed that maintenance in London includes painting white lines in the middle of a road when perpetual double parking on either side of a road makes it impossible for cars to go anywhere except in the middle?

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend and I are at one in hating unnecessary lines and the failure to observe parking restrictions. We are concerned about that, and parking restriction problems are being taken up with the London boroughs, the GLC and the metropolitan police.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Since the metropolitan counties act in every instance as co-ordinating and planning authorities, how does the Minister expect them to function as efficiently if those powers are taken from them? How does she imagine that the standard of road maintenance can be kept up when every little area is responsible for its own section?

Mrs. Chalker: A number of metropolitan districts with populations of about 250,000 will much resent the hon. Lady referring to them as "every little area". In those areas the reviewing of necessary road maintenance is already often done by the metropolitan districts. They might be under the auspices and sometimes subjected to the double administration of the metropolitan counties in deciding what is done and when, but they are able to do the job. I see no reason why, if the money is paid direct to them, they cannot continue to do a good job.

British Rail (Investment)

4. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received recently from British Rail any plans for investment in new railway lines.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): We have received two schemes. We have already approved the proposal for the new Windsor link line in Manchester. We are still considering the Snow Hill tunnel proposal.

Mr. Lloyd: Does the Minister realise how worried people in the north-west are about British Rail's failure to propose a scheme for bringing a rail link to Manchester international airport, particulary when they contrast that failure with the alacrity with which British Rail plans to take a rail link to Stansted airport? What steps does the Minister intend to take within his Department to ensure that British Rail places the Manchester airport rail scheme high on its list of priorities? Does he agree that we are talking not only about transport needs but of economic value to the region?

Mr. Mitchell: Of course I shall consider carefully on its merits any proposal by British Rail for investment in a link line to Manchester airport.

Mr. Coombs: Does my hon. Friend agree that in addition to making the maximum use of resources for new railway lines it is important to maximise the use of existing lines and the provision of new station facilities? Does he look favourably on recommendations from British Rail for park-and-ride facilities on the outskirts of towns such as Swindon, where the movement of population has been from the city centre to the outskirts, thus creating the need for large movements of population into the town centre? Does he agree that British Rail could help the local bus services by providing facilities to enable people to reach the centre of town?

Mr. Mitchell: Park-way stations are a good example of British Rail's management keeping up to date with the moving and changing pattern of customer demand. I commend British Rail for what it has done. Expenditure is not such as to warrant a requirement for ministerial consent, and therefore I am not involved in such schemes.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Is the Minister aware that the anxiety in Greater Manchester is that British Rail is blocking proposals for a link to Manchester international airport because of its fear of competition between the shuttle and the inter-city service? Will he tell British Rail that it would be a great boost to the region to have the rail link and that if it is worried about competition from the shuttle it should improve its passenger services by, for example, issuing timetables when a new service comes into operation and by improving the frequency of trains from Manchester, instead of obstructing plans for the rail link to the airport?

Mr. Mitchell: Whenever British Rail has been challenged by competition it has always fought back tenaciously and pugnaciously. I am sure that that applies to Manchester services and others. British Rail has tried to give better advance warning of timetable changes, but I agree that not everything has gone as smoothly as British Rail had hoped it would.

Sir Antony Buck: Does my hon. Friend agree that what he has just announced is closely connected to the plans for the electrification of railways? Will he say a word about what has been achieved and about the plan for electrification in future?

Mr. Mitchell: Some 2,356 route miles and 6,215 track miles are now either electrified or in the process of being so this year. That includes the electrification of the line between Colchester and Ipswich, the first electric train on that service having been inaugurated today. I welcome the first stage of the London-Norwich electrification.

Mr. Flannery: While I welcome the investment in new railway lines, which is seriously needed, may I ask the Minister whether he will consider more investment in existing lines, such as the St. Pancras to Sheffield? Is he aware that there are great fears about the service, expressed at an important meeting this weekend, because of its obvious deterioration—no matter what one of the Derbyshire Members says about it?

Mr. Mitchell: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, he has time after time run the hare that there is some threat to that service, and he is surprised to hear an echo from the local electorate because it is worried by the rumours that he has spread. Within the last couple of years HST services have been put on that line and substantial expenditure has been undertaken—part of the £2,000 million that has been spent by British Rail since 1979.

Mr. Adley: Is not the Government's approval of the Windsor link, the east coast line electrification and the East Anglian electrification clear and certain evidence that the Government are supporting the railways? Will my hon. Friend confirm that the investment programme is the biggest for 20 or more years, including the approvals for new stock? Will he be a little less reticent in trumpeting the Government's success?

Mr. Mitchell: I accept my hon. Friend's remarks. Last year we approved all British Rail's submissions for investment, which was probably a record £475 million. My hon. Friend has drawn attention to the Windsor link, and I am amazed that not one of the Labour Manchester Members took the opportunity available to welcome the proposal.

Mr. Snape: Will the Minister now compare like with like on road and rail investment? Does he agree that as long ago as 1976 the Leitch committee recommended that investment in both systems should be treated on their merits and similarly? Is it not blatantly unfair that railways have to justify financially any projects, while for road improvements we depend on that somewhat mystical and certainly mythical system of co-benefit analysis so beloved of the civil servants in the hon. Gentleman's Department?

Mr. Mitchell: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the amount paid in tax by road users exceeds the amount spent on roads. The operations of British Rail are divided between those that are commercially viable—where it must make commercial decisions on investment wholly on that basis—and those that are often referred to as the social railway network, where we take other considerations into account.

Bypasses

5. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many bypasses around historic towns have now been completed since 1979.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): We are engaged on a massive bypass programme. Since 1 January 1980, 161 communities have been bypassed, including 44 historic towns. Schemes to bypass another 326 communities, including 97 historic towns, are planned.

Mr. Baker: Is my hon. Friend aware of the benefits of such bypasses to the people and the buildings in historic towns—such as Blandford in my constituency, where a bypass opened recently—and to those wishing to travel around those places? Will he accept my congratulations on that programme and will he ensure that it is extended to other historic towns?

Mr. Spicer: I can certainly give my hon. Friend that assurance. There is an upsurge in the building of bypasses, especially those around historic towns.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I welcome the progress that is being made. Is my hon. Friend aware that much-needed improvements to the Lincoln bypass are going ahead well, with construction appearing to be on schedule? Does he agree that roads which bypass other than historic towns are also important, and will he report on progress on that front, too?

Mr. Spicer: I am glad that the scheme to which my hon. Friend referred is going well. The split between bypasses of historic towns and other areas is reasonably even. The plans show that of 118 communities to be bypassed, 31 are historic towns. We have currently completed 72, of which 24 are historic towns.

Mr. Key: I congratulate the Department's bypass priorities, which, we hope, will give us in Salisbury a chance to look afresh at our coach park problem. Will my hon. Friend bear in mind, however, that this is a particularly sensitive area of policy and that when it is said that there will be a bypass, there should indeed be one? Is he aware that my constituents, who are concerned with the beauty of the countryside, have lately been told, when telephoning the Department's office in Bristol, that the Salisbury bypass may not, after all, happen because of the cost-benefit analysis that is being pursued?

Mr. Spicer: We publish our programmes for bypasses. Thereafter, the decision to build a bypass is subject to the statutory procedures.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Has the Minister seen the Civic Trust assessment, which says that the Government have dealt with only 25 per cent. of the necessary bypasses? Is he satisfied that the Department is producing the results that will save our historic cities and villages?

Mr. Spicer: The progress towards building trunk road schemes in connection with bypasses is now extremely rapid. The figure to which the hon. Lady referred will be out of date in the coming two years.

All-purpose Trunk Roads

6. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his latest estimate of the backlog in the programme of necessary reconstruction work on all-purpose trunk roads; and when he expects the programme to be back on course.

Mrs. Chalker: I estimate that at the end of 1984-85 the backlog was the equivalent of about 220 miles of single carriageway. The speed with which we reduce the backlog will depend on the availability of resources and priorities within the overall roads programme.

Mr. Chapman: I appreciate that extra funds have been allocated to the structural maintenance of the all-purpose roads programme, but may I have my hon. Friend's assurance, so far as she is able to give it, that meeting the backlog, which is a priority, will not be done at the expense of cutting funds allocated to the construction of new roads?

Mrs. Chalker: Yes, I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. The new construction programme, which brings environmental and economic benefits, often relieves the communities concerned in a way which allows the maintenance programmes of other roads to be completed over a slightly longer period. The important factor is to keep vital traffic arteries in good condition. That is the direction in which the priority of renewal and maintenance spending has been going, though it has not been coming from the construction programme.

Dartford Tunnel

7. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from Essex county council regarding tolls at the Dartford tunnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: The chairman of the County Highways Committee wrote to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, last December thanking her for a quick decision on the tolls increase application made the by joint committee.

Mr. Proctor: Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is considerable concern in Essex and elsewhere, particularly among industrialists, about the financial regime at the Dartford tunnel now that it is an integral part of the M25? Can he hold out any prospects for a change in the financial regime of the tunnel?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend will be aware that Essex and Kent undertook this venture in the first place on the basis of a tolled crossing. In a sense, relief is at hand because it has now become a motorway link and the yield of the tolls is likely to pay off the outstanding debt sometime in the early to mid-1990s, which is more than can be said for some people saddled with tolled crossings.

Mr. Cartwright: In view of the importance of the M25 for traffic in and around London, how can the Secretary of State justify continuing the archaic nonsense of toll collection at Dartford, especially having regard to the heavy burden on those who have to use the tunnel twice a day to get to and from work?

Mr. Ridley: We are building extra toll booths, so there is unlikely to be any delay. As for the heavy burden to which the hon. Gentleman refers, there would a very heavy burden on taxpayers if tolls throughout the country, or even just at Dartford, were taken on by the taxpayer when others originally undertook to shoulder the burden.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Does my right hon. Friend agree that to get the full benefit of the M25 it is desirable to remove deterrents to its use? I am not against tolls in principle, but does my right hon. Friend consider that the tolls at Dartford are just such a deterrent?

Mr. Ridley: There are two ways in which the Dartford tunnel could restrict use of the M25—the possibility of having to queue to pay the toll and inadequate capacity to carry the traffic under the river. As my hon. Friend knows, we are taking action on both counts. We are building extra toll booths and a consultants' study on whether the capacity of the tunnel is adequate to take likely future traffic is expected very shortly.

North Devon Link Road

8. Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will announce his decision on the inquiry into stage 2a of the North Devon link road; when he expects to make a decision on the recently ended stage 2b public inquiry; and if he will make a statement on the extent to which the North Devon road construction programme is on schedule.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We announce decisions following public inquiries into road schemes as soon as possible, and will do so in this case.

My hon. Friend will know that stage 1 of the link road is open to traffic, and I am glad to be able to report that construction work on the Bideford bypass is proceeding ahead of schedule.

Mr. Speller: I thank my hon. Friend for that fairly hopeful reply, but in seeking to progress these decisions will he bear in mind the intolerable stress on the finances of people whose homes, farms and businesses have been under threat for several years? Furthermore, have the dreadful decisions made here and elsewhere in relation to the Okehampton bypass delayed work on the North Devon link and area roads?

Mr. Spicer: I can give a total assurance on the last point. The answer is none at all.

I appreciate my hon. Friend's concern about the North Devon link. We are fully committed to providing that important new road as soon as possible, and we shall be taking it through the necessary statutory procedures as quickly as possible.

Roads Programme

9. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated expenditure on the construction and maintenance of the public road system in the United Kingdom in 1985-86.

Mrs. Chalker: About £3,100 million, Sir.

Mr. Hughes: Will the Minister compare that with the estimated £12 billion collected in motor taxation? Would it not be a good idea now to wipe out the £480 million debt on our esturial crossings as a means of improving our industrial efficiency at a stroke?

Mrs. Chalker: The actual debt on esturial crossings is £526 million. I well understand the concern of those who use the roads, but we must ensure—as we have always ensured, and as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State sought to make clear in answer to an earlier question—that the resources of the things that we build pay off the debts.

As we announced in February 1984, we are spending £33 million on the crossing with which which the hon. Gentleman is most concerned — the Severn bridge — because we believe that it is vital that the road links into south Wales are kept open and maintained. At the same time, we are now in the second stage of the feasibility study on the possibility of a further crossing into and out of south Wales.

In no way has the £33 million expenditure announced more than a year ago been increased. Whatever the hon. Gentleman may say, we have always been committed to putting the Severn bridge back into good order.

Mr. Hayward: How does the figure announced for 1985-86 compare with the figure for 1984-85?

Mrs. Chalker: It is an increase of £36 million in the debt.

Mr. Yeo: Is my hon. Friend aware that the A12 is increasingly heavily used, partly due to the expansion of Felixstowe dock and partly due to the general prosperity of Norfolk and East Anglia? Can she hold out any hope of further expenditure on improvements to this heavily used road and especially on the construction of a grade separated junction at Capel St. Mary?

Mrs. Chalker: I am well aware of my hon. Friend's concern about the Capel St. Mary junction. As he knows, that matter is under review. Much money is being spent on the A12, especially around Ipswich, where work on the western bypass is proceeding quickly. What is necessary to be spent in future will be spent. This year's provision for new construction and improvements is £33 million up on last year's construction figures, which were within 0·5 per cent. of the budget allowed.

London Passenger Transport Group

10. Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last chaired a meeting of the London Passenger Transport Group at which fares policy was discussed.

Mr. Ridley: The introduction of the new Capitalcard, and reports on its success, have been on the agenda of the three meetings that I have chaired since July 1984.

Mr. Snape: While chairing that committee, has the Secretary of State received any criticism about the fare increase of up to 50 per cent., for which he has been responsible, since LRT's creation last year? How does it feel to be in charge of the dearest public transport system in any capital city in Europe?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman must get his facts right. The last fare increase determined by the present leadership of the GLC was in May 1983. Since then, prices have increased to March this year by 9·6 per cent., whereas fares have increased by only 9 per cent. Fares are now lower than they were when Ken Livingstone last fixed them.

Mr. Cohen: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that under the last round of fare increases—the first under LRT—short hop fares, which are used especially by women with young children and shoppers, were increased by 25 per cent., while fares for the jet setters who use Heathrow were either reduced or frozen? Will he ensure that the opposite approach is adopted in future and that there is a freeze on those short hop fares?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that when a minimum fare is increased, it is sometimes increased by more than the average. The average London Regional Transport fare increased by 9 per cent. in January. If fares had kept pace with the increase in the cost of living since the GLC last fixed fares in May, the increase would have been 9·6 per cent. by now.

London-Ramsgate (Road Communications)

11. Mr. Crouch asked the Secretary of State for Transport what study his Department has made of the implications for the adequacy of road communications between London and Ramsgate of the increase in ferry traffic between that port and the continent; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Traffic to and from Ramsgate will be taken into account in our current study of the possible need for more capacity on the section of the M2 between junctions 1 and 3. From the M2 to Ramsgate the link is the A299 Thanet way and the A253, for which Kent county council is the highway authority.

Mr. Crouch: Is my hon. Friend aware of the television advertising campaign conducted by the Sally Line which says:

"Ramsgate to Dunkirk—the only way to go"?

Is he also aware that that campaign is bound to increase traffic of all sorts on the A299 Thanet way? When will her Department match this initiative and enterprise by the private sector operator, the Sally Line, and adopt this road as a trunk road and develop it as it should be developed—as a dual carriageway road to Europe?

Mrs. Chalker: I think that my hon. Friend knows that we are delighted with the thrusting attitude of the advertising by the Sally Line. I believe that the advertisement goes on after to say something else, but I do not have the words in front of me.

I am well aware of my hon. Friend's anxiety about the A299 and the A253. We have undertaken to keep the matter under review and to consider the possible need to bring the road into the trunk road network. At present, I am considering what can be done to solve the problems that are caused by a combination of traffic and gradient on those roads. That is the priority for the time being. The matter will be kept under review.

Mr. Soames: Will my hon. Friend consider the likely impact on this route and on others from the Channel ports when the Channel tunnel is completed?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend is jumping ahead a little——

Mr. Soames: Thrusting!

Mrs. Chalker: Thrusting ahead, yes. I have no doubt that he is as anxious as anyone to see closer links with Europe, but he knows that potential tenderers have until 31 October this year to respond to the guidelines that my right hon. Friend issued several weeks ago. I understand that work on that aspect is proceeding very well. However, all road links to the ports, whether they be off the Thanet way or anywhere else, are being looked at closely in the light of the decisions that will be taken.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Commercial Cases (Trials)

30. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Attorney-General if Her Majesty's Government will bring forward proposals to speed up the trial of substantial commercial cases before the High Court.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): The Commercial Court already has a simplified procedure with briefer pleadings and expeditious hearings before experienced judges. The civil justice review which, will be looking at the jurisdictional, procedural and administrative aspects of the main classes of civil business, will be looking closely at the court. In the meantime, the Commercial Court committee has set up a small working party which is considering improvements in procedure.

Mr. Baker: I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend agrees that a two-year delay in bringing cases to hearing is quite unacceptable. Will he consider appointing more judges? Will he also consider procedural changes, such as allowing a court to require a preliminary view of a case to be taken and a greater use of written statements so that the preliminary view of a case being seen will encourage the parties to decide the matter at a much earlier stage and so reduce costs?

The Attorney-General: The Commercial Court already offers significant procedural advantages. It is able to deal very quickly with complex and urgent interlocutory matters, using procedures which are not available in the Queen's Bench Division as a whole. There are two reviews in progress. A review is being conducted by the Commercial Court committee, and there is the civil justice review, which will start looking at matters in the spring.

Mr. Ryman: Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman any news about the progress of the deliberations of Lord Roskill's committee on commercial frauds?

The Attorney-General: I do not think that that arises out of this question, but in fact I am unable to help the hon. Gentleman.

24-hour Duty Solicitor Scheme

31. Mr. Dubs asked the Attorney-General what plans he has to introduce the 24-hour duty solicitor scheme.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): Planning for the 24-hour duty solicitor scheme is the responsibility of the Law Society, which is pressing ahead with this. The Government are committed to an effective scheme, and are doing all they can to assist the society.

Mr. Dubs: Is not the truth that the Government are failing to provide the essential resources necessary to implement the scheme so as to mitigate the worst effects of the custody provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act? Are not the Government reneging on commitments given during the passage of that legislation?

The Solicitor-General: That is not true. Discussions are going on with the Law Society about remuneration in particular. It is quite without justification to say what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Ashby: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that once the Police and Criminal Evidence Act is implemented, the 24-hour duty solicitor scheme may be very necessary? Can he say when it is intended that the various sections of the Act providing for detention for 36 and 96 hours will be put into effect, because they are a necessary ingredient in the prosecution of justice?

The Solicitor-General: The scheduled date to which my hon. Friend refers is 1 January 1986. It is important that there should be an effective scheme, but I remind my hon. Friend that the Police and Criminal Evidence Act clarifies the powers of the police as regards the interests of arrested persons. We intend that there shall be a scheme in effect by then, but it is important to make that point.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Is the Solicitor-General aware that the Law Society is becoming extremely frustrated by the Government's failure to commit the £20 million a year which it appears will be necessary to run the scheme? Will he now commit that money for the running of the scheme, as promised earlier? Will he ensure that under the scheme a detained person has access to a solicitor of his choice rather than to a limited list held by the police and that, where people are detained voluntarily in a police station, their friends and relatives have access to the duty solicitor under the scheme rather than, as is proposed at present, access being limited to the police only in those circumstances?

The Solicitor-General: The last two points are under consideration by my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor. It is important that costs should be considered together with other relevant considerations. As to the resources that will have to be committed to the scheme, it is estimated that it will cost £100,000 to set up the telephone answering service and that the maximum annual cost will be between £500,000 and £750,000, depending upon which option is chosen.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree that the issue underlying the fragile 24-hour experiment is the broader difficulty of remunerating a private sector profession with standby duties at night-time and into the early hours of the morning? If, as is anticipated, the experiment establishes a need for professional advice that is not being met, what range of alternatives does the Solicitor-General have under active consideration?

The Solicitor-General: We need to be able to consider the results of the three pilot schemes—the two that have been taking place at Kettering and Birmingham and one later this summer at Clerkenwell—before we can have a clear idea as to what practical measures need to be taken.

Barristers (Misconduct)

32. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General if he will introduce legislation to provide for the investigation and adjudication of allegations of misconduct by barristers by a statutory body specifically established for the purpose.

The Attorney-General: No, Sir. The Bar, like all comparable professions, is self-regulatory. There is no fundamental distinction between its disciplinary procedures, which are founded in the common law, and those of other professions, whether they are based on the common law or on statute. Those procedures are designed to protect the public and the interests of the client.

Mr. Brown: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that the existing disciplinary machinery cannot be allowed to function in a blatantly party political manner? Is it not intolerable that a profession dominated by Conservatives should use its own disciplinary machinery to intimidate those barristers who defended striking miners in cases arising out of the recent industrial dispute? Is it not made even more unacceptable because the same committee has taken no action against those barristers who, in similar circumstances, advised the working miners in Nottingham? Is not the legacy of the miners' strike bitter enough without Conservative barristers exacerbating the situation by using the disciplinary machinery in this disgracefully unprofessional way? What action will the Attorney-General take to prevent those excesses?

The Attorney-General: I reject any allegations of political bias. Questions of conduct are matters for the Senate, as the governing body of the profession. The Bar's code of conduct is designed for the protection of the public, and, in particular, the interests of the client. Conduct of the kind about which complaint has been made goes to the heart of that code and is a matter that we are entitled, if not bound, to investigate.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: In view of the disgraceful remarks from the Opposition Front Bench, will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that there is no evidence, with the Bar or with other disciplinary inquiries in other professions, that such bodies are influenced by political considerations?

The Attorney-General: I have never found any evidence of it, and I much regret that the allegation has been made today.

Sir Edward Gardner: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it would be wrong for defence counsel to enter into general agreements about a particular kind of case, how that case should be conducted, whether there should be pleas of guilty or not guilty, what court should be chosen and whether trial should be by magistrates or by judge and jury, when such decisions could create a serious conflict with public interest, conflict with the interests of justice and, in particular, conflict with the interests of a particular defendant?

The Attorney-General: That matter is under consideration by the Bar Council, and in the circumstances it would be wrong for me to comment on it.

Construction Industry (Latent Damage)

33. Mr. Chapman asked the Attorney-General what representations he has received from the construction industry following the Lord Chancellor's Law Reform Committee's report on latent damage, Cmnd. 9390.

The Solicitor-General: The Lord Chancellor's Department has received comments from a number of sources. Among those in the construction industry from whom comments have been received were the Building Employers Confederation, the Federation of Master Builders, the Royal Institute of British Architects, the Association of Consultant Architects, the Association of Consulting Engineers and the Institution of Civil Engineers.

Mr. Chapman: As my hon. and learned Friend will know, many parts of the construction industry are concerned that the Law Reform Committee's report does not deal adequately with the law of liability relating to latent damage in buildings. Will he promise to see representatives of the industry, as I am sure he will agree that it is in the interests of everybody — not just the builders, but the local authorities and the owners and occupiers of buildings — that those latent damage problems are sorted out on a mutual satisfactory basis?

The Solicitor-General: As my hon. Friend knows, responsibility for the civil law, including this part of it, lies with my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor. While not accepting the strictures in my hon. Friend's question about the way in which the Law Reform Committee dealt with the law of liability, and bearing in mind that it was asked to look at the accrual of a right to an action in a case of latent damage, I think that those on behalf of whom he speaks know that they have had a full opportunity to make representations to the Lord Chancellor, but if they want to make further representations, I am sure that my noble Friend will be willing to receive them.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Publicity and Public Relations

35. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his estimate of the cost of publicity and public relations concerning the Government's involvement in, and responsibility for, overseas development during 1984-85; and how this compares with costs for similar purposes in 1977-78.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): Expenditure on public relations and publicity by and on behalf of the Overseas Development Administration in 1984-85 was £152,400 and in 1977-78 £111,000. Those figures exclude staffing costs. In addition, in 1984-85, £106,000 was spent on development education. In 1977-78 the comparable figure was £185,800.

Mr. Hardy: Do not those figures show that the virtues of our aid programme seem to be becoming more apparent than real?

Mr. Raison: On the contrary, I believe that the virtues of our aid programme are both apparent and real. For example, they are extremely well set out in the annual review, which I instituted two years ago and which I think has been widely appreciated.

Mr. Soames: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on those figures, as well as his Department on the work that it has done in that area. However, will he do more to persuade industrialists of the value of that programme to them? His review was much appreciated by industrialists in my constituency, who were pleased to see how much came back to British industry.

Mr. Raison: I appreciate my hon. Friend's remarks. In fact, we started a new service for British business last year. We now have four-monthly reports of new aid commitments in the pipeline, published in advance through the Export Intelligence Service. That is made available to British business men. We also now have a commercial liaison officer designated within the ODA. I hope that those things will help to improve, if anything, the opportunities for British business that can be found within the aid programme.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the Minister agree that the annual review, to which he has just referred, was a somewhat glossy document? Would it not be more appropriate to have a modest presentation reflecting the Government's modest achievements?

Mr. Raison: The presentation of the review and the information in it have been widely appreciated. I think that many people have found it to be of great value.

Nepal (Visit)

36. Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent visit to Nepal by the Minister for Overseas Development.

Mr. Raison: I visited Nepal from 17 to 23 April. I had discussions with Nepalese Ministers and was able to visit many of our aid projects. I found that our aid programme is well directed towards tackling Nepal's most urgent problems and that it is well appreciated. I reaffirmed that Britain planned to continue to make a significant contribution to Nepal's development.

Mr. Wells: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that Nepal is one of the poorest countries in the world and that our programme is directed to supporting the poorest in that nation? Will he also tell us more about how he has gone about it?

Mr. Raison: My hon. Friend is right in saying that Nepal is an extremely poor country. Our programme is very much designed to assist its poorest people. We have concentrated especially on the communities in the eastern hills. The schemes on which we have embarked, many of which I saw, cover agriculture, livestock, combating environmental degradation, and the development of re-afforestation and road communications. All these schemes are progressing successfully.

Third World (Investment)

37. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information is available to him about the extent and role of United Kingdom private investment in the Third world in promoting improved living standards for local people.

Mr. Raison: In 1983 British private financial flows to the developing countries totalled £2·6 billion. Such resource flows can and do produce employment and income in the developing countries and thus improve living standards.

Mr. Deakins: As the primary purpose of private investment must be to make profits for those who undertake that investment from Britain and elsewhere, surely any benefits to local people must be a by-product, unlike aid from Government to Government and aid through voluntary organisations, which offers some guarantee that the aid will reach the people who matter.

Mr. Raison: The hon. Gentleman is wrong about that. Firms which invest will be looking for profits, but their activities will undoubtedly create employment in the countries where the investment is taking place and help to increase prosperity. This is an important part of our programme.

Sir John Page: Does my right hon. Friend agree that private investment often sets a standard in developing countries which helps to drag local investment up to higher standards than it has been able to achieve before?

Mr. Raison: I agree with my hon. Friend. Britain has exceeded consistently the United Nations 1 per cent. target for the total of official and private flows of aid to developing countries. In 1983 we achieved 1.25 per cent.

Chile

38. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what emergency or other aid his Department is giving in response to the recent earthquake in Chile.

Mr. Raison: Her Majesty's Government have provided £250,000 in emergency assistance since the earthquake in March. That is in addition to our share of the recent contribution by the European Community from its emergency aid budget.

Mr. Holland: The Minister will be aware that £250,000 is a very small sum in relation to the needs. The House will certainly want to monitor this in future, granted that on a previous occasion a field hospital, apparently delivered to the Pinochet Government, was not deployed in a disaster area. Will the Minister also take this opportunity to assure the House that on economic, social and technical grounds, he will now be supporting a major aid programme to Nicaragua and not supporting his right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary in a political blockade of that country, as reported in The Observer yesterday by Hugh O'Shaughnessy?

Mr. Speaker: The question is directed to Chile.

Mr. Raison: If the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) wants to ask questions about Nicaragua, perhaps he will table questions about Nicaragua. As you have said, Mr. Speaker, the question is about Chile.

The aid that we have provided is useful. We shall be concerned to ensure that it is properly used. There is no reason to believe that it will not.

Ethiopia and Sudan

39. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give his most up-to-date estimate of aggregate food aid needed for Ethiopia and Sudan for 1985.

Mr. Raison: The best estimates available are that Ethiopia will require 1·5 million tonnes and Sudan 1·4 million tonnes of cereals food aid during 1985. Most of this has been delivered or pledged. In response to requests by various British voluntary agencies, I am pleased to announced further assistance totalling over £2 million for victims of the famine in Ethiopia and the Sudan: about half to each. It covers a variety of purposes, including the transport of food, supplementary food, seeds and tools.

Mr. Lloyd: I welcome the Minister's response, but will he confirm that reports are coming out of Ethiopia that there are still massive difficulties in distributing food aid? Will he also confirm that the British Government still regard the provision of lorries as development assistance and therefore will not provide that help, which means that the aid that is given is not as effective as it should be in helping those who are in desperate need?

Mr. Raison: That is a misapprehension. There are great difficulties in operating emergency relief in Ethiopia. Some difficulties arise partly from the civil war; and others are attributable to many other factors. We are doing our best and contributing a great deal. There will be difficulties that will continue into the long term. The most fruitful approach for us will be through the European Community and the World Bank. I am sure that something useful can be worked out.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the Minister recognise that the railway in southern Sudan and——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has tabled question No. 40, which seems to be directed to the same subject.

Mr. Maclennan: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker. In fact, I was on the same issue.

Does the Minister accept that there is an urgent need for spare parts and considerable capital investment for the railway in southern Sudan and for transport by road across rough territory in Ethiopia? Are the Government prepared to listen to representations from the aid agencies and to make money available to help them?

Mr. Raison: I told the House that additional money has been made available for exactly those purposes. We have consistently tried to help with supplies, spares, and so on, in the transport sector, and we shall continue to do so. For the railway system, especially in western Sudan, we have provided an expert, who has put forward ideas about how to improve the flow of food to the west of the country.

Football Grounds

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): With permission Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement. The entire nation has been horrified and appalled at the terrible tragedy at Bradford City football ground on Saturday. I know that the whole House will wish to join together in expressing our deepest sympathy for the families and friends of the dead and of the many who were injured, some of whom remain critically ill.

The fire started just before half-time, at about 3.35 pm, under the floor at one end of the main stand. The stand was an old one made of metal and timber with a bitumen and felt roof, and the fire spread extremely rapidly. There were about 3,000 people in the stand. The majority managed to move down onto the pitch, but a number tried to escape through the exits at the rear and found themselves trapped in a narrow alley between the back of the stand and the wall of the ground. In accordance with long-established practice at sports grounds, the gates were locked to prevent unauthorised spectators from gaining admission. It was there that many people died.

The chief constable of West Yorkshire informed me this morning that 51 people died at the ground. Two more have since died in hospital. A further four people are reported missing and remain unaccounted for. The bodies of most of those who died at the ground have not yet been identified. In addition, over 200 people were injured, of whom 60 are still in hospital. Twenty two policemen were injured, of whom two are in hospital, and three firemen were injured, none of whom is still in hospital.

The cause of the fire has not yet been ascertained, but a team of detectives from the West Yorkshire police, assisted by forensic scientists and members of the West Yorkshire fire brigade, began sifting through the debris as soon as it had been made safe to do so. The police have asked for witnesses to come forward who might be able to give evidence about the possible cause of the fire, and it is essential that members of the public should give every assistance.

I should like to pay tribute to the courage and professionalism of the police and fire services. No one who has seen the television film of the events can doubt that as much as could be done was done to get people out of the stand, and then to deal with the aftermath of the fire. I should also like to express the warmest appreciation for the dedication and skill of the medical and pathological teams, the ambulance service and all the hospital and voluntary agencies who have since been working day and night, treating the injured and consoling the bereaved.

Further, the House will be aware that at Birmingham on the same day many people were injured and subsequently one spectator died as a result of a serious crowd disorder at the match between Birmingham City and Leeds United, arising from violence by groups of fans from both clubs. There were repeated invasions of the pitch, missiles were thrown, and the police were attacked. In all, there were 125 arrests, 96 police officers required medical treatment, of whom two are still in hospital, and over 80 spectators were injured. Some of the injuries were caused when a wall collapsed following a surge in the crowd, and a boy of 15 subsequently died of the injuries he received. All 125 of those arrested have now been charged with a variety of criminal offences. That is a further example of disgraceful football violence, which illustrates the link between the problem of crowd safety and the problem of crowd control. With regard to this incident, inquiries are also being made by the Football Association, and these must proceed.

Investigations at Bradford are continuing and inquests will be conducted both there and at Birmingham. I shall expect to receive further reports in due course giving the conclusions of the police, forensic and fire brigade inquiries in Bradford and of the police inquiries in Birmingham. But over and above these investigations and hearings, the magnitude of the events demands that urgent steps should immediately be taken to examine what can be done to prevent such incidents. With my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland I have, therefore, asked Mr. Justice Popplewell to chair an inquiry with the following terms of reference:

"To inquire, with particular reference to the events at Bradford City and Birmingham football grounds on 11 May, into the operation of the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975; and to recommend what if any further steps should be taken, including any that may be necessary under additional powers, to improve both crowd safety and crowd control at sports grounds."

I understand that Mr. Justice Popplewell will visit Bradford tomorrow.

The inquiry's fundamental task will be to ensure that the demands of safety, on the one hand, and control, on the other, are not only each satisfied in themselves but satisfied compatibly with each other. A subsidiary but important task will be for the inquiry to review what is known as the "Green Guide"—the "Guide to Safety at Sports Grounds"—which provides guidelines for local authorities as to the conditions that they should require of clubs that seek certification under the 1975 Act. I shall ask that the inquiry should proceed with all possible speed, taking account of and supplementing, as necessary, the findings of the current police, forensic service and fire brigade investigations. I shall arrange for the chairman to be assisted by appropriately qualified assessors — for example, from the police and fire services—and to have available such technical advice and support as he requires. He will, of course, be able to make any further factual inquiries into what happened that he thinks necessary. If the chairman thinks it necessary or desirable, I and my right hon. Friend will welcome any interim report or recommendations he wishes to submit.

In addition, and in parallel with the work of the inquiry, I have decided to designate all grounds in the Third and Fourth Divisions of the Football League so that they become subject to the system of safety certification under the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975. The effect will be to require such clubs to apply for certificates from the relevant local authority specifying in considerable detail what physical conditions and management practices — including as to fire precautions—must be followed. The Government announced only on 1 April that we should be extending designation to third and fourth division grounds, but starting with those with a record of club violence. It is plain, however, that the time for selective action has passed, and I shall accordingly be discussing with the football authorities immediately how universal designation may be implemented as soon as possible. It will, of course, be for the inquiry to recommend any changes in the present certification procedures or any other steps that should be taken to improve crowd safety and control. But I can see no reason why designating the third and fourth division clubs or any of the other steps announced on 1 April should wait on its conclusions. It is clearly important that the public should be given all the protection that the existing law allows as quickly as possible, and that any measures to enhance safety and security that can be introduced speedily as a result of the work that has currently been proceeding should be implemented at the earliest possible date.

To ensure that the measures I have announced of a swift inquiry and a new programme of designation do not leave gaps meanwhile in public protection, I am asking chief fire officers immediately to visit uncertificated sports stadia in their areas to advise management on what steps they should take to secure proper standards of crowd safety in their circumstances. They will no doubt wish to discuss, among other matters, the opening and locking of gates at sports grounds. While I imagine such visits will be the more comprehensive if chief fire officers are accompanied by other members of the local authority safety teams, this work will brook no delay and, for that reason, I consider the duty to fall best initially on chief fire officers.

I must stress that the measures announced today are additional to those announced on 1 April after the meeting at 10 Downing street with the football authorities. That programme of measures agreed to combat football hooliganism goes ahead with renewed urgency.

The events at Bradford and Birmingham were in their different ways both tragic and sickening. Nothing will wipe away the memory of that terrible afternoon. But our task now must be to take urgent steps to minimise the chances of recurrence. The measures I have announced today are designed to that end. I will report to the House in due course on their progress and outcome.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): May I first, on behalf of Her Majesty's Opposition, offer our profound and heartfelt sympathy to those who were bereaved and fearfully injured in last Saturday's horrifying disaster? It is especially poignant that hundreds of people setting out to enjoy a pleasant spring day, which was, for Bradford City's fans, supposed to be one of celebration as well, should have seen that day end in torment and agony, or not seen that day end at all.

We send our sympathy also to the citizens of Bradford and Lincoln, who have been stricken by these appalling events. I also want to pay tribute to the emergency services —to the fire brigade, the medical staff, hospital workers and the police—and also to the fans and ground staff who sought to help, for their heroism and dedication in this emergency.

The Opposition believe that the Government have made a serious mistake in linking in one statement and in one inquiry the Bradford fire with the violence at Birmingham. The nature of those two events is different, even though some matters are relevant to both. To begin with, it is unfitting that questions on the disaster and on an outbreak of mob violence should be mingled. It creates the most difficult task for you, Mr. Speaker. I shall therefore confine my intervention to the Bradford fire and leave questioning about the Birmingham episode to my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell).

With regard to Bradford, I therefore ask the Government to open forthwith a fund for the relief of the victims and their families. Some families may have been left without a breadwinner, and, although the loss of a loved one can never be compensated for financially, it is right that financial restitution should be made. In the case of those injured, the nature of their injuries may mean years of medical treatment and loss of earning power or educational opportunities. Proper and appropriate compensation should be made available for that.

Further, will the Government be ready to consider the possibility of making legal aid available to those who wish to consider legal action under the Occupiers Liability Act 1957? Is the club's insurance against public liability adequate to meet claims that will surely be made? The Opposition believe that the Government should have ordered a separate public inquiry, presided over by a judge, into the circumstances of the Bradford fire.

There are many questions to be answered, including the discrepant statements about whether Bradford City club had been warned about the need to improve its safety precautions some months ago. The leader of West Yorkshire county council has now published a letter which strongly indicates that such a warning was given. We need to know what the fire precautions were and why massive amounts of combustible litter had been allowed to accumulate under the wooden stand for a considerable period of time. We need to get to the bottom of allegations that arson may have caused the fire. The bereaved and the injured have a right to know the full facts. We also believe that there should be a separate inquiry into safety at football grounds, and at all sports grounds and other places where large numbers of the public gather together.

That inquiry should be empowered to make recommendations. The matters that it should be empowered to consider should include whether the 10,000 lower capacity limit for designation should be reduced, and the use of the Secretary of State's activating powers under the Fire Precautions Act 1971. At present, no football grounds have been designated under the Act. The inquiry should consider meanwhile whether the 10 grounds with wooden stands should close those stands. Equally urgent is the necessity to consider the question of the perimeter fencing-off of spectators from pitches, as there is general agreement that if such fencing had been installed at Bradford the casualty toll would have been even more horrific.

Ought not the Football Association to suspend its order to Luton Town to install a perimeter fence? The subject of the control of egress from grounds must be considered urgently, in view of the disastrous effects of the closing of the exits at Bradford. The nature of the material used for seating as well as stands must be considered, in view of the effect of the plastic seating at Bradford on the spread of the fire.

The ownership of grounds should be considered to see whether burdens can be lifted from the less successful clubs. The funding of football must be examined. There is a glaring disparity between the Government's attitude towards racing compared with football. It is essential both for the Government and for all commercial interests which benefit from their relationship with football to consider their financial obligations to a sport from which they obtain so much revenue and profit but provide so little in the way of return. The nature of these issues is such that an urgent interim report is essential well before the opening of the new football season, so that all possible advance precautionary action can be taken.

I did not think for one moment that I should be coming to the House this afternoon to ask controversial questions.

[Mr. Gerald Kaufman]

The reaction of my right hon. Friends and myself is one of astonishment and disbelief that the Government should join these two issues and treat this tragedy in this way. The Government's response to this disaster in setting up this joint inquiry is insensitive and in the worst possible taste. It will be deeply offensive to the bereaved, to the victims, to the stricken cities and to the nation. Let this be clear. The nation has reacted to this terrible disaster with grief. If negligence or complacency allow such a catastrophe to be repeated, the reaction will not be grief. It will be anger.

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) for his expression of regard for the work done by the emergency services, but I think that some of his subsequent remarks do not respond to the mood of the nation or of the House.

As for the right hon. Gentleman's main complaint—that there is to be a single inquiry—some of the points which he suggested should be considered by the inquiry themselves make it clear that safety and control are very much related and that it would be wholly artificial to divorce the two. One is in no sense equating the two incidents, one in which a life was lost and the other in which so many lives were lost, if one says that the inquiry should properly be able to consider both control and safety. That is what the inquiry will be able to do.

The point is best illustrated by one of the matters raised by the right hon. Gentleman, namely, the perimeter fencing. The suggestion has been made, in effect, that perimeter fencing is inconsistent with safety, or goes against safety. Anybody who looks at the green guide will readily see that the designation requirements have to be looked at as a whole. They include the ability to evacuate grounds and stands speedily. Perimeter fencing which did not meet the requirements would not be approved under the safety certificate. There is, therefore, a relationship between safety and control.

I take note of the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion about opening a fund for the relief of the victims. I shall want to consider it in the light of the situation as it develops concerning the needs of everybody who has been affected and the resources available to provide for those needs.

Legal aid will be available in the normal course of events for any eligible person who is able to make out a case for such aid to the legal aid committee.

There is still some uncertainty about the insurance question, and that is being looked into.

With regard to warnings given to the club concerned, I have in my possession the text of letters emanating in 1984 and on 30 April 1985 on that matter. I understand that there may be some dispute whether those letters were received, but there can be little doubt that they were sent.

I can give the right hon. Gentleman some reassurance on the many matters that he mentioned, because when one takes account of some of the forensic points there is not really all that much between us. Almost all of those points fall well within the ambit of Mr. Justice Popplewell's inquiry, which will be extremely comprehensive, as I think the right hon. Gentleman will agree, on mature reflection, when he studies further its terms of reference. In particular, the right hon. Gentleman referred to an interim report, and the House will recall that I specifically said that it would be open to Mr. Justice Popplewell to make such a report if he thought that it was necessary or appropriate to do so.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): May I, together with my right hon. and hon. Friends, join the Home Secretary in expressing our deep sadness and sympathy for those who have suffered as a result of the tragedy on Saturday afternoon at Bradford? It is a terrible sadness that some of those who went to the Valley Parade to celebrate the third division championship should not have returned home at all or should have to wait many months before returning home severely maimed.

May I also join the Home Secretary in expressing our gratitude to the emergency services, the ground staff and the many courageous football fans who joined others in trying to save people in dangerous circumstances?

May I impress upon the Home Secretary the importance of urgently solving the problem of safety, which it is hoped may be solved fairly quickly, where as problems of control have occupied us for many years now and may not be so easy to solve?

Will the Home Secretary give the House his assurance that his welcome decision to bring third and fourth division grounds within the provisions of the Safety of Sports Grounds Act will be extended to other comparable stadia and, above all, that the Government will provide the money to enable those clubs and sporting facilities which cannot afford to bring their facilities up to standard to do so? In doing that, will the Home Secretary bear in mind that Bradford City was a club which gave cheap entry to the unemployed and the disadvantaged

Mr. Speaker: Briefly.

Mr. Carlile: Finally, will the Home Secretary please ensure that the insurance companies will not be allowed to fall back on the position which they expressed this morning, that no compensation will be paid unless negligence is proved? Will he ensure that in this case at least the principle of no fault liability is laid down for those who have suffered?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman for his expressions of appreciation to those involved in dealing with these tragic events. He mentioned some particular groups who are worthy of commendation but whom I was unable to mention specifically in my statement.

We shall want to consider the extension of designation beyond the third and fourth division football grounds in the light of the inquiry as it develops.

The House will be familiar with the existence of the Football Grounds Improvement Trust and the Football Trust, which receive some of the "spot the ball" revenue from the Pool Promoters Association. Quite a lot of that money is used to improve football clubs' facilities. For example, we are talking of expenditure at the rate of £7 million a year.

As it happens, before these tragic events occurred a meeting was arranged for this coming Wednesday between my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and Lord Aberdare, the chairman of the Football Trust. In discussions on designation I shall be involved with my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for sport and the Football Trust to see what the financial situation is. I know that my hon. Friend is also considering whether assistance can be given under the urban programme.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): May I associate my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) and myself with the expressions of condolence and sympathy of the Home Secretary at this appalling tragedy? On the face of it, it appears to raise again matters such as escape doors, gates and other forms of egress from sports grounds. Will the Home Secretary seek to introduce legislation, or amend existing legislation, so that where such exits exist, whatever the difficulties caused to the corporation or sports ground owning them, they should be available for egress in the event of a disaster?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for what he has said. In response to his last and very substantial point, the House might be interested to know that paragraph 6.14.6 of the green guide clearly states:

"All exit gates should be manned at all times while the ground is used by the public so that they can be opened immediately in an emergency."

That condition would normally be applied where there has been designation.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Although it is obviously premature to consider what funding will be necessary to bring safety standards up to an acceptable level, will the Government undertake to ensure that money does not stand in the way of seeing that those standards are reached?

Mr. Brittan: I have already said that the means by which the requirements that will flow from designation are implemented will be discussed with the football authorities.

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): May I offer my sincere thanks to all of those hon. Members who have expressed their sympathy following the tragic event on Saturday? I know that my constituents and the people of Bradford will greatly appreciate those expressions of sympathy and will derive some comfort from them. May I thank, in particular, the Minister of State, Home Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw) and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Macfarlane), for coming up to Valley Parade so promptly to see the situation at first hand? That prompt reaction was again an expression of the Government's concern, and was much appreciated.

I welcome the appreciation that has been expressed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and other hon. Members for the work of the emergency services. I am sure that they would join with me in paying tribute not only to the emergency services but to members of the Salvation Army, who were there throughout Saturday night, doling out tea and refreshments to those working late at the ground, to the St. John's ambulance men and to the anonymous heroes — many of them young people — who stayed behind at the wall and helped to pull the less able and less agile over it, at great risk of personal injury to themselves. Many of those helpers, indeed, ended up in hospital or suffered from burns.

I am sure that hon. Members will also want to pay tribute to the local community. People opened their doors and provided tea and comfort to the survivors. It is interesting to note that members of that community are of varied origin and that at a time when attention is very much focused on apparent divisions within it, real community spirit shone in a crisis, showing just how shallow those divisions really are.

I welcome the announcement of an inquiry, and the people of Bradford will also welcome it. If public confidence is to be restored and people are to feel safe at football matches, urgent action must follow upon the report of that inquiry, before the start of the new season. I hope that the Government and the football industry, through the Football Trust, will be prepared to respond to the financial implications of that report.

Obviously, there is great public concern about what would have happened if there had been a fence instead of a low wall along the front. I think that the view of Bradford supporters is that it is all very well hemming in a minority of hooligans, but that at the same time a potential death trap might be created for thousands of decent supporters.

I hope that all the lessons that can be drawn from this incident are learnt and that there does not have to be another disaster for more mistakes to be discovered. I apologise for delaying the House, but may I ask the Government to make money available in the form of an urgent cash injection, through the urban programme, the Sports Council or the Football Trust, so that a stand can be erected as quickly as possible at Bradford City's ground to match the determination and resolve of the people of Bradford to overcome the tragedy?

Thousands of Bradford citizens will want to attend the first home match of the season as their way of paying their respects to the loyal supporters who died on Saturday. To enable them to do so, and to reflect that spirit and resolve, we must see a real and tangible metal phoenix rise out of the terrible ashes that currently lie at Valley Parade.

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler) for his expressions of gratitude to and appreciation of those involved in dealing with this tragic event. My hon. Friend mentioned a number of other people in addition to those already mentioned in the House. I fully endorse what he said about them. I should like to take the opportunity to pay a tribute to my hon. Friend for the way in which he assisted over a long period in Bradford. It is an exemplary manifestation of the local leadership which an hon. Member can give on such an occasion.

My hon. Friend expressed anxiety about proposals for perimeter fences. I can assure him, as I did the right hon. Member for Gorton, that there is no question of simply putting up a fence which would create a trap. The arrangements for a ground as a whole will have to be considered, taking into account the nature of the ground, the means of getting out of the stands, the gaps in any fence and the manning of exits. Unless those professionally involved take the view that a perimeter fence adds to safety and security, it will not be approved. Safety and security are related. It is unrealistic to refuse to recognise that important fact.

My hon. Friend asked for assistance to put the Bradford club back on its feet. My hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for sport is on the Front Bench today and will appreciate the sincere and determined desire in Bradford to revive football there, with all that that means.

Mr. Thomas Torney (Bradford, South): I associate myself with the expressions of sympathy for all the people in Bradford who have lost loved and dear ones and for those who are suffering in hospital. I associate myself and the people of Bradford with the tributes to the emergency services—to the courage of the police, the fire service and the ambulance personnel, who rescued many people, often at great danger to themselves. I also praise the dedication of the hospital staffs who tended, and are still tending, the injured. The duty of the Government and the House is to the 52 or 53 people who died and to ensure that nothing like this happens again anywhere in the United Kingdom.

I should have preferred a public inquiry, as would the people of Bradford. I hope that there will be a public inquiry, because confidence must be restored. Whatever conclusions the inquiry arrives at for improving safety precautions at football grounds throughout the United Kingdom, I hope that they will be speedily enforced by the Government. Enforcement requires money. The improvements that are necessary in Bradford and elsewhere will cost more money than can be provided by some trust or other. The Prime Minister is in her place. I beg her and the Government to ensure that the Chancellor provides money to implement the necessary safety measures.

May I suggest to the Chancellor some immediate actions which could be taken? Surely a law can be passed, or instructions given, that exit doors are not to be locked. Perhaps some paint-like material can be applied to wooden stands at other grounds which will make the outbreak of fire less likely. Surely we can order the use of sprinkler systems. Perhaps if there had been such a system in Bradford the fire would not have been so bad, because the system operates automatically with heat.

We owe it to those involved in the disaster to find the money. There must be no excuses. The money must be found to make football grounds throughout the United Kingdom safe for our people.

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his expressions of sympathy and for his appreciation of those involved in dealing with what happened at Bradford.

Towards the end of my statement I said that I was asking chief fire officers immediately to visit sports stadia which are uncertificated to advise on what should be done right away. I added:

"They will no doubt wish to discuss among other matters the opening and locking of gates".

The hon. Gentleman's suggestion about exits is well taken. I am not sure of the validity of what he said about sprinkler systems, but that can be examined on a professional basis.

The inquiry will be comprehensive, and it will be able to supplement, in any way thought appropriate by Mr. Justice Popplewell, the findings of the police and the inquest, which are the main means of investigation, at least in the first instance. Mr. Justice Popplewell will be able to satisfy himself about what occurred and thereby be able to make appropriate recommendations.

I do not think that the House wishes to hear the trust spoken of disparagingly, because it has provided, and is providing, the substantial sum of £7 million a year. The hon. Gentleman asked what would be done to deal with the financial problems. The Prime Minister will be meeting representatives of the trust. When discussing the implications of designation with the football authorities, I shall, of course, discuss that aspect.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I associate myself and my constituents with all the expressions of sympathy to the relatives and friends of those who died and to those who were seriously injured at Bradford at the weekend. I also pay tribute to all the emergency services.

It is with regret that I have to say that there will be understandable reservations in Bradford about the form of the inquiry which the Home Secretary has announced. He said that the events at Bradford and at Birmingham were tragic and sickening, but different. Many people in Bradford will therefore think that the two incidents should be investigated separately. If the Home Secretary is not prepared to reconsider the form of the inquiry, will he give a clear assurance that it will sit in Bradford and take evidence in public, and that its full report will be published?

Is the Home Secretary satisfied that the terms of reference will enable the inquiry to look into all matters of concern associated with the tragedy? I was pleased to hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman's response to my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). Will he give serious consideration to establishing a fund from which the relatives of those who died and those who were grievously injured may apply for the compensation and help which inevitably will be needed? Will the Home Secretary also urgently consider enabling Bradford City football club to make its ground secure and safe?

I was pleased at the Home Secretary's response to previous requests of that kind. We all recognise that if third and fourth division grounds are to be made safe—indeed, non-league and sporting club grounds also—the clubs will be in desperate need of financial help, because many of them are short of money. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman urge the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce the betting levy tax and to remove VAT from repair work? That would be of some financial help to enable the desperately ill-financed clubs to ensure that their grounds are made safe quickly and effectively so that the tragic events in Bradford on Saturday occur nowhere else in this country, or, indeed in the world.

Mr. Brittan: I shall, of course, draw the hon. Gentleman's tax suggestion to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will understand that I cannot say any more about that at this stage.

Obviously, the conduct of the inquiry is a matter for Mr. Justice Popplewell, but there is no question that its findings and report will not be published in full. I regard it as inconceivable that the inquiry will not sit in Bradford. I assure the hon. Gentleman—and I hope that this will be appreciated in Bradford—that there is no question of there being anything other than the fullest examination of what occurred at Bradford.

There is an important part to be played by the police, the fire service and the coroner. Mr. Justice Popplewell will then decide what further inquiries are necessary to supplement the information obtained in order to achieve a full picture of what happened. He will be fully encouraged to do whatever is necessary to secure that.

We are as determined as the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members to ensure that the lessons are learnt, but I repeat that I do not believe that we would be doing any service to the memory of those who died at Bradford if we failed to take comprehensive measures to ensure that those who go to football grounds are as safe as possible from all hazards. To do that is not to show any disrespect for what occurred at Bradford or to equate it wth anything else. It is to recognise the complex nature of the problem and the necessity of providing solutions, as far as we can, to every aspect.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): On behalf of the people of Lincoln, I offer our deepest sympathy to all those who have suffered in this terrible tragedy. Lincoln has the greatest admiration for the heroic efforts of the emergency services in Bradford. In particular, the Lincoln City supporters wish to record their thanks to them.

Such a tragedy must never happen again. I welcome the inquiry, which, above all, must concentrate on the paramount need for safety.

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and entirely endorse everything that he has said.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Does the Home Secretary accept that, as a Leeds Member of Parliament, I speak for all its citizens in saying that I am ashamed of the actions of the so-called Leeds fans at Birmingham on Saturday? I regret that their actions should in any way be mingled or bracketed with the bravery and tragedy at Bradford. The two things are separate.

The Government are to act now, quite properly, in the face of what we all saw on Saturday, which was dreadful. Will the Home Secretary explain where the division of responsibility lies between his Department and the Department of the Environment — which, I acknowledge, has an active Minister with responsibility for sport —in monitoring on a day-to-day basis the problems of safety, not only at soccer grounds, but at rugby league and, in some instances, rugby union grounds? We must not wait for another tragedy before we act. We all know of third and fourth division grounds and others where the stands could go up in flames in exactly the same way as the stand at Bradford.

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to say that there is no comparison between the behaviour at Bradford and that at Birmingham, and I am glad to have the opportunity to confirm that.

I have statutory responsibility for the Act, but its implementation on a general basis is considered closely in discussions not only with my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for sport but with the football authorities. On the question of the detailed implementation on a place-by-place basis, the responsibility for issuing a certificate lies with the local authority, which takes heed of what the technical and professional experts say, whether they be fire officers or engineers. It also takes into account the green guide produced by the Home Office.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): While welcoming my right hon. and learned Friend's decision to extend designation under the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975 to all third and fourth division grounds, may I ask whether he agrees with many hon. Members that that will be very expensive and will cost considerably more than the money currently available for ground improvements under the Football Trust?

Will the inquiry under Mr. Justice Popplewell also consider methods of financing and funding ground improvements, especially methods to obtain a greater income from betting and football pools?

Mr. Brittan: I am not sure that the final matter raised by my right hon. and learned Friend comes within the terms of the inquiry, but it is obviously something that it will have to consider.

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): In following hon. Members who represented constituents who died, we must be deeply conscious of the fact that, but for the grace of God, any one of us could be making a similar statement, because all our constituencies have sporting grounds with stands which are as inflammable as that which went up in flames on Saturday.

Does the Home Secretary have any idea of how many sporting grounds — whether football, rugby, tennis or anything else — have stands comparable to that at Bradford? Will he reiterate that other sports must take seriously the events of last Saturday?

What is there in the British national character which requires such a catastrophe to force us into waking up to a fact which should have been manifestly obvious to the House and the country before the events of Saturday?

Mr. Brittan: I take note of the hon. Gentleman's last point. I cannot give him the figure for which he asked, not only for football, but for other sports. It is something that will have to be considered. Of course, the legislation is not confined to football, so the inquiry will not be confined to football. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman has raised matters that fall to be considered.

Mr. Marcus Fox (Shipley): It is right to point out that it is not only the city of Bradford that has suffered grievously. Many people living on the borders of the city also suffered. Indeed, some of my constituents lost their lives or were injured.

We want from my right hon. and learned Friend a categorical assurance that we will do everything in our power to discover the cause of the fire. I have spoken to many of my constituents who were at Bradford, and they expressed deep anxiety that events occurred that should never have occurred, but today is not the occasion to pursue that.

It would be foolish in the extreme to close grounds on the basis of safety regulations, while allowing the violence and hooliganism that is rampant in the sport to continue. The two are closely associated. I welcome the inquiry, and I am sure that it will go into everything that it can consider.

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks, particularly his closing remarks. I am sure that he is right. I can give him the categorical assurance that he seeks. We shall certainly do everything that we can to discover the cause of what happened. It is in nobody's interests that anything other than that should happen.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich): I wish at the outset to declare my interest as a director of a fourth division football club.

Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that the tragic and harrowing scenes that we saw on Saturday night must never recur in British professional soccer? Will he comment—I regret to have to make this point—on the stories appearing in at least two national newspapers today to the effect that this appalling tragedy was caused by the throwing of a smoke bomb at the football ground?

Will the Home Secretary accept from me that, regrettably, of all sports in Britain, for some reason professional football seems to attract that mindless minority who care little for the game and who, indeed, appear rarely to watch the game? What plans do the Government have to combat that endemic hooliganism and enable us in Parliament to do something about the civil liberties of millions of people who wish only to go about their business and not to be threatened and assaulted by people masquerading as football fans?

Is the Home Secretary aware, from the point of view of designating sports grounds in the third and fourth divisions, that no clubs in those divisions can at present afford the funds necessary to put their grounds in order under the well-merited and needed provisions of the Act? Is he further aware that unless Government money is forthcoming third and fourth division football clubs in Britain are doomed?

In view of the money that has been taken out of professional football by way of VAT, betting tax and pools levy, it is time for the Government—any Government—to do more to give football clubs some degree of assistance if what was once Britain's national game, a game which we were proud to give to the world, is not to disappear entirely.

Mr. Brittan: I note what the hon. Gentleman said at the end of his remarks, but I urge him to take account of the fact that 75 per cent. of the cost of meeting designation is currently provided, and that is a not inconsiderable amount However, I have said that I have taken note of the financial points that have been made.

I greatly welcome what the hon. Gentleman said about the mindless minority, which underlined, as many in the House will agree, the inevitable relationship between safety and behaviour and crowd control. The two cannot be divorced.

In answering the hon. Gentleman's question about what is being done, I refer him to the answer that was given in the House on 4 April, when an outline was given of what was agreed between the football authorities and the Government at the Downing street meeting. I refer specifically to the fact that we shall be introducing legislation on the lines of the Scottish legislation in relation to alcohol; that the review of the public order Acts which I shall be giving to the House shortly will contain recommendations relevant to this area; and that I have made clear to magistrates our support for them in following the tough guidelines of the Court of Appeal on football violence. I shall not rehearse all the measures which are on the record, but at this stage remind the hon. Gentleman only of those.

To answer the hon. Gentleman's question about the throwing of a smoke bomb, I am, of course, conscious that that allegation has been made. I was in touch with the chief constable to get the latest picture just before making my statement today. The position is that he does not feel that he as yet knows the cause of the fire, in spite of the various allegations that have been made.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that one of the first victims of this tragic event to be identified was one of my most noted constituents, Mr. Roy Mason, a historian who died of his burns despite the heroic efforts of police and bystanders to extinguish the flames that were engulfing him?

On many occasions when I have visited the ground, the narrow passageways at the back of the ground have caused me concern. I recognise, however, that it is easy to be wise after the event.

Does my right hon. and learned Friend appreciate that this is a personal tragedy for the chairman of Bradford City football club, Mr. Stafford Heginbotham, who has adopted a tough and imaginative approach to the problem of crowd violence to prevent it from coming to Bradford City as it has come to nearby Leeds United, and who has seen this event occur just as the club was reaching the very pinnacle of its success?

Mr. Brittan: I agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): Is the Secretary of State aware that many of those who were members of the committee which looked into the question of the safety of sports grounds 11 years ago knew that it was a question of cash versus safety, and that it is clear that cash won?

Why does the Department operate the Horserace Betting Levy Board, which channels an 8 per cent. tax from that sport back into improving safety standards at race tracks, whereas football, which pays 42 per cent. by way of tax, relies on a charitable trust? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman ask the Chancellor to allow football to be freed of that tax for a year so that the resultant £212 million may be ploughed back into football to prevent a recurrence of this tragedy? Why, if it is good enough for the sport of kings, is it not good enough for the sport of the working class?

Mr. Brittan: The Chancellor will, of course, have those remarks drawn to his attention, though the hon. Gentleman did not present the analogy completely fairly. Football betting, in the form of pools, and horserace betting are subject to tax. In addition, a levy is payable on betting which is used to finance matters relating to racing. There is no such levy in relation to football. However, in each case there is a means of financing improvements to football, in the one case by a statutory levy, and in the other by a voluntary trust. The question whether the funding is adequate and what should be done about it is a legitimate one, though I do not feel that the hon. Gentleman put the matter entirely fairly in his question.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): As the representative of the young man who tragically died in Birmingham, I welcome the joint nature of the inquiry. Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that in Northampton we have a wooden football stand and a wooden rugby football stand, and that one of the major stands at the county cricket ground is wooden? Should we not therefore look at the whole aspect of spectators and stands? I hope that the Government will take that on board and consider the financial implications involved.

Mr. Brittan: The question of the material of which stands are made will obviously be central to the inquiry.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): May I, on behalf of the thousands of loyal and sensible supporters of Birmingham City and Aston Villa, express the disgust of those supporters and fans at the hooligan behaviour at Birmingham City football ground on Saturday?

Although I do not like the form of the joint inquiry which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has announced, will he confirm that that inquiry will be free to sit in Birmingham? Will he also consider giving councils power to close football and other sports grounds until such time as their safety standards are up to the necessary limit, in the way local councils can proceed against other businesses and take enforcement action, even if his agreeing to do so would mean delaying the start of the football season?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his expression of disgust at the hooliganism at Birmingham. I share it. The inquiry will certainly be free to sit in Birmingham should it feel that that would be helpful and appropriate.

In answering his final question, I draw the attention of the House to the provisions of the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975 and the Fire Precautions Act 1971, both of which allow application to be made to the court in effect to restrict the use of premises should circumstances relating to safety make that desirable.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): The whole world of sport—the Central Council of Physical Recreation, the governing body, and everybody—mourns the events of the weekend. I welcome the measures that my right hon. and learned Friend has announced, particularly the designation of the third and fourth divisions. Will that include the Scottish first and second divisions, which are equally important?

Will my right hon. and learned Friend in response to what other hon. Members have said, consult the Chancellor about the enormous sums taken from sport by way of taxation to see whether further relief can be given so that the Football Ground Improvement Trust, which does an excellent job, can ensure greater safety at grounds before the beginning of next season, so that all sports fans in the United Kingdom can enjoy their sport in safety?

Mr. Brittan: I take note of the points that my hon. Friend has raised from his experience, especially in relation to Scotland. The operation of the Safety of Sports Grounds Act in Scotland was reviewed last year by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland in consultation with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, the association of Chief Police Officers (Scotland), the Scottish football authorities and other interested bodies. At that time, it was concluded that there was no need to extend designation beyond the premier division, but the position has been kept under review and my right hon. Friend hopes that all aspects of the effectiveness of the Act in Scotland, including future designation policy, will be considered carefully within the ambit of that arrangement.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Is not one of the fundamental problems the fact that measures designed to improve security within sports grounds are likely to run directly counter to measures to improve safety in getting out of grounds? Does the Home Secretary agree that as well as using all possible ingenuity in taking immediate practical measures we must bear in mind that these really just buy time and that much more energy must be devoted to discovering why lawlessness and anti-social behaviour are so rife in the 1980s? Does he agree that none of us should accept that this is some kind of inevitable, malign evolution and that deeper research is needed into the underlying causes?

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman is entirely right. The underlying factors must be much more profound. He is equally right to imply, however, that the difficulty of identifying and dealing with those factors in terms of basic social trends is likely to be such that we should be failing in our duty if we did not take such immediate practical measures as can be identified.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the Bradford incident was a tragedy of Aberfan proportions and casts a blight on the entire nation? Does he also accept, however, that the death of one person in a sad, shameful and barbaric episode at Birmingham City is just as sad for the family concerned? Does he agree that those incidents may be linked by mindless acts of hooliganism of the kind that may have occurred at Bradford and certainly occurred at Birmingham City? Is not one of the most important questions to be investigated that of why a national game is becoming a national disgrace?

In this context, is there not a vital part to be played by the magistrates who, week after week, deal with hooligans who have done their worst but often impose very small fines on them? Has not the time come to ask magistrates and judges to look upon the hooligans as the criminals that they are? Is not part of the problem that of ensuring that people have the will and spirit to enforce the law as it already exists?

Mr. Brittan: We must certainly encourage magistrates to use their powers to the full, and I have done that. I am also in touch with the police with a view to giving priority to the bringing of charges which would enable the courts to impose the correct penalties. To be fair to the magistrates, however, difficulty in obtaining evidence is an important part of the problem.

As for a national game becoming a national disgrace, I yield to no one in my disgust of and abhorrence for those who make that seem to be so. Nevertheless, for the vast majority of people, both players and spectators, the game is still a perfectly decent and honourable pursuit.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): May I draw the Home Secretary's attention to early-day motion 461, which calls for a reduction in the pools betting tax? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that Mr. Jack Dunnett, president of the Football League and a former Member of Parliament, has calculated that a reduction of 0·5 per cent. would bring in £1 million? May I also associate myself with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) as vice-chairman of Hartlepool United and point out that the chairman, Mr. John Smart, would very much like to replace the wooden stand? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware, however, that a reduction of a few percentage points in the betting levy would not compensate for the amount of work that needs to be done at football clubs? I welcome the inquiry at Bradford City, but does the Home Secretary agree that it is not inquiries but cash that is needed to improve the football grounds of this country?

Mr. Brittan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for drawing attention to the early-day motion, which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will not have failed to notice.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): May I endorse the comments of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) about the Football Association's recommendation for a perimeter fence around the Luton football ground? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that in the light of the recent trouble such a recommendation is nonsense, and will he ask the Football Association to withdraw its instruction?

Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there is some correlation between hooliganism and safety? Does he agree that, but for hooliganism, the doors would not have been locked, more fire extinguishers might have been available and there would be no need to fence pitches? Will he spare no effort in introducing measures to correct and deter the hooligans so that once again the game can be played and watched in peace?

Mr. Brittan: I agree with the latter part of my hon. Friend's question, but I shall not be asking the Football Association to withdraw its recommendation, because such recommendations are not absolute. The green guide makes it clear that the perimeter fence is desirable but that it must be considered in the context of security and safety as a whole, and in the context of arrangements for exits from the ground and for getting through the fence in times of emergency.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): The Home Secretary is right to emphasise, as he has done on previous occasions, the need to consider perimeter fences in the broader context of safety generally, but in seeking to extend crowd safety measures to third and fourth division grounds will he ensure that there is also proper examination of the first division grounds at Manchester and Liverpool, for example, where it takes a considerable time to clear the crowd at the end of the game in the normal way? Does he agree that in an emergency or in a disaster in which emergency services need to come in we must have a guarantee that that aspect has been adequately considered?

Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that, having put so much emphasis on control, there is now great concern about whether sufficient attention has been given to the crowd safety aspect?

Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman also agree——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be brief.

Mr. Lloyd: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Finally, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that all these investigations will be irrelevant unless sufficient money can be put back into the game to ensure that the necessary improvements are carried out?

Mr. Brittan: On the new point made by the hon. Gentleman, I entirely agree to the extent that it would be thoroughly wrong if the anxiety naturally being expressed about third and fourth division grounds and other non-designated grounds were to detract from the effort to ensure that proper arrangements operate at designated grounds.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Having had to deal with the no less terrible aftermath at Ibrox, may I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to take seriously the point made by the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) about problems of liaison between the Department of the Environment and the Home Office and local authorities? Will he also take seriously the question of money and consider whether arrangements can be made analogous with those in the racing industry?

Finally, is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that a number of police officers plunged into the fire to pull out fans who in other circumstances would have been pelting them with rocks? Is he aware that the police have had more than enough casualties as a result of football games and that they look to his new arrangements for public order to give a chief officer the power to ban a match if he believes that it would constitute a threat to public order?

Mr. Brittan: My hon. Friend has considerable experience in this area, having had to deal with the aftermath of the Ibrox disaster, and I note his comments.

As for relations between the two Departments and the football authorities, I think that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, who has responsibility for sport, would agree, as would the football authorities, that we try to keep in close touch. As for the public order review, I shall be announcing to the House very shortly the conclusions that I have reached, which certainly include recommendations relevant to football safety and security.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): This has been the most tragic football season that I can remember in more than 30 years as a regular football supporter. I welcome the Home Secretary's statement about designating third and fourth division grounds. Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that this will cost tens of millions of pounds and that, despite the grants available, it could force a number of professional football clubs out of business? Surely the right hon. and learned Gentleman has heard enough from the Opposition to realise that what is really needed is an inquiry into how to get more money into the game to carry out the necessary crowd and ground safety measures. Will the Home Secretary ask his hon. Friends to set up an inquiry into how to raise this additional finance? Will he investigate the possibility of soft loans or grants from the Government being made for ground improvements? Will he consider dropping VAT and police charges? These are all measures which could put money back into the game. That is sadly needed, because, in the end, money counts, not pious thoughts.

Mr. Brittan: I note the hon. Gentleman's suggestions. I am not disregarding them, but it is not just a question of money. The hon. Gentleman would be greatly mistaken if he denigrated or played down the valuable part that can be played in deciding exactly what is to be done. Certainly, money alone will not solve the hooliganism aspect.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Will my right hon. and learned Friend issue strict instructions to all football grounds, cinemas and all other places of entertainment that they should never again lock emergency exits? They should remind themselves that it does not matter if a few people come in without paying. What matters is that the majority of people who want to get out of the premises should be able to do so.

Mr. Brittan: The problem would not arise if the exits were manned. I note my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I speak as a life-long soccer supporter. I think that no hon. Member would cavil at the earnings of soccer players. Those who have followed the game for a number of years will note that violence on and off the field began when big bonuses were given for winning. Would it not be right to examine this aspect in the inquiry? Is it not worth considering imposing a levy on transfer fees, because high transfer fees add to the financial tensions in the game? That measure would be helpful.

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those further suggestions.

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): It is understandable that most of the questions have been concerned with the great tragedy at Bradford, but it would be unworthy of the House if hon. Members did not spend a little time on the serious law breaking at St. Andrew's on Saturday, which I witnessed. On that occasion, 96 policemen were injured and at least 1,500 people were on the pitch making a deliberate assault on the peace of the realm and the good order of our society — a serious situation which one never thought one would see in British sport. I therefore ask the Home Secretary to consider some matters arising from that incident.

The police were grossly outnumbered by between 600 and 700 law breakers on each side. The police deserve the highest praise for keeping the opposing armies apart and for preventing a general conflagration. We must ensure that two sets of sportsmen are never allowed again to create a situation——

Mr. Brittan: They were not sportsmen.

Mr. Howell: So-called sportsmen. Two separate and repeated baton charges by the police were required at both ends of the ground simultaneously over a period of 35 minutes. That was the extent of the disorder that occurred in Birmingham on Saturday, which I had the misfortune to witness, along with many other decent people, who were horribly sickened by it all.

Will the Home Secretary consider the concerted action by some of these league troublemakers, which was well planned and known in advance? There was excellent co-operation between the Leeds and the West Midlands police forces, but that was not enough to deal with the problem. We must ensure that, in such circumstances, people bent on disorder are not allowed to travel this country to break the law. I hope that the inquiry will take account of that point.

My right hon. Friends and I are concerned about the fact that there is to be only one inquiry. The Home Secretary is wrong to limit the terms of reference to the Bradford and Birmingham occurrences. [Interruption.] The terms of reference of the inquiry refer to Bradford City and Birmingham City football grounds, unless the terms have been changed since I received a copy. During the past two months there have been similar incidents on the Notts County, Luton and Chelsea grounds. Will the inquiry take all of those disorders into account, as it should, although they are not within its terms or reference?

The right hon. and learned Gentleman's statement did not refer to the Prime Minister's ministerial committee. I hope that that committee has not been superseded. How does the Home Secretary see the relationship between the two inquiries?

In view of the serious issues of law and order and public safety, how long will it be before Mr. Justice Popplewell reports? This is of the greatest importance if Mr. Justice Popplewell's recommendations, the implementation of which are bound to be costly, are to be put into effect in time for the beginning of the next football season.

Like the Scarman inquiry, will the Popplewell inquiry have available to it specialist advisers to consider the questions that need to be examined including how advance information and intelligence are obtained, the use to which they are put, how these incidents are exploited and how they can be prevented. Most importantly, will Mr. Justice Popplewell examine the deeper social significance of an occasion when so many hundreds of people go to a game bent on trouble? Will he consider why these difficulties persist in arising in our society?

Will the Government again look at the Chester committee's report, which recommended the creation of a football levy board? This is essential. The Home Secretary has said that the trust provides 75 per cent. of the cost of designation, but that is inadequate in view of the cost of the major structural alterations that will be required.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to perimeter fencing. There is a dilemma between ensuring that those whom one does not want to be on the pitch are kept off and allowing thousands of people to use the pitch in an emergency as the only reasonable point of evacuation. Some of the gates in some perimeter fences do not match the requirements. The right hon. and learned Gentleman probably realises that and will do something about it.

Finally——[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Howell: These are very important matters of law and order. They are distinct from questions of safety, and they justify our view that there should have been two statements.

Finally, will the Home Secretary convey our concern to the football authorities? Will he ask them to consider whether, where necessary, the kick-off for important matches should be in the morning, and whether clubs whose travelling supporters have bad records should have all-ticket away matches? Most importantly, will he ensure that the licences are withdrawn from those proprietors of minibuses and coaches carrying football supporters who are seen—I understand that this happened on Saturday —to stop at supermarkets and pubs to load up with drinks?

Mr. Brittan: The right hon. Gentleman will be aware of the announcement that has been made about the Government's notices of intentions.

I take note of what the right hon. Gentleman said about the Chester committee's recommendations.

The most significant points made by the right hon. Gentleman relates to the events at Birmingham. He was right to draw attention in a very vivid way, in his accurate account of events, to the magnitude and horror of what occurred there.

As for the right hon. Gentleman's comments on the announcement, if he has time to look more closely at my statement he will see that the terms of reference of the inquiry are wider than he perhaps realised. Although the inquiry is invited to consider matters with particular reference to the events at Bradford City and Birmingham, that is not all that it is entitled to do. It is invited to look at the matter very much more broadly.

[Mr. Brittan]

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the inquiry having technical assistance. At a later stage in my statement I said:

"I shall arrange for the chairman to be assisted by appropriately qualified assessors . . . and to have available such technical advice and support as he requires."

As for the relationship between this inquiry and the measures agreed between the football authorities and the Government at No. 10 Downing street, I stressed towards the conclusion of my statement that the measures announced were

"additional to those announced on 1 April after the meeting at No. 10 Downing street with the football authorities" and that the programme of measures agreed there must go ahead with renewed urgency.

British Aerospace

4.51 pm

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the outcome of the joint offer of shares in British Aerospace by the Government and the company.

Approximately 264,000 applications were received from the general public, excluding institutional priority applications, for a total of approximately 790 million ordinary shares.

Preferential applications were received from shareholders for approximately 23 million shares and from employees for approximately 3 million shares. All such valid applications will be allocated in full.

Valid applications from the general public for up to 20,000 shares will be allocated a minimum of 100 shares and a maximum of 275 shares, depending on the number of shares applied for. No allocation will be made in respect of public applications for more than 20,000 shares. On this basis, allocations will be made to some 260,000 applicants for a total of some 40 million shares.

As announced on 1 May, approximately 80·8 million shares, 55 per cent. of the total offered shares, have been allocated to institutional priority applicants.

It is expected that dealings in renounceable letters of acceptance in respect of the offered shares will commence tomorrow.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): Why is the language of the Minister's statement so contorted and convoluted that it is not possible to discover from it the amount that was raised in the sale? Was not the amount £550 million, and did not 55 per cent. of that go to the preferential institutions, with apparently only 2 per cent. finding its way to the employees, despite the Government's often-professed intention that shares should go to employees?

Are the Government somehow ashamed to reveal the total amount raised in the sale because of the increasing public perception that this is an exercise in selling off the furniture to pay the rent—that the money goes into the maw of the Treasury and is squandered by the Government while the public lose the prospect of future profits from a shareholding?

Have not the Government yet realised that they have finally betrayed the promise which they gave the House of Commons during the passage of the legislation that they would retain 25 per cent. of the shareholding?

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Tebbit): Not again.

Mr. Smith: The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry shakes his head and says, "Not again." It is not surprising that the House of Commons should remind Ministers about their breaches of promises to the House. We shall continue to remind the Government that they gave a solemn undertaking to retain 25 per cent. of the shareholding to preserve the British national interest and that they have evacuated and abandoned that commitment.

Mr. Pattie: On that last point, the right hon. and learned Gentleman asked a similar question on 1 May. The answer that he was given then, he will not be surprised to know, has not changed since. The undertaking given by the Government in 1981 was to safeguard the national interest. That has been done by the special share, the details of which are set out clearly in the prospectus, which I invited the right hon. and learned Gentleman to read. He seems to be seizing with some delight on the number of employees who have applied. I should have thought that 3 million shares applied for by the employees was a pretty satisfactory return.

I can tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman that 250,000 people have applied for shares—as well as the 89 per cent. take-up by existing shareholders—which is an indication of the confidence of people in the company. That is what it is all about.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this is a private Members' day. I shall call all those hon. Members who have been seeking to catch my eye, but I ask them to put their questions as briefly as possible.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): Is my hon. Friend aware that there is considerable anxiety among those of my constituents who are employed at the British Aerospace division at Warton about job prospects and particularly about the future of the proposed European fighter aircraft? Is he able to say at this stage what he anticipates will be the effect of the sale of the Government's residual shareholding on job security at Warton and also upon the international negotiations that are taking place about the future of the European fighter aircraft?

Mr. Pattie: The sale which has been announced today will not adversely affect the job prospects of his constituents, about which he is rightly concerned.

I do not think that the specific outcome of forthcoming negotiations arise from my statement today.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Minister give the House a guarantee that no shares have been sold to foreign nationals, say, Libyan, Argentine or those of any of the other countries that have been involved in disagreements with British nationals during the course of, say, the past two or three decades?

Mr. Pattie: If the hon. Gentleman is asking me whether the nationals of any countries that he likes to name have bought shares, obviously I cannot give any such guarantee. If they are free to deal on the stock market, they are free to buy shares. The national interest is wholly safeguarded by the special share and also by the references to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission which are built in.

Mr. Timothy Wood (Stevenage): I congratulate my hon. Friend because I, with 9,000 British Aerospace employees, am delighted that the share sale has been such a success and, furthermore, that we have 260,000 shareholders now taking an interest in the company. I believe that that is excellent for the future of British Aerospace.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): We all owned it before.

Mr. Pattie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will my hon. Friend say how many employees have shares and what proportion they represent of the total labour force? Will he also say a little more about the basis of allocations? If someone applies for 2,000, 1,000 or 500 shares, how many will he get?

Mr. Pattie: About 2,500 members of the work force have applied for the approximately 3 million shares. That figures relates to a total work force of, say, 70,000 in round figures.

My hon. Friend asked me for the share allocation basis. Those applying for between 100 and 200 shares will have 100 shares allocated to them. Those applying for between 300 and 500 will receive 125. Those applying for between 600 and 700 will get 150. Those applying for between 800 and 900 will get 175. Those applying for between 1,000 and 1,900 will get 200. Those applying for between 2,000 and 3,800 will get 225. Those applying for between 4,000 and 9,500 will get 250. Those applying for between 10,000 and 20,000 will get 275. Those applying for more than 20,000 have had their allocations and applications rejected.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Will the Minister be taking any steps to monitor what happens to the shares after British Aerospace employees have them, to make sure that the Government's original aim is still being maintained? Does he think that many of them will want to make a quick profit, which is what his friends in the City will be doing?

Mr. Pattie: Not if the experience of British Telecom is followed. No doubt the hon. Gentleman would like to see that happen. To the best of our knowledge, 1·7 million individual shareholders have still retained their shareholding in that company.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) rose——

Mr. Corbett rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether both hon. Gentlemen were here when I said that I would not call any hon. Member who had not been standing. However, I shall call the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith).

Mr. Beith: As the share allotment was the only new information in the statement, will the Minister accept some congratulation that he so geared the allotment that small shareholders will get shares, and some large shareholders will get none?

Mr. Pattie: That was the Government's deliberate intention, as we wish to encourage wider share ownership.

Mr. Corbett rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must move on.

Board and Lodging Allowance

5.1 pm

Mr. Stan Thorne (Preston): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the problems of the young unemployed caused by statutory instrument No. 613, which has been effective since 29 April."

The problems of the young unemployed who rely on lodging allowance have been made acute by this statutory instrument. It is estimated that between 50,000 and 85,000 people nationally will be rendered homeless by this measure. Some young unemployed will be reduced to squatting, to living rough or to moving from place to place. This is yet another serious social problem directly arising from the Government's action in cutting benefits to the needy. The north Lancashire synod of the Methodist Church, for example, has passed an urgent resolution calling on the Government to rescind or modify these new social security measures.

Such measures jeopardise young people's right to vote, as it becomes increasingly difficult for them to register. It adversely affects their right to register with a doctor. Besides the 50,000 to 85,000 who may be affected by this measure, 100,000 people between the ages of 26 and 65 who are unemployed and in receipt of lodging allowance may also be affected and rendered homeless.

When this subject was debated early in April, the Minister replying to the debate said that there was a possibility that he would reappraise the measures contained in statutory instrument No. 613, which has now been issued. I urge you, Mr. Speaker, to permit this debate as a matter of urgency, because many young people will be affected within the next two or three weeks. In my area, young people have four weeks since 29 April, after which they will be ejected from their lodgings and become homeless. Therefore, this is an urgent problem from north to south of the British Isles.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the problems of the young unemployed cause by statutory instrument No. 613, which has been effective since 29 April."

As the hon. Member knows, the decision that I have to take is whether this matter should have precedence over the business set down for today or tomorrow. I have listened to what he has said, but I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and, therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Civil Liberties

5.3 pm

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): I beg to move,

That this House strongly endorses the need to protect the essential rights and liberties of the individual citizen, while recognising the vital need to preserve order and stability in our society.

Mr. Speaker: As we have a late start and six Back-Bench Members have asked to take part in the debate, and there may be others, I ask for short speeches in the hope that nobody will be disappointed.

Mr. Ottaway: There is nothing new about the House debating civil liberties, and I do not move the motion in a pioneering sense. Since the days of Magna Carta, which protected Parliament from the King, and the Bill of Rights, which ensured that barons were tried by barons, there have been many advocates of civil liberties and human rights. In the post-war years of the Attlee Government, British support for the European convention on human rights was backed by such eminent Members as Sir Winston Churchill and Lord Stockton from my party, and Ernest Bevin and Lord Layton from the Opposition parties.

In the 1960s, there was much pressure for the right of individual petition to the European Court of Human Rights and, latterly, alliance Members have moved ten-minute Bills in support of incorporation of the European convention into British law. Throughout this period there has been a keen awareness of the need to ensure that legislation recognises the individual's rights and liberties. Accordingly, although the House has not debated the subject for some time, I do not feel that I am trail blazing.

My interest in moving a motion such as this was sparked off by an event that, in many senses, has had a far-reaching impact on civil liberties, and has rent the civil liberties movement asunder. I refer to the coal strike, which has had so much impact on my constituency, which forms part of the Nottinghamshire coalfield. I have in my constituency Babbington colliery, which is one of the oldest mines in the country. Like all other pits in the Nottinghamshire coalfield, it continued to work throughout the strike. The House is aware of the scenes that characterised the dispute, and Babbington colliery was not spared. On two occasions, large numbers of pickets appeared at the front gate, and their behaviour was such that one was led to believe that the object of the exercise was to prevent miners from getting to their place of work.

On the first occasion it is estimated that some 2,000 pickets turned up, split themselves into two groups and then made co-ordinated charges at the police at the gate. At first, there were about 40 policemen, who were rapidly reinforced. In spite of the pickets' efforts, approximately two thirds of the men made it into the pit, largely thanks to the police, who were able to impose control and protect my constituents' right to work. Subsequent discussions with my constituents showed that many of them were most concerned not only about their safety but about that of the police.

On the second occasion, the police, in anticipation, had set up a checkpoint on the M1 about half a mile from the mine. However, the pickets circumvented it by abandoning their cars on the hard shoulder of the motorway and walking across the fields to the pits. Such scenes, with large numbers of pickets turning up obviously intent on preventing working miners getting to the pit, were common throughout the Nottinghamshire coalfield. Large numbers of policemen were present to help maintain law and order and to apprehend those whom they believed were breaching law and order.

The stories of violence by pickets throughout the dispute are legion and are recorded in the document "The Miners' Dispute: A Catalogue of Violence." Likewise, complaints of police excesses have been recorded, and I am prepared to believe witnesses recording violent police behaviour. While everyone will support a picket's right peacefully to express his point of view, and the policeman's duty to maintain law and order if he does not, in such an explosively charged atmosphere as there was in the coal strike, it was inevitable that some people on both sides should have gone over the top.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): Will the hon. Gentleman include in his speech protests not about individual police excesses but about the police policy, to which he has referred, of setting up road blocks? Those policies included preventing people from peacefully going about the country — for example, miners were turned back at the Dartford tunnel. Will the hon. Gentleman address himself to that problem, or only to the other side?

Mr. Ottaway: I do not intend to address that particular point, but I am prepared to be even-handed about the policing of the miners' strike. If the hon. Lady had been listening a moment ago, she would have heard me say that there were excesses on both sides, and it came as no surprise to anyone when both sides went over the top.

In view of reported excesses both by the striking miners and the police, it can have come as no surprise to anyone when the National Council for Civil Liberties set up an independent national inquiry into the civil liberties aspect of the dispute. The interim report of that inquiry has much divided the civil liberties movement. My personal opinion is that the report is independent and fair-minded. Although anyone with any political antennae will seek to argue some points on it, I think that most people will agree that it is even-handed in its approach.

Let me refer to that report. I believe that anyone who has any concern for civil liberties will agree with the statement:

"protection from violence and fear of violence is a fundamental civil liberty principle which has been extensively violated during this dispute."

In reviewing that principle, the report is quick to condemn violence on the picket lines, to which I have referred, as well as excessive police action, for example:

"rampaging groups of police officers have run through mining villages, bursting into houses in pursuit of pickets, causing extensive damage to property and assaulting residents."

If that is true, I am sure that hon. Members of whatever party will condemn such acts.

While such incidents are a matter for deep concern, they have not caused the rift in the civil liberties movement. It has been caused by the so-called clash between collective and individual rights. The report states:

"It is a fundamental yardstick of freedom that workers may choose to participate in peaceful collective action, including the withdrawal of labour, to protect their interests."

That is the collective argument. However, what has caused all the trouble is what seems to me to be the perfectly reasonable statement:

"We accept that freedom not to take part in a strike is as much a fundamental right as the right to strike."

That short but immensely important statement has caused much controversy. During the summer of 1984 anyone living in Nottinghamshire was keenly aware of the importance of both rights. Miners could go on strike if they wanted. There were striking miners in Nottinghamshire, and their views were respected. Alternatively, they could choose to go to work if they wanted. No one thought that those two opposite points of view were exclusive. Anyone who cares about civil liberties should be able to accept that the two rights can exist together.

Accordingly, it came as a surprise to me to hear that the NCCL which, after all, had commissioned the report, was unable to accept the premise that the right not to strike was as fundamental as the right to strike. As I understand the argument, it is suggested that the right not to strike weakens the effectiveness of the right to strike and the realisation of its objectives. To me, that is completely to misinterpret the role of the human rights movement. Those people are saying that power is more important than the right. I cannot accept that.

The same annual general meeting of the NCCL reaffirmed its existing policy not to give advice on civil liberties to the National Front. It should come as no surprise to anyone that a group such as the National Front, on the extreme wing of politics, should find itself in that situation. To paraphrase an extract from one of Bernard Levin's columns in The Times, he suggested that it would not be the local flower-arranging group that would seek advice, and summed up the principle by saying:

"Free speech is for bastards too."

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ottaway: No.

The trouble now is that any bastard who comes along to the NCCL for advice will find a notice on the door saying, "No bastards need apply."

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ottaway: No.

That approach to civil liberties, whether by the NCCL or any other group, is selective and fails the fundamental test of a bona fide civil liberties organisation, in that it is not prepared to support the rights of those whose views it finds unpalatable. The philosophy behind the present position of the NCCL seems to be a split between collective and individual rights and liberties, with the view that collective rights should override any individual rights.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I follow the hon. Gentleman's reasoning, but he is making a mistake that has been made in some press reports. To be fair to the debate, he has not got the argument right and needs to clarify it. First, on the issue of striking, the objection was on equating the two rights as fundamental rights, whereas the mover of the NCCL motion said that the right to go to work without fear of intimidation or violence was a right to be protected. The second issue concerns advice. The NCCL would happily give advice to an individual member of the National Front, but not to the organisation itself. If the hon. Gentleman does not accept that, he is in difficulty, for example, in dealing with whether he would have given advice to the Nazi party in Germany. Judging by his understanding and interpretation of the argument, I believe that he could have done so. The example would apply equally to the IRA.

Mr. Ottaway: If I were in a civil liberties movement, I would give advice to anyone who came to me.

Mr. Soley: To an organisation or an individual?

Mr. Ottaway: I would be prepared to give advice to an organisation or an individual.

I regret to say that that attitude reflects the Soviet attitude to civil liberties. In any aspect of Soviet life, whether political, social or economic, all those areas are run by committees, and all the decisions that are made are collective. The system has an in-built preference for collective rights over individual rights when they conflict. That is an abhorrent approach to civil liberties. The concept is alien to Western democracies, particularly in this country with its strong tradition of protection of the rights of the individual. In our society there is no place for that point of view. While I am not for a moment suggesting that there is any link between the Soviet Union and the NCCL, I believe that is is sad that the organisation should adopt such an attitude as its policy. In that context, it is worth noting that the American Civil Liberties Union is prepared to back the right of free speech for everyone, no matter how unpalatable their views.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): Is it not worth noting that the National Union of Mineworkers, which used to be a democratic union, with the right to a ballot before either a local or a national strike, is now proposing to change its rules so that the national executive committee —in other words, the spokesmen of the collective—will be able to call out any member and all members on strike as and when it pleases, without calling a ballot?

Mr. Ottaway: My hon. and learned Friend is right. That is a typical example of the collective view conflicting with an individual right and seeking to dominate it.

Ms. Harman: The hon. Gentleman has just applauded the stand of the ACLU which, I agree, is a formidable and good organisation. However, will he say specifically whether he thinks that it was right, during the McCarthy —Communist purges, that the ACLU did not stand up for Communists? Would he do the same in similar circumstances?

Mr. Ottaway: The ACLU did not stand up for Communists. I condemn that, and would do so in similar circumstances.

There is another aspect of this sorry tale. A little over a year ago, the NCCL celebrated its 50th anniversary. Its admirable then general secretary, Mr. Larry Gostin, publicly sought to expand the political profile of the NCCL, launching a liberty campaign and publishing an NCCL charter of national civil rights and liberties, which was signed by some 1,500 leading men and women from all walks of life. The question must be put to all those signatories, who include the leaders of the Social Democratic party and the Liberal party, and the Leader of the Opposition: can they continue to support an organisation with such a lopsided approach to civil liberties? No doubt those people will argue that they were merely signatories to a charter, the wording of which no one could disagree with. However, that is not the point. It was described as the NCCL's charter, and the NCCL has chosen to interpret it in such a way that the right not to strike is excluded. To be fair to the leader of the Social Democratic party and certain members of the Liberal party, they have been critical of the position taken up by the NCCL, but they continue to support it and seem to say that they will endeavour to bring about a reform from within, despite the comment by Mr. Gostin that there was little prospect of that in the immediate future. To date, little has been heard from the other signatories.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Does he not realise the essential difference between a political party, for example, and an organisation such as the NCCL, in which people can continue to be members and attempt to change policies? Does he agree that his implicit criticism of people who are remaining within NCCL is entirely unfair and unjustified?

Mr. Ottaway: I would accept that point of view if it were not the fact that the outgoing general secretary thought that there was little prospect of immediate reform from within.

Mr. Carlile: But is that correct?

Mr. Ottaway: Mr. Gostin is well placed to see what is going on.

However, what is possibly even more alarming is the fact that a former general secretary of the NCCL, and a current member of the executive, is personal adviser to the Leader of the Opposition. In view of the fact that she believes that the right of the working miner not to strike is less fundamental than the right to strike, several million people who live in the working coalfield areas will be looking forward to hearing from the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) whether the Labour party agrees or disagrees with that point of view.

It is regrettable that there is a clear political split on this important issue. Civil liberties is a topic which needs to be treated on an all-party basis. If civil liberties are to be respected, fundamental rights must be supported and any political gulf between the parties over fundamental rights must be bridged. It is worth mentioning that Justice, an equally important civil rights movement with a much lower profile than the NCCL, has as part of its constitution a requirement that members of all three major parties should make up the executive. That is a sensible approach that gives much credibility to Justice.

Mr. Soley: I asked the hon. Gentleman to clarify an important issue. He has said again that the right to strike and the right not to strike, or to strike break, are both fundamental. He is implying that there is a right to work. If the right to work is to be maintained, leaving aside the 4 million unemployed, will he give full support to a group of workers who decide to enter their place of work if the management, for whatever reason, has chosen to lock them out?

Mr. Ottaway: That must depend upon the circumstances. I do not think that a right can be qualified. In the example that the hon. Gentleman has given, I do not say that the group of workers have a right, but one which is not quite as important as the right to strike. That is what was said at Nottingham during the miners' strike. We must not try to contrast a not-quite-so-important right with an important right.

I was saying that the executive of Justice has all-party representation. I welcome the formation of an all-party group for civil liberties and congratulate all those who worked for its inception.

Individual liberties are enshrined in the unwritten common law and statutes as interpreted by the courts of England. It is becoming more and more apparent that the common law, on its own, is not a comprehensive safeguard of individual rights and liberties. The growing evidence of this is the increasing number of cases that are found to be admissible by the European Court and the many cases in which the United Kingdom is found to be in breach of the convention compared with other countries.

There have been tremendous developments in English law in recent years. We have seen especially the development of the process of judicial review, which examines the rights of the individual when confronted with authority. From time to time, common law needs assistance from statute law. The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Race Relations Acts 1976 are two examples. Without these Acts, the common law would be entirely inadequate to deal with the issues to which they are directed. It was necessary to adjust the balance by introducing legislation.

Britain desperately needs a Bill of Rights. I support the call for the European convention on human rights to be incorporated into our legal system. It is not a perfect statement of rights, as it was drafted about 35 years ago. It is ironic that it lacks any express reference to the freedom of passage and the right to work, although such rights can be construed from it. However, it would be politically impossible to achieve consensus on anything other than the European convention. Accordingly, if there is to be any prospect of the incorporation of a Bill of Rights into our legislation it must be the European convention.

We have shown a marked reluctance to incorporate a Bill of Rights. After all, it took 15 years to establish the right of the individual to petition to the European Court. Despite a number of attempts to have the convention incorporated into our legal system, little progress has been made.

It is especially ironic that as the "wind of change" swept across Africa, one by one the Commonwealth countries, as they gained their independence, adopted the European convention on the advice of United Kingdom Governments. It began with Nigeria in 1958, and the convention, as incorporated into the Nigerian constitution, became the model for the "fundamental rights" which are to be found in the great majority of independent Commonwealth countries. In this way, the convention has been transplanted by Westminster legislation into the national laws of more countries and territories than are party to it.

There are many good reasons for the incorporation of the convention. As I have demonstrated, there is a substantial body of very learned opinion which believes that the common law has developed as far as it can go and has been found to be lacking on many occasions, the remedy having to be found in the European Court. The court has played an important role in developing and protecting human rights in Britain, from a prisoner's right of access to a lawyer to enabling The Sunday Times to publish its report on behalf of the disabled children in the Thalidomide tragedy. In this Session alone, two Bills have been introduced as a direct result of decisions of the European Court. These are the new regulations on telephone tapping and the new restrictions on corporal punishment in schools.

As the convention is not incorporated into our law, one practical effect is that a judgment of the European Court cannot be referred to by British judges or relied upon in their interpretation of statutes and civil liberties. This deprives the judges of the power and responsibility of protecting civil rights. If the convention were incorporated into our legislation, a body of case law would be built up to which judges could refer, and those with a grievance could obtain a remedy from the High Court without undue difficulty.

No one should be under any illusion that it is an easy matter to have his rights reviewed by the European Court. A reference to the court cannot be made until all remedies in the United Kingdom have been exhausted, which normally means that a petitioner has to go through the High Court, the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords before he has a chance to take the matter to Europe. Apart from the fact that it will probably take him up to eight years to get there, he will probably bankrupt himself in the process of funding the action through the courts. If he then decides to take the plunge and goes on to Europe, he will not qualify for legal aid as it is not part of our judicial system. Therefore, those who find no remedy in our courts will have to suffer if they do not have the resources to go to Europe.

Let us suppose that a prisoner feels that his right of privacy has been infringed by a prison officer having opened his mail before he gets it. Leaving aside whether that is a good or bad idea, the prisoner has no remedy in this country as there is no right of privacy. His only prospect of remedy is to take the matter to Strasbourg, and the chances are that he will be released from prison before the European Court is able to make a ruling. It is taking eight years to make a ruling. If the European convention were incorporated in our own law, it would be relatively simple for the prisoner to make an application to the High Court for his grievance to be aired.

The introduction of a statutory Bill of Rights to Britain will almost certainly stop civil liberties from becoming a political football. A classic example is the reference to the European Court of the GCHQ decision, which is clouded in political controversy. Another example is the three British Rail employees, Young, James and Webster, who established at the European Court the right not to join a trade union, a case which is still not recognised by the NCCL.

It is worth considering whether the existence of the European convention would have made any difference to the miners' strike. This is currently a matter of some discussion by academics, but there would seem to be a general feeling that the Kent miners would have had a good case to take to the court over the road block at the entrance to the Dartford tunnel. Likewise the working miner would have had a much clearer established freedom of association — a right which is lacking in common law.

A Bill of Rights would be a pillar in our midst with which the young would grow up. The establishment of the right would no longer be the subject of a political argument and sectarianism would be removed from our society. The rights of the individual are paramount and they will receive support from all quarters of the House. The current debate over collective and individual rights is most disturbing and a fundamental advance in individual rights and liberties would be the incorporation of a Bill of Rights into our legislation. That would go a long way towards ensuring that the rights of the individual do not become subservient to collective rights.

I recommend the motion and urge hon. Members to support it.

5.29 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I am grateful to you for calling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to participate in this debate. I speak not only as a Member of this House but as a new member of the executive committee of the NCCL.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) has given us the benefit of a speech which fell into two distinct parts. The second part was a constructive exposition of some of the reasons why we need a Bill of Rights. That view has been expressed in various Bills, most recently in a Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan).

On the first part of the speech of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North, I agree with some of his remarks about the National Council for Civil Liberties. In particular, I deprecate the decision taken by the annual general meeting in connection with the right of working miners to go to work. However, the decision was to some extent blown out of proportion by the press, which failed to understand that the debate at the annual general meeting was a serious, legitimate, intellectual debate about the difference between group rights and individual rights. Although Conservative Members may laugh and scoff at the proposition that there can be an intellectual discussion of those issues, whether or not one agrees with the conclusion, there can be such a discussion.

The hon. Gentleman, perhaps inadvertently, said that in his view there was no place in our society for the view that the group right to strike outweighed the individual right to work. Those words were not worthy of him. Although we may disagree with the point of view of which he complained, it can respectably be held and argued.

Mr. Ottaway rose——

Mr. Carlile: I shall not give way now.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that on 3 May, at the first executive committee meeting after the annual general meeting, the executive committee passed a resolution regretting the resignation of the members of the inquiry into the policing of the miners' dispute, and endorsing the annual general meeting's decision to endorse the independence of the inquiry and most of the conclusions of the inquiry's interim report. Before the hon. Gentleman seeks to pour too much scorn on the NCCL — it is important to distinguish between legitimate criticism and unnecessary scorn, as the former is justified and the latter is not—I remind him that at that executive committee meeting, in which I participated, the executive committee also declared:

"The NCCL will continue to act as the guardian of Civil Liberties, independent of any political or industrial lobby, or faction."

"It must not be seen as the mouthpiece either of the trade unions or of those who oppose them . . . This Executive Committee reaffirms its absolute commitment to the defence of the civil liberties of all citizens, irrespective of their individual political beliefs."

It is also important to reinforce the point made earlier by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), that at the annual general meeting the organisation reaffirmed its commitment to advise individuals of their rights, whatever political views they held and whatever the political organisations of which they were members.

As a member of the NCCL and its executive, my view is that the organisation should be prepared to advise organisations as well as individuals of their civil rights, even if it does not agree with their political views. I also believe that at the annual general meeting the NCCL took a disproportionate view of group rights as opposed to individual rights. That disproportionate view contradicts article 11, paragraph 1, of the European convention on human rights, which affirms the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and freedom of association with others. That covers the right to go to work, even if there is a strike at one's place of work.

When one considers the controversies about the NCCL's annual general meeting — some of us are anxious to redeem the organisation of those controversies —it is important to remember that they represent only a small part of what was discussed. It is right to bear in mind that over 95 per cent. of the day-to-day work of the NCCL is not in the realms of the miners' strike and the National Front, but in the excellent work of advising ordinary citizens or groups of citizens who feel that their civil rights have been aggrieved.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree that the resignation of Mr. Gostin and those who are looking into the miners' strike is ample justification for the deep-seated criticism of the NCCL by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) which, in my extensive experience, has never been interested in looking after the interests of people who wish to work when there has been a strike?

Mr. Carlile: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the resignations of Larry Gostin and the committee of inquiry gave rise to legitimate criticism of the NCCL. I have sought to make it clear that I agree with much of the criticism and the views expressed. However, it appears that already there has been some recognition, through the resolutions of the executive, that mistakes have been made. That is why I remain, at least for the present, a member of the executive and of the NCCL. I have not referred to all the other resolutions passed, but I commend them to Conservative Members.

Although Mr. Gostin's resignation is regrettable, it is important to remember that he remains a member of the organisation. His position became untenable because he was an employee, unlike, for example, a member of the executive or any other member of the NCCL. He was contractually bound to carry out the policies of the annual general meeting, and he was not in a position to change them, or, at least, his position made it extremely difficult for him to change them. Those of us who are not contractually obliged to the NCCL bear in mind that it is not a political party, but an organisation consisting of groups and individuals. The majority of members of the NCCL believe in the all-party approach—the across-the-board approach — to which the hon. Member for Nottingham, North rightly referred.

The re-establishment of the all-party civil liberties group was an important step in that direction. The press has, to a great extent, misunderstood the status of the all-party civil liberties group, because Larry Gostin, then of the NCCL, helped to re-establish it. Certainly one should give him the credit of being highly influential in its re-establishment. As a result it has been assumed that there is a formal relationship between that group and the NCCL, but hon. Members will know that there is none. The group will, from time to time, undoubtedly be valuably served by the extremely good briefings which the NCCL is in the habit of providing to hon. Members of all parties. It is to be hoped that the group will continue, as appears to be the case, on an all-party basis.

The second part of the speech of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North was far more constructive, and was the more important part of the debate. Not only the hon. Gentleman, but—I hope that he will forgive me for this —some of his as yet even more distinguished colleagues have expressed similar views in the past. In a celebrated Dimbleby lecture, the present Lord Chancellor expressed the opinion that the Houses of Parliament were no longer able to provide satisfactory or adequate safeguards for the fundamental liberties of the individual. As all right hon. and hon. Members know, the simple reason for that is that our work in the House is too great in volume and too complex in detail for hon. Members to be able to look day-by-day at breaches of possibly important and, indeed, fundamental civil rights, which may have occurred as a result of unfortunate excesses by the police, local authorities, the Civil Service or other public bodies.

That view had been expressed before by many others. Not least, it had been said in strong terms in a pamphlet, published by the Conservative Political Centre, by the present Secretary of State for Education and Science. He had come to similar conclusions over 10 years ago on the same basis—that Parliament could no longer safeguard the liberties of the individual. The Liberal party and my hon. Friends in the Social Democratic party have long expressed similar views. Indeed, Lord Wade has a distinguished record of propounding that view, as have my hon. Friends the Members for Caithness and Sutherland and for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). The roll of honour goes across party lines on to the more independent Benches. That most distinguished of judges and constitutional lawyers, Lord Scarman, has expressed a similar view on many occasions.

The problem is that the only remedy that is realistically available at present to the citizen who feels that his fundamental liberties have been interfered with is an application for judicial review. The procedure has improved in recent months, so that it is now easier to apply for judicial review and quicker to have an application heard. However, the procedure is expensive and risky, and it involves going to the High Court. Many of those who have been wronged are people who may find the prospect of applying to the High Court for judicial review somewhat intimidating. It is right to say that the judges have been pushing out the boundaries of judicial review. Because of the liberal judicial interpretation that has extended the range of circumstances in which judicial review can be applied for, it has become more possible for the citizen to obtain redress. However, it is a lengthy, expensive and intimidating procedure.

It is right to remind the House that not only have distinguished members of the Conservative party and the alliance supported my views, but that similar views have been expressed from time to time by members of the Labour party. However, it would be pleasing if one could hear an unequivocal commitment from the Labour Front Bench to a Bill of Rights. If one examines the Cabinet papers of the Labour Government during that crucial period between 1945 and 1950, when the European convention on human rights was ratified—this is clearly set out in a distinguished article in the 1983 volume of the journal Public Law by Anthony Lester QC—one sees that that Government, and especially the then Lord Chancellor, Lord Jowitt, did not have a good relationship with the convention. Perhaps I am oversimplifying, but it seems to me that, before the Labour Government eventually agreed to ratify the convention, some Labour members believed that if one paid too much attention to the convention, and certainly if it was incorporated into domestic law, there would be a severe risk of a Socialist Government losing control over a corporate state. If that is still the view of the Labour party—and I hope it is not—it will give our citizens considerable cause for concern.

The great advantage of the incorporation of the European convention——

Mr. Lyell: The hon. and learned Gentleman posed a question of great interest, and I saw the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), the Opposition Front Bench spokesman, shake his head. But the question is ambivalent. What the hon. and learned Gentleman should have asked, and what must be clarified, is whether the Labour party believes that it can still run a corporate state despite the European convention, or whether it is prepared to accept the European convention on its merits.

Mr. Carlile: I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman for posing the question in that way, and I should be happy to hear an answer to it. I note that we shall get one in due course from the hon. Member for Hammersmith, who I am sure will give us a full answer.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does my hon. and learned Friend accept that the Labour party has been ambivalent about this, but that some distinguished members of the Labour party support it? They include, notably, Lord Gardiner, the former Lord Chancellor, who wrote a letter to The Times in support of my Bill proposing the incorporation of the convention, and the sponsor of the Bill, the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) who, from his experience, especially in Northern Ireland, recognised the value of incorporation.

Mr. Carlile: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I accept what he says. He reminds me of those two distinguished names on what I have already called the roll of honour, and I hope that their considered approach will permeate through to the entire Labour Front Bench.

Some parts of the European convention on human rights can be criticised as weak and somewhat wishy-washy. Indeed, article 8, which was debated at some length when we dealt with the Interception of Communications Bill, is weak and is affected—or infected—by having been prepared in the nervousness of the immediate post-war years. However, I agree with the hon. Member for Nottingham, North that if consensus were obtained on a Bill of Rights, it would probably be obtained only on the European convention. It is detailed and tested, and it is certainly better than having no constitution at all.

If incorporated into our domestic law, I hope that it would mean that if a citizen believed that his fundamental human rights had been interfered with, he could go to a summary court—the local county court, where a hearing can be obtained quickly nowadays—for a declaration that his rights had been interfered with, and for other appropriate remedies, such as an injunction and damages. That would cut out all the nonsense and expense of having to plough through the system of High Court pleadings and proceedings before finally obtaining a contested hearing in the High Court as to whether there had been a breach of fundamental rights.

Another important reason for a Bill of Rights is that we are living in such a complicated society—much more complicated even than that of the late 1940s, when the convention was drafted—so that it is much more difficult for the citizen to know what his fundamental rights are. Indeed, I suspect that each of us from time to time is approached in his constituency surgery by someone who says, "But it is my right." Whether one be an expert constitutional lawyer or not, one cannot answer yes or no, because we have little understanding of what those "It is my right" rights are. It is important to define them as far as possible.

Mr . Lyell: This is a most fascinating subject. Before we charge too rapidly in the direction of incorporation, is it not right to remember, as the hon. and learned Gentleman said, that the European convention has many faults, many wishy-washy aspects and obscurities, and that we have no opportunity now, or even if we incorporated it, to change it?

Mr. Carlile: The debate could develop into an interesting colloquy between myself and the hon. and learned Gentleman, but I have already spoken at length and I do not want that to happen.

At the moment we have no Bill of Rights worth the name. We need one, and the European convention provides a good basis from which our Bill of Rights could be drafted.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Nottingham, North, whom I criticised a few moments ago, on his luck in obtaining this debate and his good sense in choosing the subject of the debate. I hope that most of the rest of the debate will concentrate upon the constructive rather than the destructive parts of his speech.

5.50 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): The more time I spend in politics, the less certain I become about what other politicians tell me is certain. Usually there is an element of truth in what both sides say. But, no matter, because most of the great evils perpetrated in history have been caused by convinced adherents of a specific ideology or "ism". Those of us travelling hopefully on the road towards an elusive truth are usually driving too slowly and have our eyes too closely on the road to kill anyone.

For me, the only certainty in politics is that just as the individual can only find his individual salvation from within himself, so the principal aim of political organisation and thought must be to enable the individual to have the fullest freedom of action and expression consistent with equal freedom for others.

For those of us who support the Western liberal tradition of the supremacy of the individual, those beliefs conjure up more dilemmas than they provide answers. The question was first posed by J. S. Mill in "On Liberty", when he wrote:

"The liberty of the individual must be thus far limited. He must not make himself a nuisance to other people."

The classic dilemma is the right of the individual to speak out. That must include the right to criticise individuals and the right of other individuals to be given redress to protect their good names and reputations.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the doctrine of civil liberty, like that of democracy, is at once the most universally accepted doctrine and, in most countries, the most abused. Thus, the Soviet constitution has one of the most ringing acclamations of civil liberties, while we in this country have no Bill of Rights. I know, however, in which country my civil liberties are better protected.

As Burke said:

"Abstract liberty, like other mere abstractions, is not to be found."

I find it useful to consider the analogy of the large house full of tenants, when addressing that dilemma. I should defend to the death the right of any of my fellow tenants to criticise me or the management of the house. I believe, however, that I have the right to stop, if necessary by force, one of my fellow inmates from wielding a pick-axe at the foundations of the house and bringing the whole lot tumbling down.

Let me illustrate my analogy with reference to the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. If our home is ringed with enemies armed to the teeth whose one aim is to destroy the pleasant liberal, democratic regime pertaining in the house, does one of my fellow tenants have the right to stand up and say that we should unbolt the door? Most decidely, yes. That is the right of free speech, however miguided. That is his civil liberty. It is a different matter if he insists on passing a message to the enemy outside, telling him how to unbolt the door. That is what CND is doing by telling the world where our cruise missiles are being deployed. Does the minority tenant have the right to demonstrate in the corridors of our house against the wishes of the majority? Most decidedly, yes. It is his civil liberty to demonstrate. Does he also have the right deliberately to sabotage the work of our house by sitting in the corridor and preventing the rest of us from moving about? That is different. It is denying the majority of us our civil liberties, and that is what CND means by civil disobedience. The British people agree.

In a recent Gallup poll commissioned by the Coalition for Peace Through Security, whose results have previously been unpublished, 52 per cent. of those who had an opinion approved of the monitoring by the security services of political organisations such as CND which have adopted civil disobedience in pursuit of their aims.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley) rose——

Mr. Leigh: No, I shall not give way.

An even larger majority—62 per cent.—supported the monitoring of trade union activists who are members of the Communist party. Why do the British people take that clear view? They recognise that those people are less interested in free speech than in bringing the whole house of freedom tumbling down.

The delicate plant of our civil liberties can flourish only if we respect the will of the majority. The alternative is the law of the jungle, the law of "might is right", and the immediate degradation and ultimate destruction of all our civil liberties.

Mrs. Clwyd rose——

Mr. Leigh: I have already said no. The hon. Lady will have a chance to speak in a moment.

The state has the right to govern only so long as it is sustained by the majority. No regime unsustained by democracy has the right to destroy individual rights for the convenience of the state. Thus, the Nazi and Stalinist regimes in the 1930s, by denying the individual his individual liberty and collective voice, rendered themselves instantly abhorrent, whatever their other crimes against humanity.

To the extent also that a regime like that in South Africa seeks to limit the civil liberties of one section of the community, so it destroys its right to govern the rest.

There cannot be one law of civil liberties for those whose opinions we like and another for those whose opinions we abhor. That is why I find what has been happening in the NCCL this month so alarming, and why I welcome the debate which my hon. Friend has initiated today.

Mr. Larry Gostin's heretical opinion was to assert:

"the freedom not to take part in a strike is as much a fundamental right as the right to strike."

For those of us who believe in civil liberties there is nothing unremarkable in that statement, but to the majority of NCCL members, apparently, a collective decision to break one's contract of work by going on strike denies the individual his right to abide by his contract of continuing to work.

That decision reveals that the NCCL is far from being the guardian of the nation's liberties and is just another Left-wing pressure group. The NCCL even seems to have ignored what the sensible Left appreciates, that the failure to observe basic liberal principles of democracy was the cause of the Left's greatest defeat since the war—the collapse from within of the miners' strike because of the denial of a ballot to all the miners.

Why has the NCCL stood civil liberties on their head? A clue may come from an internal NCCL document which has come into my hands. It says:

"NCCL has a £5,000 overdraft facility which is guaranteed by the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers — Transport Salaried Staffs Association. In the past, NCCL has exceeded that £5,000 limit by considerable amounts. A bank manager has met the NCCL's treasurer to discuss that. The bank takes the view that it will not give an overdraft limit beyond £5,000 unless the guarantee is for a larger sum."

The NCCL is thus in the pockets of the trade union block vote. All that furore—a three to one majority against Mr. Gostin—is directed at the authors of a report, who all come from the Left of the political spectrum and who devote merely a passing obeisance to balance amidst a sustained attack on the police.

Of course, this is not the first time that the NCCL has taken such a biased line. Last year the NCCL was quick to condemn the police for issuing passes to local residents at Molesworth. The NCCL made not a peep of criticism when CND issued passes to its members to pass through its own roadblocks.

The NCCL consistently promotes the collective rights of trade unions, but rarely, if ever, the rights of individual trade unionists.

It is no surprise that I have a record of a Ms. Terry Marsland, who is a prominent supporter of NCCL and a Communist, telling an NCCL meeting that the Soviets should be praised for going to the aid of the Afghan people—no doubt to defend civil liberties.

Patricia Hewitt, who is now ensconced safely with the Leader of the Opposition, used to be the general secretary of NCCL. In that capacity she pressed, not just for political control of the police—one would expect that from her—but for political control to determine whom the special branch should investigate for subversion. Does Ms. Hewitt want local Tory councillors in Lincolnshire, who may have an axe to grind, to decide which of her chums should be investigated? I certainly do not want that, and I doubt whether she does.

Mr. Gostin, as we know, was finally forced to resign because, and I quote him, of the "intolerable interference from the NCCL Council Left wing extremists".

His is not the first defection from the NCCL by moderates; E. M. Forster and George Orwell resigned in the 1940s when they realised that the NCCL was too close to the then Communist party for comfort. One of NCCL's general secretaries, Ronald King, was found, after his retirement, to have substantial, if subterranean, links with the Communist party.

The ideological doublespeak that permeates the NCCL is evident from a letter written by one of its supporters to The Guardian. It criticises a very balanced critique delivered by Mr. Hugo Young, who is not a particular friend of the Conservative party. Listen to this extraordinary doublespeak:

"Mr. Young's criticism of the NUM's failure to observe 'basic' libertarian principles and his recommendation that the NCCL should allow a 'commitment to a political principle' is so much utopian sophistry. Such a stance is, moreover, overtly political. Liberty is not a neutral commodity that may be quantified. It is merely an ideological creation."

Yes, it is an ideological creation in the hands of those Left-wing extremists who now seem to control the NCCL.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Leigh: No.

Liberty is indivisible. It is not an ideological football. It is a fundamental human right. As was once said, it may be dangerous, but it is the safest thing that we have.

6 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): It is very sad that the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) has chosen to smear not only the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament but the National Council for Civil Liberties. It is also very sad that he has chosen to smear politicians by his comment that he objects to political control. The government of this country is about political control. It is fortunate that in this country political control is based on democracy. If it is good enough to have democracy to run the country, it is also good enough that democracy should be involved in such issues as the control of the police. It is very sad when politicians who are openly involved in politics set out to smear the idea that there is something wrong with political control. Political control is right if it is balanced by the democratic right of the electorate to get rid of those who have political control if they misuse it.

I should have liked to be able to congratulate the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) on having chosen civil liberties as the subject of this debate. It is a subject which is not debated sufficiently frequently in the House. However, the hon. Gentleman unfortunately chose to use this opportunity to attack the National Council for Civil Liberties. I believe that that was regrettable.

Mr. Ottaway: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bennett: In a minute or two, possibly.

It is unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman chose to devote the greater part of his speech to an attack on the NCCL. There are many important civil liberty issues which are far more deserving of our thought and comments than an attack on the NCCL.

If I may deal first with the hon. Gentleman's enthusiasm for a Bill of Rights, it is questionable whether we ought to embrace such a Bill. Are there absolute, fundamental rights? All of us believe that there are fundamental rights, but when one examines them more carefully one finds that almost all of them have to be qualified. The right to work appears to be a fundamental right which we ought to embrace, yet in practice we do not embrace it because there are between 3 million and 4 million people in this country who are unemployed.

There also appears to be a fundamental right of free speech. However, I do not imagine that any Conservative Member would grant me the right, late at night, to knock at all the doors in the street in which I live and insist upon haranguing the people who live in those houses. That is a right which to a certain extent is limited. One also thinks that there is a right to breathe pure air, yet people also have the right to drive motor vehicles, which, to a certain extent, pollute the air.

When, therefore, one examines the question, one finds that many of the rights which we take for granted have to be modified to a certain extent, that for most rights there are corresponding responsibilities and that it becomes increasingly difficult to define those rights. Anybody who is to be tried ought to have the right to a trial in public, yet it is generally accepted that for certain offences against the state the trial ought to take place in camera. Although there is the right to an open trial, there is also the right to screen a juvenile from the publicity of an open trial. Therefore, a balance has to be struck between rights on the one hand and responsibilities on the other.

This causes problems over a Bill of Rights. If a Bill of Rights could be written in simple language, was absolute and self-enforcing, I should be enthusiastic about the introduction of such a Bill, but a Bill of Rights would not be self-enforcing. In almost every case it would have to be interpreted and implemented by somebody. One of the weaknesses of a Bill of Rights lies in its enforcement. It would have to be interpreted, and power would have to be handed over to the judiciary to interpret the Bill.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) pointed out that if a Bill of Rights or the European convention on human rights were enshrined in our legislation it could be implemented by the lowest courts of the land, but in practice there would be appeals to higher and yet higher courts. Ultimately, the implementation of a Bill of Rights would very much depend upon the views of High Court judges, who are not elected.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I am puzzled by the approach of the hon. Member for Denton and reddish (Mr. Bennett). He seems to be calling into question the whole concept of the rule of law. Issues are interpreted by judges every day. Who else is to interpret the laws that are made in this House? I would ask the hon. Gentleman what is wrong about adopting the ordinary circumstances of the rule of law? Let the judiciary interpret, and let us rely upon the political impartiality of the judiciary.

Mr. Bennett: The problem with a Bill of Rights is that in some way it is absolute. There are many examples of the way in which judges have interpreted the law. If Parliament does not like their interpretations, the law is changed. If there were a Bill of Rights which was continually being altered by Parliament because it did not like the interpretation that judges were placing upon it, I do not believe that it would hold any attraction. The attraction of a Bill of Rights is that it is absolute, but even if it were absolute it would be subject to the interpretation of judges.

If one considers the enforcement of the constitution of the United States, one finds that it has been the willingness of judges continually to adapt and modify their interpretations that has allowed the constitution to work. Before we grow too enthusiastic about a Bill of Rights, I suggest that we ought to realise that if we enshrined such a Bill absolutely in law we should be handing over parliamentary powers to the judiciary. I am not particularly happy about the economic, class and sex backgrounds of hon. Members, but I would certainly argue that this House is more representative of the whole country than are our High Court judges.

As for the attacks on the NCCL, the strength of that body is that it is a broad coalition of interests—[HON. MEMBERS: "Of the Left."] It is a broad coalition of interests, which includes the vast majority of the people of this country. If people are interested in civil liberties they ought to be involved in the organisation and in arguing their point of view within it. The record of the NCCL during the past few years has been considerable. I pay tribute to the fact that an all-party group has been re-established in Parliament. It is sad that the previous all-party group did not have many members and that its meetings were held irregularly because insufficient Conservative Members participated enthusiastically in its activities. Had there been better attendance by all hon. Members, the group would not have had to be reformed.

There are many issues upon which an all-party group would not be appropriate. When a Bill is being considered in detail, it is appropriate that groups of Back Benchers from different parties should separately be briefed by an organisation like the NCCL. If one is in opposition, one's approach to the Government will be different from the approach of a supporter of the Government.

During the 10 or 11 years that I have been a Member of Parliament I have been impressed by the detailed briefing that has been given by the NCCL to hon. Members. Rather than attack it tonight, hon. Members should pay tribute to the back-up service that it gave those

hon. Members who served on Committees such as those dealing with the Police Bill, the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill and the Data Protection Bill. Throughout that time its secretaries and officials have briefed hon. Members extremely effectively.

I should have liked more time to consider matters which we should be spending more time arguing about, such as privacy, public order, the administration of justice, freedom of information and the pressing need for that to be implemented, and prisoners and women's rights. Sadly, in a short debate such as this, that is not possible.

The House must also spend time considering the relationship between the general public and the police. That is one of the areas in which our civil liberties are fast being eroded. I went to a football match on Saturday. Because of the large numbers of people who went to watch Manchester City, rather to my surprise, and, I suspect, that of others, I ended up going into the standing accommodation, an area to which I do not often go. Like many other older football supporters, I prefer to sit down. Among the younger age group with whom I went through the turnstiles I was horrified to find that the mass of discussion related to what they intended to do to annoy, upset and harangue the police if Manchester City were to lose.

I thought back to about 20 years ago, which was probably the last time that I went into that part of the terraces, when the same sort of discussions about what to do if the team lost went on, but with none of that antagonism and bitterness towards the police. I accept that at least 90 per cent. of the comments I heard from those young people were simply the result of bravado and that they had no intention of doing anything at all. But it represented a complete alienation between the youngsters and the police. It was also noticeable that the police no longer stand in the crowd in that part of the ground. They are down in front of the crowd, turned to face it.

We must find out why that alienation between young people and the police has come about. Unless we address ourselves seriously to repairing the breach between many of the younger generation and the police, increasingly our civil liberties will be put at risk. People will demand greater powers for the police to combat the sort of opposition that is now coming from that age group.

It is sad that although the hon. Member for Nottingham, North was right to choose civil liberties as a subject for debate, he spent rather too much of his time attacking the NCCL, whose record in Britain is excellent. Over the past few months it has had some fairly minor disagreements, but on the majority of its work there is consensus. It would have been better had he spent his time addressing himself to the more fundamental issues of civil liberties, about which we should all be worried and alarmed.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): There could not be a more important subject for debate than civil liberties. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) on choosing it. It is a subject which concerns us all. Conservative Members may think that the Labour party has a monopoly on civil liberties, but it is clear from the number of my hon. Friends present that it is the Conservative party which has a monopoly on civil liberties. Three Labour Members and two alliance Members are present on the Opposition Benches. It is worth noting that there is a good attendance on the Conservative Benches tonight.

The debate has rightly centred on the rights of individuals, the liberties of the subject and the rights of the citizen. However, having listened to some powerful speeches, I find it slightly curious that not one hon. Member has mentioned that with rights come obligations. Obligations tend to be forgotten. There are obligations to neighbours, society, employers, teachers, and, above all, one's country. When one talks about rights, one should constantly couple that with obligations.

I want to talk about organisations, such as the NCCL and others, engaged in that important work. Such organisations usually raise the bulk of their funds from outside the state sector. It was revealing to hear from my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) that the NCCL has its overdraft facilities mortgaged to a trade union. That is regrettable, because it destroys the independence of that organisation.

There is nothing wrong in voluntary charitable work being financed by the state. We finance the Ombudsman out of public funds, and that does not necessarily compromise him. There would be nothing wrong in financing objectors to planning appeals, especially where the national interest is concerned. Objectors could be funded out of the public purse. Organisations committed to civil rights could be similarly funded. Instead of compromising them, it would give them a better basis for their work. The problem is that many such organisations would feel compromised if they received money from the public purse.

The trouble about so many rights organisations — welfare rights, civil rights, community rights and neighbourhood rights — is that whereas their objectives are highly laudable, they often masquerade under charitable status for the party political aspirations of their organisers — their paid staff. Regrettably, many voluntary organisations have been captured by party political activists — usually on the far Left, many of them Trotskyites — who believe passionately that their objectives and ambitions can best be pursued and advanced by using the vehicle of the organisation and twisting its objectives to suit their own party political purpose. That, I fear, is the new trend of the new Left.

I was involved, as some hon. Members may remember, in starting an organisation called Task Force in 1964. We recruited tens of thousands of young people all over London to give service to the old and lonely. By 1968 we had 70 paid staff. We raised money from local authorities, the Government and private donations. The importance of such an organisation was that it matched the aspirations of the young to the plight of the old and the lonely. In the best years we had 15,000 volunteers. The purpose of the organisation was to find and give young people something useful to do and something which they wished to do, which, at the same time, would help others less fortunate than themselves. It was a simple operation.

But today Task Force has been captured. It has now been renamed and it has become highly party-politically active. The same is true of the Young Volunteer Force Foundation, which I had the privilege of directing in 1968. It was launched by the Labour party under Harold Wilson. About 120 community workers, lawyers and social workers were directed all over the country to deal with social problems, community work, play groups and legal advice centres in order to help people to help themselves. That was a magnificent operation with altruistic objectives. Despite the good work of the Task Force and the Young Volunteer Force Foundation, both have been renamed and captured by the staff, and they masquerade under the banner of caring.

I cannot understand why the Devon and Cornwall branch of the Community Youth Workers Union yesterday sent me a resolution saying:

"This Union deplores the current attempt to destroy the public transport system by the present Government through the introduction of legislation to privatise and de-regularise public transport."

What has that got to do with community and youth work in Devon and Cornwall? That is what is happening on the civil liberties, community and voluntary work front. An old man told me last week that he accepted an invitation from such a voluntary organisation to go on a day trip to Brighton. He said: "I was looking forward to seeing the sea and The Lanes and down we went in a bus. We had a nice trip down and a good day by the sea, but on the way back the megaphone was switched on and for an hour and a half I was subjected to being told by a community worker that I had to protest and stick up for my rights when all I really wanted was a day by the sea. I was being harangued by social workers and community leaders into protesting about my rights." That is the way that many of these organisations have gone.

By the sound of things, the NCCL has gone the same way. It has been captured by the hard Left, and it does itself immeasurable harm by being identified as promoting a party political line. Of course organisations such as the NCCL will be political; that is the very nature of their work. But they cannot be party political. That is a difference that those who work in voluntary, community and civil rights organisations do not seem to appreciate.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Is it not a little hard to suggest that the NCCL has been hijacked by the hard Left? Although the annual general meeting may well have been attended by those of predominantly Leftish views, the election of executive committee members involved a postal ballot, and a Liberal—myself, as it happens—came top of the poll. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that I am part of an arrangement to hijack the NCCL on behalf of the hard Left.

Mr. Steen: The hon. and learned Gentleman has made a valid point. He is a pawn. He is highly respected in the House, and no one would think for one moment that he intended to hijack the NCCL. Indeed, some of my hon. Friends might think that he would do a better job than the present committee does. But the point is that the hard Left will use the hon. and learned Gentleman. He has not been here long enough to know just how easy it is for a Liberal or SDP Member to be used. I hope that he will be very circumspect about what is being done to him and about what may happen to him if he objects. The pattern in voluntary, community and civil rights organisations is that everybody resigns. I receive letters from the NCCL; and there is always an acting director or acting secretary, but never a real one. There is never a chairman; always a chairperson. People are always moving on.

I have always read the NCCL's briefs with great interest, and I have been very active in the House on behalf of civil liberties. However, I regret what has gone on, and I believe that the situation is very damaging for that organisation. I am concerned that the Trotskyites are using such organisations to gain a rung on the ladder and a public platform for their views. Organisations including youth leaders, social workers, and the community work professions are now all riddled with party political activists. Whether those involved be social workers in Liverpool or educationists in London, they appoint their own kind and damage their own cause as a result.

Voluntary work is an honourable estate. It provided, and still provides, opportunities for people to give of themselves to those who are less fortunate. Many of the established organisations carry out their original briefs with professionalism and compassion. But since the early 1970s a new sort of organisation has come on the scene. Such organisations obtain charitable recognition for dubious ends and then go on raising money for the pursuit of their party political work.

The NCCL has a crucial role to perform in this country, but I believe that its work is now suspect. I believe, too, that many other organisations, claiming theirs is the true democracy, manipulate their members to ensure that the voice of the hard Left is heard. Indeed, the new cells of militancy are often based in community work organisations, protesting about benefits, rights and legal assistance. I regret that that is so. I regret that party politics of extreme kinds are entering and eating into this country like a canker, destroying a great deal of invaluable and dedicated work.

I have spoken strongly, because before I became a Member of Parliament I worked in this area for about 20 years. It has dramatically changed, and the remarks of Opposition Members should be tempered by the experience of those Conservative Members who have done the work and know what they are talking about.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): As I have said on several occasions, the democratic and civil rights of the people of Britain have been seriously eroded in recent years, and particularly under this Government. That is the case that I shall advance again today.

I would be the first to concede that that erosion has been going on for many years. There are several reasons for it, not least the effect on this country of the political problems in Northern Ireland. We should address ourselves to that, but that is not the subject of today's debate. The United Kingdom has seen a terrifying erosion of civil rights and that is why we have such an appalling record before the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. More than any other country, we have been brought to book by that court. As a Member of Parliament and a British citizen who is proud of our democracy, I am ashamed of that. I should like to think that Conservative Members were ashamed of it too, but I do not think that they are, or ever will be.

The Government are making a fundamental mistake in assuming that order can be imposed at a time of social and economic distress. I remind the Conservative party that social and economic distress, and in particular mass unemployment and hyper-inflation, lead to calls for authoritarian leaders. Dictatorship lies at the end of that road. In the past week or so we have heard talks on the second world war. I remember, with respect, the comment by the President of West Germany. He said that the German people must take responsibility for what happened during the Hitler years. There is much in that, but all of us must take responsibility, because all of us are responsible in a way for what happened in Germany before 1933. When hon. Members consider the hyper-inflation in Germany then, the mass unemployment, the feeling of national disgrace and the fact that the Germans could not cope because of the burdens put on them from afar, they must bear in mind that we ploughed the fields in which Hitler so ably sowed his seeds. When we forget that, we forget what we are doing here.

More than anything else, my objection to this Government is that they have tried to impose order in numerous situations where that cannot be done.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West) rose——

Mr. Soley: I shall give way shortly in certain circumstances, but I am conscious of the shortage of time and the number of hon. Members who want to speak.

We should always beware of the call for order. Order is one of the most dangerous concepts out, unless it is qualified with the need for law and for civil rights. If people argue for order alone, they are arguing for the Hitlerite example of order. That is what Conservative Members forget so easily. Sadly, the failure of the motion — I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) that the latter half of the speech of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) was constructive—is that it is assumed that we can have stability in the face of economic distress. That is impossible, as can be seen in Poland, South Africa and —I hate to say it—in Northern Ireland. We should have learned from that lesson. Ultimately, one cannot go on imposing order without a severe risk to the democracy that one is trying to defend.

I am not here as a spokesman for the NCCL, but I shall say what some other hon. Members should perhaps have said. I was not at that meeting and I have not read most of the documents associated with it. However, the interpretation put on it by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North was wrong for several reasons. As I said in my intervention, the point was that the NCCL had always defended the right to go to work free of intimidation and the threat of violence, even if there was a strike. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that the right to strike is equal to the right to go to work, he is in dead trouble with the 4 million unemployed. On the other hand, if he is arguing that the unemployed are just a sad fact of life and one of the vagaries of this Government's ideological system, he is still in trouble for the precise reason that I gave earlier. If that is the case, a worker has the right to go to work when he is locked out. I might expect to see every Conservative Member defending that right, but they will not do so.

Mr. Ottaway: The hon. Gentleman has turned my argument round through 180 degrees and is arguing it in the negative. But does the hon. Gentleman agree with the statement that the freedom not to take part in a strike is as much a fundamental right as the right to strike?

Mr. Soley: I shall argue that neither of them is a fundamental right. That is why the argument is wrong and misleading. The problem is that if one argues that there are absolute rights the first right must be the right to life. Government Members do not argue for the right to life because they know that that right is qualified in terms of a member of the Provisional IRA in Northern Ireland or of a member of any other paramilitary organisation. It is qualified in war and when Conservative Members vote in favour of hanging.

Mr. Ashby: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Soley: No. The hon. Gentleman has not been present for the whole debate, and I am running out of time.

Mr. Ashby: I have been here.

Mr. Soley: I apologise. I did not notice the hon. Gentleman, but I must stick to the timetable.

The right to strike has always been regarded by the various international bodies as basic and important because it is linked to social and economic rights. As the NCCL says, everyone has the right to go to work free of intimidation, threats and violence. I support that stance 100 per cent. I suspect that I support it more than Government Members because it does not apply for them during a lock out.

A misunderstanding occurred over the National Front. The NCCL's position was simple. It will represent an individual but not an organisation. If an individual from the National Front said that he was in trouble with the police or the state the NCCL would advise him, but if an organisation dedicated to the destruction of civil rights asked for help the NCCL would reserve its judgment and not advise. The NCCL reserves its right to canvass for support, but some Government Members believe that it should not and that it should advise anyone. That means that it might have had to advise Hitler and that if the Provisional IRA took over in Northern Ireland it would have to advise that organisation because it would be a legal body.

The concept of equality is important to Socialists because we know that civil rights are conditioned by social and economic circumstances. A person earning a high income has more real civil rights than a person who is unemployed or on low income. That is probably why the constituent of the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) was lectured so terribly on the bus to the seaside.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) wanted to know the Labour party's position on a Bill of Rights. It is similar to the opinion expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett). I recognise the strength of argument for a Bill of Rights and a written constitution, but the issue is complex. The Liberal view is to go for a European state in which a written constitution and a Bill of Rights applies. If one picked on part of what is, in effect, a written constitution, and put it into a constitution under which Parliament is seen as sovereign, difficulties would arise.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish said so powerfully, one of the significant differences between Britain and other western European powers and America is that entry to the judiciary is restricted to the higher socio-economic groups. That is because grants are not given to train a person through to being a judge.

Mr. Alex Carlile: What about magistrates?

Mr. Soley: The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery is supposed to be a lawyer, although from his interruptions I should not have thought so. Magistrates do not preside at Strasbourg, nor are they likely to. The point is that entry into the higher ranks of the judiciary in Britain is restricted. The way to change that is to give grants for study to all people who want to go all the way to the top ranks. Until we achieve that the higher levels of the judiciary will be seen not only to be against, but not to understand the problems of many people whose cases go before them. That is why I should not want to pick up one part of a written constitution and incorporate it into our constitution.

The Government are guilty of being responsible for a serious erosion of civil rights. The evidence of that is in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act which allows 96 hours remand in custody. The Government have thought of dropping the idea of the duty solicitors scheme. The Law Society says that it is not possible for the Government to go ahead with the duty solicitors scheme unless it provides more money because it cannot train and administer such a scheme in time for January 1986. If that is so, the one in five people remanded in custody who need the aid of a duty solicitor will not have it.

Mrs. Clwyd: Does my hon. Friend agree that justice was not even-handed during the miners' strike, and that something serious is wrong with the Police Complaints Board which failed to uphold any of the 74 complaints against police officers during that strike?

Mr. Soley: Even the Government are unhappy about the Police Complaints Board. We believe that the existing system is excessively bureaucratic. I should prefer a type of ombudsman with the power of investigation up to the point of public prosecution if a criminal offence is suspected, and then that case could be handed to the independent public prosecutor.

Attacks on trade union rights and restrictions on picketing in the 1980 Act made the miners' strike and other strikes worse then they might have been. We sometimes forget that industrial unrest applies in many industries. What do Government Members expect, with 3 million or 4 million people unemployed? What do they expect when they cut benefits to people who are already struggling? Do they expect the British people to be different from the people of Poland when their basic rights are attacked? What do they expect when such an attack on trade union rights was made at GCHQ?

The Government are using the police force as the Tory party's private army to enforce failed economic and industrial relations policies. Since 1979 the crime rate has been increasing, and it was up by 9 per cent. last year. Riots have taken place in our inner cities and in connection with industrial disputes. Rioting has taken place in the villages of Britain, and yet the Tories say that they are the party of law and order. It is the party of rising crime rates and increasing disorder. Its social and economic policies are the cause. So long as the Government try to address the symptoms by screwing down the lid they will fail to contain the problem and store up dangerous problems for the country.

Labour Back Benchers have stopped a number of private Bills which would have required notice before a procession could take place. I am pleased about that, because the right to demonstrate has been eroded by the Government. Permits have been required to drive from one part of the country to another. The essential difference between a CND permit and a police permit is that one is given to the state. That is a potentially dangerous power to give to the state—it is the same as the permit to move in the Soviet Union.

The Government have been responsible for jury bashing and have attacked ethnic minority groups in the British Nationality Act which creates stateless citizens now called British overseas citizens. Foreign husbands of women settled here are not allowed in, so we divide families, against our own signature to the Helsinki declaration.

The Commission for Racial Equality report leaked to The Guardian said that the measure was being used to keep black immigrants out. The Data Protection Act with its minimal safeguards does not even cover manual records and, as with the Interception of Communications Bill, the Government have been forced to introduce it because of the Strasbourg court.

I concede that the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act was introduced by a Labour Government but it is now being used for one of the most steady of all erosions of human rights. Yet this Government tried to take out the word "temporary". Secrecy is one of the greatest enemies of an open society and yet the Government refuse to put the security services under a Select Committee.

The GLC and the metropolitan counties are to be abolished. We must remember Sarah Tisdale, Clive Ponting and Cathy Massiter. The message if one plans to give away secrets, is to ensure that they are big secrets because one will not then be prosecuted, but if they are little secrets one will be taken to court.

There is a major threat to civil liberties. One of the dangers is the need for order that all Governments want to pursue to some extent. Therefore, the House should always be on its guard. The Government are trying to deal with social and economic problems by increasing centralised power and order. Centralised power is itself a danger to liberty, as is unaccountable power. We often hear the Tory party talking about trade unions, but how little do we hear it talking about votes in companies, votes between people—[HON. MEMBERS: "Shareholders."] Oh no, not shareholders. Every time someone buys a pint of beer, he gives money to the Tory party. Is that not right? Is it not true that that is the way in which the Tory party raises money from the consumer without a vote by anyone, and especially the employees? It is the sort of dishonesty and double standards that we have come to expect of the Tory party.

I am reminded that 340 years ago there was disorder in the House when the King broke in. Fortunately, many people resisted that and there was violence. If they had not resisted, this country would not have become the mother of Parliaments and this House would not have been the defender of civil liberties that it should be. If many Conservative Members had been alive at that time, they would have supported the King, and they know that.

The Opposition are on the side of civil rights. We do not think that there are any simple definitions or any simple answers to difficult problems. But we do know that if we try to govern by oppressing significant parts of our community, we will create trouble in our society. That trouble will sooner or later destroy our democracy.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): We have just listened to an extraordinary speech from the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). I breathed a sigh of relief when I heard that the hon. Gentleman was to speak rather than the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk), whose all-purpose ranting on these occasions is well known. But even the hon. Member for Knowsley, North might have blushed at some of the remarks in the speech of the hon. Member for Hammersmith.

I shall be brief, so I will have a self-denying ordinance with myself about picking up the hon. Gentleman's points. A great deal of his speech was humbug, especially when he prayed in aid what happened during the civil war. He showed a total lack of understanding of the courage of individuals who went through the hundreds of jeering pickets to exercise their right to work. The idea that the spirit that took England through the civil war and allowed this place to rise to the position that it exercises today was not the same spirit as that shown by Nottinghamshire miners is humbug, partisanship and a narrow sectional view of civil liberties that is quite astonishing coming from the hon. Gentleman, whose views I often commend.

Again, the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the Interception of Communications Bill were pure humbug. When the Opposition were in government, they exercised the same powers and did not dream of introducing the safeguards that this Government have introduced in the Bill. Part of his attack was on a little measure on juries that I helped to take through the House, which was proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Watson). The proposal was to exclude from juries people with criminal records. What is there in the advancement of civil liberties that requires us to retain crooks on juries? I do not understand that point.

The hon. Gentleman complained about the steps necessary to protect rural communities—which, through no fault of their own, live near defence establishments—from major incursions by all manner of people who think it their right to enter their communities and make trouble. Yet he did not say a word about all the demonstrations that led to the need for exceptional measures.

The sad thing about the hon. Gentleman's speech was its lack of balance, and we must turn to balance if we are to have a civilised debate on these issues.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) on introducing this motion. Not the least of his achievements has been to show the Labour party in its present, rather unsavoury, mood. However, the need for balance was the important point that he made. I appreciate that intellectual abstractions are as crucial to this subject as to any other, but in the end the practical business of government requires weighing the need to protect the essential rights of individuals with the equally vital need to preserve order and stability in our society. Where we strike that balance is always a matter for careful judgment. I do not believe that this Government stand in any condemnation of having got the balance wrong.

I wish to take up the hon. Member for Hammersmith on one of his examples — the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. The previous Government were sufficiently concerned about the imbalance between police powers and the rights of citizens to set up a Royal Commission. It reported and, following its proposals, legislation was introduced to provide powers necessary in each area of activity—from stopping and searching on the streets, to searching of property, through to the questioning of detained persons. The guiding principle was that the powers provided should be sufficient for the task faced by the police, but no more than were needed in the circumstances, and that each power should have a check.

The hon. Gentleman was on decidedly sticky ground when he cited the 96-hour provision. His experience in the criminal courts is sufficient to know that on a number of occasions the courts have upheld the power to detain for 96 hours or longer. The question how long the power to detain should be in each case could never be prophesied at the start. We now have the position that not only is 96 hours the maximum, so certainty is imposed, but that to get to that 96 hours there must be two hearings before magistrates at 36 and 66 hours. There is an absolute right —something that the Labour Government never gave— to legal representation where there is not a serious arrestable offence, and a right to legal representation in all but the most extreme circumstances where there is a serious arrestable offence. I think that the hon. Gentleman's attacks were well wide of the mark——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the Minister give way on the point about duty solicitors?

Mr. Mellor: This is not the occasion to say more than that we have advocated the duty solicitors scheme and we will ensure that it is introduced. The necessary horse trading and bargaining that go on should not obscure from the hon. Gentleman the sincerity of the Government's intention. It is no good the hon. Gentleman scoffing about money. Money becomes a large criterion when Opposition Members move their bottoms from their Benches and come to the Government Benches. It is only in opposition that they pretend that they can forget about money.

I respect the sincerity and thought with which a number of hon. Members have advanced the case for incorporating the convention in some form in our domestic law. Anyone who advocates that should not be under any illusions about its significance. I want to endorse a number of the points made by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett). The Government have no plans for any early initiative and take the view that there needs to be a much greater consensus in favour of such a major change. The burden of proof for such a major change lies very much on those who advocate it.

The hon. Gentleman raised a valuable point when he noted the parallel with the United States — something that deals with the necessary creativity with which the dead letter has to be interpreted and have breathed into it the life of the particular age through the judiciary and not through the legislature. That crucial point should not be underestimated. Implicit in what he said was the politicisation of the process for appointing senior members of the judiciary, which might cause some of us to pause before we would want to see it in the United Kingdom. We must accept that if we adopted that system, inevitably the balance between the courts and Parliament would be altered. That is not to say that there is not a compelling case on the other side, but it needs to be made in recognition of the enormity of what is proposed.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith attacked the United Kingdom's record before the European Court. The case is not as stark as he suggested. It is true that on 11 occasions the United Kingdom has been found to have been in violation, but Belgium, a far smaller country, has been found to have been in violation on nine occasions, the Netherlands on five and Italy on six occasions, and Italy allowed the right of individual petition seven years later than we did. It is hardly fair to make a comparison with, say, France as France did not even allow the right of individual petition until 1982.

There was a good deal of unreality about the claim of the hon. Member for Hammersmith that that demonstrates that the United Kingdom is a country in which civil liberties are dead, just as there is an air of unreality about reading the Soviet constitution. The reality, however much we may want to play partisanly with the figures, is that the United Kingdom is a country in which the flame of individual freedom burns brightly; and if it fails to burn brightly, that is as likely to be because of the actions of those on the Left as anything that the present Government might propose.

Rightly or wrongly—and one suspects that the extent of interest in the matter from one country to another might determine the final outcome—there is a great deal more interest in these issues and more organisation about them in the United Kingdom. The fact that we have been found guilty of violations on 11 occasions must be set in the scales against the 823 cases that we have been notified as being brought against us.

Much has been said about the National Council for Civil Liberties. It is not much to do with the Government, but I would have hoped that any organisation devoted to civil liberties would not have taken exception to a report which said that the freedom not to take part in a strike was as fundamental as the right to strike. The special pleading of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) was worrying. I admire him and I do not criticise him for trying to make that organisation work, but he will have an uphill struggle. I need only look at the motion passed by its executive in February—I do not know if he was a member of the executive then — which regretted that the inquiry had exceeded its terms of reference in commenting on the conduct of striking and working miners, and charged that the presentation of the report was

"unnecessarily damaging to the miners' cause."

What is a civil liberties organisation doing criticising a report that it set up on the basis that it was

"unnecessarily damaging to the miners' cause"?

There is more than a hint of the world that Joseph Stalin would have understood in all that.

I remind the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery that for the inquiry, which was willing to look at the civil rights of working miners, who, throughout the dispute, were faced with systematic mass picketing, violence and intimidation to prevent them from going to work, and to comment on the situation, to come out with the legal quibble that the executive and AGM of the NCCL did—that it was outside its terms of reference—verges on the contemptible in the view of most people. I wish the hon. and learned Gentleman well, but he has an uphill struggle, and, sooner or later, he will be asked whether he does more good for the NCCL by being in it or more damage to the Liberal party's standing by being in it.

I wish my hon. Friend's motion success. He presented it well. I look forward to hearing other commendations of it before, all too soon, this debate is cut off in its prime.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): I, too, shall be extremely brief, although I should have liked to comment strongly on the reactionary and bigoted comments of the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh).

Justice has not been even-handed in relation to the miners' strike. Hundreds of miners were charged. Some were fined, and some were imprisoned, during the dispute, but no complaints have been upheld against police officers following complaints being reported to the Police Complaints Board during the strike. Indeed, today I received a letter from the board dealing with a complaint of mine against the police following an incident in my constituency outside the Phurnacite plant on 7 December 1984. There have been many comments in the press about that incident. It took six months for that complaint to be dealt with, and only after the Home Secretary intervened personally did I receive a response from the Police Complaints Board.

I wish to place on record my view that the letter that I have received from the board represents a complete fabrication of the events as they took place on that day. The board has accepted totally the evidence given by the police officer concerned and has taken no notice whatever of the evidence given by me and a Labour councillor. The board comes to the conclusion:

"Because there is no fully independent evidence to resolve the dispute between your account of the incident and that given by the officer, no action will be taken."

That method of dealing with my complaint is unsatisfactory, though I suppose one must remember that the members of the board are appointed by the Prime Minister. Clearly, they have not been able to investigate my complaint thoroughly and impartially, as they are charged to do.

The new police complaints procedure came into operation on 29 April 1985. It fails either to ensure independent investigation of complaints or to provide for legal representation for police officers in all cases when they face disciplinary action. The much-vaunted independent element is grafted on to a scheme in which investigation remains in the hands of the police. There is little in the new scheme to increase public confidence.

I regret the fact that the Minister did not address himself to the need for research to be carried out into the new police complaints system. It is clear that the system suffers from a dangerous lack of public confidence, and that has not been helped by the failure of the board to uphold any of the 74 complaints against officers reported to it during the miners' strike.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): I have been extremely disappointed by the debate, in particular by the remarks of Labour Members. It is unfortunate that at a time when we have established an all-party group on civil liberties we should have had from the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) the type of speech that he made.

To speak as the hon. Member for Hammersmith did, and to equate unemployment and the economic situation of the country with civil liberties was a travesty of the facts, and his remarks were totally unjustified and unworthy of him. If he wishes to speak of a Government who are pursuing to the very limits measures designed to reduce unemployment and improve the economic lot of the nation, an Administration with a high record for civil liberties, he must speak of the present Government. Everything that the Conservatives have done and are doing has had as its prime objective the reduction of unemployment and the economic well-being of the nation. His argument was absolutely false and divisive.

I shall mention two matters that are helpful to civil liberties. The first is the role of the ombudsman. His role is extremely important in terms of civil liberties—this applies especially to the health ombudsman—and I should like to see an extension of the system to a defence ombudsman. The second relates to freedom of information. This is an aim which we should be able to achieve, if not in this Parliament, in the next one.

Mr. Ottaway: Many hon. Members have expressed disappointment over the debate having been what they described as an attack on the National Council for Civil Liberties. President Truman once said that if one could not stand the heat one should not be in the kitchen. There is no doubt that the NCCL is a front-line political group which expresses political views. It must, therefore, expect criticism.

Hon. Members have said that I attacked the NCCL. I did no such thing. I merely said, as others have said, that I did not agree with the policies that it had put forward. That is very different from attacking it. This has not been an NCCL-bashing exercise; just a debate in which many hon. Members have said that they cannot agree with the NCCL's point of view.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) made an interesting comment in reply to my intervention. When I asked whether he accepted the statement in the NCCL report, he said that basically he did not think that the right to strike—or the right not to strike—was a fundamental right. I am sure that many people will be very interested to hear that.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved.

That this House strongly endorses the need to protect the essential rights and liberties of the individual citizen, while recognising the vital need to preserve order and stability in our society.

Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: We now come to opposed private business. Before calling the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) to speak on behalf of the promoters of the Bill, I should announce to the House that I have selected the instruction in the name of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) to be debated with the Second Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I have a sense of deja vu because for many years I had to comment on behalf of the Government on various private Bills dealing with transport and ports matters. Now that I find myself on the other side of the water, so to speak, I shall be fascinated to hear what my hon. Friend the Minister has to say when he arrives and is ready to speak.

It is generally acknowledged that Felixstowe has become the most successful port in the United Kingdom, and it has built that success with virtually no need to resort to Government funds. Felixstowe is outside the national dock labour scheme, and it has excellent labour relations. The Bill provides an opportunity to build on the port's success and to enable it to compete on equal terms with rival ports in Europe.

The Bill will allow Felixstowe to expand its container quays by extending the limits of its jurisdiction approximately 1,000 m along the eastern bank of Harwich harbour. At the moment, the Felixstowe Dock and Railways Company is undertaking a £40 million expansion. Once that is completed—when the new Trinity terminal is ready—the port will have no further space to expand within its statutory limits. The promoters estimate that by 1987 the port will be woking to capacity, including the new Trinity terminal. Its customers—British, continental and American—will need to know by then, before committing themselves to any further trade through the port, whether it will be capable of handling their future requirements. If they cannot be so assured, they will go elsewhere. That may well mean that those customers will leave Britain and go to ports outside this country.

Since 1965, cargo passing through Felixstowe has increased tenfold to well over 9 million tonnes. The port's speciality is containers, of which some 3 million per year are handled throughout the United Kingdom. As I am sure my hon. Friend the Minister will agree, containers are the growth element in the ports' business, not just in this country but throughout the world. The OECD predicts a growth of between 3 and 5 per cent. per annum in the production of manufactured goods in years to come, most of which is likely to be traded internationally in containers. It is estimated that 10 million tonnes of cargo in the United Kingdom has still to be containerised.

The container revolution, to which this country came slowly, means that more and more containers are being carried on round the world routes by enormous mother ships which can trade only into ports which have, first, the appropriate depth of water and, secondly, but equally important, the facilities for those big ships to be loaded and unloaded and turned around very quickly. If we cannot provide ports with those facilities, this country will be bypassed. Felixstowe offers the opportunity for Britain to stay on the main line of world trade, but if its expansion is thwarted the big ships will not come to this country and our trade, our jobs and our economy will suffer.

It is important to say who supports the Bill. First, there are the promoters, who have explained their proposals very clearly in their note to the House. Secondly, chambers of commerce and industry from the whole of East Anglia and from the east and west midlands unanimously support the expansion. The chairman and all the shop stewards of the Transport and General Workers Union docks section throughout East Anglia are also in favour of the Bill. The Freight Transport Association, incorporating the British Shippers Council, in its statement of 9 May, said:

"Industry needs port services that are competitive with, and comparable to those available in mainland Europe.

Felixstowe docks match these criteria to a very high degree . . .

FTA sees the Felixstowe Bill as a welcome initiative on the part of the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company to ensure that they are able to meet future demand for their services. It is welcomed by FTA in the belief that it will extend and improve the level of port services available to British industry."

In fairness, I should also say who is against the Bill.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Before my hon. Friend leaves the list of those in favour of the Bill, I hope that he will mention Trinity college, Cambridge, as the college meeting voted by 48 to nil in favour of the proposal.

Mr. Griffiths: I am obliged to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant). He is always diligent in standing up for the interests of Cambridgeshire and of Cambridge university. It has come to my notice, however, that certain graduates of the university and, indeed, my hon. Friend for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James), hope to take part in the debate, so I thought that I would leave Trinity's case to them.

Among those who are against the Bill, there are said to be fears on three main issues locally — safety of navigation in the mouth of the River Orwell, the effect on the port of Ipswich, and care for the environment. I shall deal with the effect on Ipswich first.

Ipswich, a splendid city with an excellent football team, has never opposed the Felixstowe development on commercial grounds. What is good for one port in the haven is good for the other, and our ports have grown together at similar rates. In any case, Felixstowe would be handling ships of a draught which could not navigate the upper reaches of the river. The town of Ipswich has no need to fear job losses as a result of the development. On the contrary, 24 per cent. of the work force at Felixstowe live in Ipswich, and their numbers are increasing all the time. The Bill will provide substantially more jobs for the people of Ipswich.

Concern has also been expressed about the safety of ships trading to and from Ipswich. I am glad to be able to tell the House that that concern has led to a new and very welcome draft agreement between the ports of Harwich and Felixstowe, whereby the navigable waters which under the Bill would have passed to Felixstowe will now go to Harwich. My hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) will be pleased to know that Harwich will be in charge of rights of way in the estuary and will continue to be the pilotage authority for the entire harbour. The dock company has now applied to Parliament to promote the additional provisions in the Bill to give effect to those arrangements.

I am also assured that this development, with its associated dredging work, would double the width of navigable water available between Fagbury point and Shotley spit. I am glad that my hon. Friends the Members for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) and for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer)—are listening carefully. I know of their concern about the river's width. The deepening of this navigable fairway will mean that the large container ships will be able to arrive and depart at virtually all stages of the tide. At present, large ships can move only during a limited high water period. This great improvement will mean that the incidence of delay will be substantially reduced. Ipswich traffic can be given the right of passage over vessels going to and from the new berths on the rare occasions when problems arise. I very much hope that the port of Ipswich will negotiate on the basis of this handsome offer that has been made to it for priority wherever problems might arise.

I turn to the argument on jobs in Ipswich. I was sorry to see the announcement the other day of a loss of jobs in the port of Ipswich. No doubt the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) will wish to comment on that. In Felixstowe, where a large number of Ipswich dockers work, there is an industrial relations record second to none in the British ports industry. The 1,100 members of the TGWU at Felixstowe refused last year to join the second national strike. Felixstowe is, however, a closed shop. All employees belong to the TGWU, and they voted overwhelmingly in favour of this expansion plan at their last mass meeting. The convener of the TGWU at the port said:

"I support the expansion of the port of Felixstowe for three main reasons: firstly, because it gives the existing members of our work force increased job security; secondly, because it gives the people of East Anglia generally the opportunity to get more work from or through the port of Felixstowe; and finally and perhaps more importantly, this port is vital to our region's growth. I feel very much for the unemployed in Suffolk whose numbers have risen alarmingly."

I hope that those remarks will be taken seriously.

I turn to the environmental aspects. Suffolk county council gave careful thought to the Bill and decided not to oppose it. Suffolk district council voted by a narrow majority not to withdraw its petition. The vote was 24 to 22, but I understand that there were several others present who did not vote because they had a direct interest in the port. A small number of other petitioners are concerned with the environment. I want to say to them that, for five years, I was an environment Minister, and I had particular responsibility for coastal and waterway matters. No one can possibly doubt the attractions of the River Orwell and its adjacent mud flats, especially to water fowl and to all those, including myself, who enjoy sailing in the estuary. I understand that the hon. Member for Ipswich is an old sailor in the estuary.

I pledge that I shall not be a party to the Bill's going on to the statute book unless, on balance, the disbenefits it may bring to the overall local environment are outweighed by the environmental benefits that will be required of the promoters by way of widening the river, tree planting and landscaping schemes and other appropriate arrangements. Obviously, it would be up to the Opposed Private Bill Committee to consider how far the commitments that the port has already made to environmental safeguards are adequate, but the facts to date make nonsense of such widely publicised scare headlines as "Environmental catastrophe."

The balance sheet of losses and gains on offer so far is as follows. On the losses side, 140 acres of mud flats and salt marsh would be taken into the new wharfage; but, on the gains side, there would be 87 acres of new woods and tree belts, including no fewer than 500,000 new trees—most of them, I hope, of local varieties—and 20 acres of new wetlands, 10 acres of orchid meadow and 15 acres of extra tree belts, all of which would be subject to discussion with the planning authority. Another loss would be the half-mile of river wall footpath that would disappear, but the gains would be two new footpaths doubling the path length and the 1½ miles of river wall path which would remain and sections of it which would be upgraded to bridleways for the benefit of riders.

Whether these safeguards are sufficient is up to the Opposed Private Bill Committee, but I want to remind the House of a few points of perspective. First, the shore line of the River Orwell is 22 miles long. The proposed extension covers half a mile of that shoreline—2·5 per cent. only of the total area. It can hardly be described as an "environmental catastrophe" when 97·5 per cent. of the shoreline remains untouched.

Secondly, there is an area of outstanding natural beauty, accounting for 151 square miles of the county of Suffolk. I care deeply for that AONB, but I remind the House that the port extension is just one third of one square mile of the total of 151 square miles.

Thirdly, the area that is earmarked for expansion is environmentally less attractive than the upper reaches of the Orwell. I have walked that area, as have my hon. Friends.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I think that the hon. Gentleman will admit that the area that he has described as mud flats is of importance in terms of the international environment and is a site covered by the RAMSAR convention on wetlands of international importance. It is recognised internationally as a site that is of such prime importance for wild fowl that it deserves the protection which we thought areas of outstanding natural beauty received.

Mr. Griffiths: I shall respond to the hon. Gentleman's points shortly.

The upper reaches of the Orwell are really attractive. The Trimley marshes are important, as the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) said, but they are mainly reclaimed land. Upstream, where there is to be no further expansion, as Trinity college has made crystal clear, the banks of the estuary become more undulating, wooded, natural and beautiful, and they must be protected.

Fourthly—I come, though glancingly, to the point made by the hon. Member for Wentworth—Felixstowe recognises, as I do, that the Orwell is a valuable feeding ground for birds, especially waders. The port is, therefore, financing 75 per cent. of the cost of an extensive bird count survey. But the area of the dock extension is crucial for only three of the 30 species of birds that have been studied by the Suffolk Trust for Nature Conservation. Moreover, the trust's report—not the port company's—shows a considerable movement of the birds within the Rivers Orwell and Stour. That has strengthened the view that Felixstowe's development would displace a relatively small number of birds and would not disrupt the ecological balance of the estuary as a whole. Felixstowe has, nevertheless, offered the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the Nature Conservancy Council a 25-acre wetland on the adjoining marshes to provide an alternative habitat. That is very similar to the internationally recognised Minsmere project in Suffolk where the flooding of 25 acres of land has been spectacularly successful.

After some years of service as an environment Minister, I can say that the Orwell land and seascape has largely been moulded by man. That is true of most of Britain's heritage. Therefore, I look to the opportunity of Felixstowe's expansion to take steps to ensure that the overall impact shall ensure as least as much enhancement for the environment as detraction from it.

I come finally to the broader national arguments of those who say that they are against the Bill because, it is said, we already have too much port capacity. Indeed we do, but, sadly, it is in the wrong place. One of the many mistakes that I made as a transport Minister was to put £45 million into the development of Seaforth dock in Liverpool and a further £40 million into the new west dock in Bristol. Although I wish both those ports well, I have to say that, looking back, it was an investment that would have been better placed in those areas of the country that could get a greater share of the large ocean-going trade and the container trade that is so important to the country.

The central point about containers is that, carried as they are, on the big ships, they tend to be distributed within the country no longer by small vessels putting into every individual haven. How I wish that were still true. They are landed in one mother port and then carried round the country on the rail and motorway networks. That is the reality of containers. More and more we find that the great world-girdling container lines seek to stop in only one port in north-west Europe, and that port tends more and more to be Rotterdam. As a consequence, about one fifth of all the containers handled today in Rotterdam are destined for, or originate from, Britain.

Unless we can allow a modern port such as Felixstowe to develop, we shall find more and more that we are adding to the costs of our exports and imports because of the extra charge made for shunting those boxes back and forth across the North sea and then transloading them at considerable expense on to the large ocean-going vessels in Rottendam.

Sir Julian Ridsdale (Harwich): When my hon. Friend says that ports such as Ipswich should be allowed to develop, I agree with him. But will he couple it with Harwich as well?

Mr. Griffiths: I am sure that Harwich is expanding and will continue to expand. As long as it has my hon. Friend as its Member of Parliament, its success is ensured. It may be that he will wish to tell the House that in the course of the debate.

The national argument against this Bill simple does not stand up. I put it to the House that there is, on the one side, the merit of allowing the Bill to proceed and, on the other, there are the very real consequences of the House rejecting it.

Let us suppose that the Bill is refused a Second Reading. The best advice that I can obtain suggests a number of consequences. First, half the shippers at present using Felixstowe and planning to expand their trade there have said that they would switch their main trade to continental ports. I have explained why. They need to have access to the large ocean-going vessels.

Secondly, if we reject the Bill, there will be the immediate loss of £30 million or £40 million of new construction work in the Felixstowe port area. There will be the consequential loss of millions of pounds worth of orders for cranes and other port machinery, all of which, since Felixstowe is a "Buy British" company, will mean the loss of British jobs. Beyond that, there will be the loss of another 2,400 jobs which Felixstowe expects to be created indirectly in the Ipswich-Felixstowe area.

It is in that connection that I want to deal with some of the objections that the hon. Member for Ipswich made in the local press. The district officer of the Transport and General Workers Union for Ipswich is Mr. Peter Partridge. He wrote to the hon. Gentleman the other day strongly objecting to his using phrases such as if Felixstowe was allowed to expand. Mr. Partridge wrote:

"Ipswich becoming a ghost port"

"As Felixstowe has prospered, so has Ipswich, and the two ports are not in competition. The fact that Felixstowe has the capacity to handle large container vessels means that there are more of the feeder-type using the Harwich estuary and of course some of those find Ipswich the more convenient port."

The convener continues:

"Another point that you should be aware of is that about 25 per cent. at present of employees at Felixstowe are living in Ipswich and these are, or were, possible Labour voters."

I quote a final comment about Ipswich made by Mr. Brendan Lamb, the chairman of the Transport and General Workers Union shop stewards throughout East Anglia. Referring to Ipswich and its recent number of redundancies, he writes:

"The news of these redundancies comes against a background in which our local Member of Parliament is effectively attempting to push new trade away from the region's ports by blocking the development of Felixstowe. Yet news of jobs losses at Ipswich shows how badly we require this further development in order to secure extra trade and to guarantee the economic well being of the local economy. I am amazed that a Labour MP should actively oppose expansion at the port of Felixstowe, which will create a very large number of new jobs in a region where unemployment figures have doubled in the past five years."

I am sure that that quotation from the statement of Mr. Brendan Lamb of the Transport and General Workers Union will be taken seriously by Opposition Members.

There would be further consequence if the House denied the Bill a Second Reading. We should be sending out a message to the watching world that the British Parliament was not even prepared to consider in detail the expansion of our most successful and profitable port. None of the economic arguments would even get to be considered in detail by the House. None of the navigational safeguards which Felixstowe has offered to Ipswich and to Harwich would even be examined. Nor would the ecological and environmental objections ever be thrashed out, as the Opposed Private Bill Committee would want to thrash them out, so that some balance could be found whereby the environment in that area was enhanced as well as subjected to expansion.

I repeat the undertaking that I gave at the outset of my remarks. The promoters are prepared to meet any reasonable conditions that the Opposed Private Bill Committee may wish to add to the safeguards for the environment, to the legitimate navigational interests of the ports of Harwich and Ipswich and to the wishes of the local authorities in respect of planning matters. I beg the House not to kill this Bill on Second Reading. It is a good Bill —good for Felixstowe, good for East Anglia and good for the British economy.

7.30 pm

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): I thank the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) for a strong and clear statement of the case, which is what I would have expected from him. I oppose the Bill for constituency reasons and for reasons of general principle.

The hon. Member has tried to hit me with everything except the stool on which I sit and has accused me, among other things, of not knowing what my constituency interest is. I invite him to examine my political record in East Anglia, which will show that I know very well what the constituency interest is. I have been the principal objector to the Bill, both inside and outside the House, and this Second Reading debate gives me an opportunity to say why I object to it, and to put my views firmly on record. My first major objection is the potentially lethal effect of the Bill on the performance and commercial prosperity on the port of Ipswich.

Before I deal with the brass tacks, I shall make two preliminary points. First, I am not per se opposed to Felixstowe providing more competition through an expansion in its capacity, because it would be unreasonable for me to be so. That is investment, and the ebb and flow of commerce, and the port of Ipswich and anyone else has to face that fact. Secondly, nor am I objecting to the expansion of Felixstowe as a free enterprise port. I have no ideological objections to that. I am a strong supporter of the mixed economy in the ports industry. I am prepared to put on record the fact that, through managerial efficiency and good industrial relations, the port of Felixstowe has set what is in many ways of an excellent example to others.

I make it clear that I am objecting to the particular expansion brought about by the Bill, for particular reasons. I clear up one point. Ipswich has grown substantially in recent years, not because of the crumbs that have fallen from Felixstowe's table, but for a group of reasons, including our geographical proximity to Europe, our efficiency and the skill with which it serves its economic hinterland. Although it is the case that Ipswich and Felixstowe statistically have expanded together, the relationship between the two sets of figures is not necessarily causal. That is the oldest logical fallacy in the world.

I am willing to admit that in the trade that has occurred in this part of Britain there is a market square effect. Felixstowe has expanded for good reasons, and there has been a spin-off effect in Ipswich, but predominantly it is the case that Ipswich has expanded for a particular group of reasons. However, even if I conceded that Ipswich and its expansion were geared to Felixstowe and the expansion that is taking place there, that would not alter my argument, because the future is different from the past and we are now in a new and critical situation. Ipswich faces the Felixstowe march upstream, and that has altered the situation substantially.

As an operational port, Ipswich is situated at the head of the Orwell estuary and is approached by 9 miles of estuarial channel. It is naturally concerned by any developments that take place at the estuarial mouth, and this is precisely what will happen if the Bill is passed, as it extends the port of Felixstowe further into the Orwell estuary to Fagbury point and into the designated jurisdiction area of Ipswich port authority. This will involve a major extension of quay face and the installation of major cargo handling capacity.

An important point has not been resolved, but I wish that it had been, because then I could leave all this section out of my speech. It would save me a lot of hassle if the matter had been resolved, but I am sorry to say that it has not been. Serious navigational difficulties will arise if the Bill is passed, and I took professional opinion on the point this afternoon as I prepared notes for my speech. Large ships will be engaged in berthing and unberthing manoeuvres, and when these manoeuvres take place the approaches to and the exit from the Orwell will be severely restricted.

To underline the point I shall quote from a document, not because this is the only opinion that I have taken, but because it puts the point better than I could put it. The quotation comes from the Ipswich port authority's observations to the Department of Transport, which says:

"Admiralty Chart No 2693 has superimposed upon it Felixstowe's proposed quay line from the Bill's deposited plan, and an 1800 feet diameter turning circle, which Felixstowe's management consider to be necessary for manoeuvring the smaller vessels using the proposed quay. Large vessels not capable of being turned without grounding would be turned further down stream and towed to or from the berths. It can be readily seen from the chart that these actions would totally block the approaches to Ipswich whilst the manoeuvre was being carried out. Since all but the smallest vessels leaving Ipswich are unable to turn in the Orwell there would be considerable disruption and delay occasioned to avoid a close quarters situation developing off the proposed berths."

In the face of this, Ipswich's defences against what is a potential calamity will disappear. Part VIII of the Ipswich Dock Act 1971—I could quote other dock Acts in support — gives Ipswich clear power to keep our navigation lines clear. This will be amended and cease to give us authority, and thus protection. Such amendments will cause direct damage and may cause serious complications. I could cut down all this complicated argument by saying that if the Bill is passed it will succeed in impeding the access to, and exit from, Ipswich from time to time, causing us considerable difficulty.

I wish that this were not so. If I could negotiate out of that I would, but I cannot, which is why I am making this point. We shall be strangled, and I am the constituency Member responsible. It is my obligation to stand up in the House and say so.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): This is a crucial point. My hon. Friend will recall that I visited the port of Ipswich two or three weeks ago and had conversations with the chief executive of the port. He led me to believe that if he were to get a written guarantee that traffic in the river would not be altered and would not cause problems to the Ipswich port, some of his fears might be allayed. I understand that that indemnification was not forthcoming. Therefore, what my hon. Friend is saying about the problems of navigation in the Orwell estuary is a point which the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) should take seriously.

Mr. Weetch: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. That is so. I do not want to give too much detail on this matter, but my most recent correspondence relating to the amendment to put navigation matters into the hands of the Harwich harbour board shows that it in no way meets our objections. I wish that it did.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: Is not the central point this, that at the moment large vessels can get into that part of the estuary only at certain points of the tide, but with the deepening and widening there will be access for large vessels throughout the 24-hour period? Consequently, with the scenario described by the hon. Gentleman, there would not be many blockages compared with the problems that now exist.

Mr. Weetch: I do not accept that, though I wish that I could. I have had protracted and intensive discussions with professional pilotage opinion. The problems will remain. Frankly, they will remain to such an extent that they will threaten our commercial viability.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): My hon. Friend will be aware that the consequences of widening and deepening any estuary can never be guaranteed. In many instances, when there has been deepening and widening, it has had a disastrous effect on other parts of the river. Therefore, there is no way that the argument can be put with any certainty that deepening and widening will not have an effect on the river in other places.

Mr. Weetch: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. It has been said to me that the alteration to the estuary might upset its natural balance. No research has taken place. We have no hard and fast guarantee as to what will happen. It is unpredictable. I cannot accept the possibility of commercial risks for Ipswich, or the unpredictability. We should have reasonable certainty about the matter, but there is no way that we can have it.

Ipswich has expanded considerably. It is the fourth container port in the kingdom. It is the first port in the kingdom for short sea containers. It leads the East Anglian grain trade. We are the first in Britain for wheat, and in the top six for all grains. We are efficient. We turn the ships round fast, and we have an excellent record in industrial relations. All that is now fatally threatened by the Bill. That is why I am opposing it.

The timing of our largest 10,000-tonne grain ships to clear the estuary at maximum permitted draft is critical in tidal terms. In addition, on short sea container movements, our efficiency has given rise to a very fast turn round so that ships can be used on a 24-hour cycle. For port users, that means a considerable economy in the intensive use of ships. That, too, may be irreparably damaged. Traffic will decline and move elsewhere. The Bill will cripple the port and threaten jobs. There is no point in creating jobs in Felixstowe if one destroys them in Ipswich. That is one of the central points in the matter.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds gave the game away when he said in the Ipswich Evening Star 10 November 1984:

"Ipswich can do well with specialised cargoes."

That may be correct, but what the hon. Gentleman was saying was, "Do not worry. Ipswich can always become a jobbing port for odds and ends." I am not willing to face such a future.

The area in which the Bill will allow Felixstowe to expand has been officially declared to be of outstanding natural beauty. It was designated as such in 1970. There is serious concern and abject despondency among the environmental organisations in Suffolk, as well as nationally, which have petitioned against the Bill. They are alarmed by it because they realise how serious it is. A whole range of environmental organisations have petitioned against the Bill, and I have seen just about all of them. Critical and serious consequences stem from the Bill. The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, the Suffolk Trust for Nature Conservation, the Council for the Protection of Rural England and the Suffolk Preservation Trust are all against it. Therefore, the matter is important.

The area is also a proposed site of special scientific interest. It is the intention of the Nature Conservancy Council to identify the area as one of special scientific interest. However, the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company objects to that. In his speech, the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds made several environmental points. I wonder how valid they are. I have heard one environmentalist in Suffolk, who is not even a Labour voter, but a Conservative voter, saying that if one has to plant half a million trees to soften the environmental consequences, obviously the effect will be devastating. However, I am anticipating my point, which I shall now reach in small steps.

The area is a feeding and resting ground for certain species of birds of national and international importance. I am told by the RSPB that at least four species occur in internationally important numbers and another seven in nationally important numbers. There will also be a substantial visual intrusion. The hon. Gentleman will admit that those dangers are present, so let us come to the crux of the argument.

Two questions must be asked and answered. The first is whether, despite the development, that precious and irreplaceable asset can be saved and adequately protected. The second question is wider. It is whether the development is consistent with the Government's stated intentions towards areas of outstanding natural beauty, made on 29 July 1982. They said that any commercial development had to be of overriding national interest and there had to be no alternative sites. I should like to examine both propositions.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): The hon. Gentleman mentioned national interest. Perhaps he has overlooked the point that it is a proven national interest. Does he agree that the appropriate time for considering the matters of proof will be before the Opposed Private Bill Committee, to which the Bill will be referred?

Mr. Weetch: I accept the substance of that point. In Committee such points can be argued in detail and contested one by one. We are arguing about the principle. I wish to put certain broad points to the House.

First, in October 1984 the county planning officer of Suffolk submitted a report to the county council, which it subsequently ignored. However, the report was quite devastating about the environmental impact. It made two main points, which I shall summarise. It referred, first, to the landscape impact and, secondly, to the ecological implications. Paragraph 9.2.6 said:

"The scale and extent of the proposed development is such that it cannot effectively be screened and at the same time enable the Orwell Estuary to retain the quality of landscape worthy of designation as an AONB."

That is not an argument of one of the participants in the issue. That is an independent assessment in a high-calibre report.

An additional 500,000 trees would not be able to prevent the vertical intrusion of the additional cranes nor the additional glare of security lighting and the noise of night operations. The ecological implications are even more critical. If most of the inter-tidal mud flats and the salt marsh are lost, the supporting conditions will be lost for much of the ecological life which I have outlined.

It seems that the Government are seeking votes from the environmental lobby. We have seen a distinct green edge on the Government in recent months. We now wish to examine the colour of their environmental money. A statement of policy was made in a written answer on 29 July 1982. It read:

"Confirmation of an area of outstanding natural beauty designation order confers formal recognition by the Government that the natural beauty of the landscape in the area identified is of national importance; and that we expect this to be reflected by local authorities in the preparation of structure and local plans and exercise of development control.

The Government agree with the Countryside Commission's view that, in general, it would be inconsistent with the aims of designation to permit the siting of major industrial and commercial development in AONBs. Only proven national interest and lack of alternative sites can justify any exception."

In dealing with areas of outstanding natural beauty the Government gave their

"continued commitment . . . to their safeguarding in the years ahead."—[Official Report, 29 July 1982; Vol. 28, c. 709-10.]

The written answer stated that any proposal to disturb and invade areas of outstanding natural beauty would receive "rigorous examination". I wonder how rigorous the examination will be in this instance. We are debating the test case for the entire policy.

If these issues are the criteria, the argument of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds falls. There are other port sites where this form of development could take place. There is excess capacity in the docks industry. Expert opinion suggests that there will be excess capacity, especially in the container trades, as far ahead as one can see. There is an alternative across the other side of the river at Bath Side bay. If press comment is reliable, a deep sea container port will be developed at Bath Side bay. That will rival Felixstowe itself. If trade does not increase in the way that is suggested by some, we shall have two massive white elephants facing each other across the estuary. It has yet to be demonstrated to me that the real increase in traffic will be such that it will absorb the present excess capacity and the potential capacity of the ports industry.

I have no doubt that the development will benefit the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company. I can understand a commercial company trying to increase its share of the trade, but to argue that that is in the national interest is another matter. That is an argument which I reject.

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): My hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) know much more about the issues lying behind the proposed development than I do. However, will my hon. Friend confirm that the Bath Side Bay Development Act 1972 provided for substantial construction works in the nature of port development? Does he recall that as recently as 1980 a Conservative Transport Minister extended the provisions within that measure until 1992 so that the proposed developments could be proceeded with in due course? Are these matters not pertinent to the debate?

Mr. Weetch: Indeed, they are extremely relevant. I thank my hon. Friend for raising them in the course of my speech.

The third section of my speech will be directed to national port considerations. The arguments involved are not simple and the complexities are many. Difficult projections and predictions are entailed. However, it is obvious to everyone concerned that the issues thrown up by the debate are very much wider than those involving the Orwell estuary. The central argument is the contention that there is an overriding national interest that the development should take place. If that is so, we are thrown back to two more questions.

Is the likely growth in deep-sea container traffic likely to justify this increase in dock capacity, bearing in mind that there is surplus capacity in other ports, many of which are capable of further expansion? Is there an advantage in the Felixstowe development from the standpoint of attracting real trade growth, as opposed to taking trade from other ports on the south and east coasts?

We are in complicated statistical and commercial waters. The research that I have done myself and that which I have had done for me highlight the difficulties of predicting future volumes and flows of traffic. The difficulties are by no means inconsiderable. I shall quote from two pieces of independent research. The first quotation comes from a report from the marine transport centre of the University of Liverpool. The second comes from a piece of research that was undertaken for Suffolk county council by the former secretary of the National Ports Council, Mr. K. A. Heathcote.

The conclusions of these two independent assessments are remarkably similar on principle. They state that while traffic in Felixstowe has grown at a rapid rate, this has stemmed largely from a two-pronged process of substitution. Felixstowe has taken a lot of traffic formerly passing through other ports. This in turn has been related to the technical switch to containerisation and the geographical switch to the east coast. This has led to a high rate of growth, but it is largely a once-and-for-all substitution growth and it will not recur because the underlying factors promoting it are losing their intensity.

If we examine commercial statistics for the major cargo groups spread over near, short and deep-sea containers from 1967 until 1984—I choose 1967 because that is roughly when the container deep-sea trades started—certain features are brought sharply into focus. First, Felixstowe is primarily a deep-sea container port, and the Bill aims to extend its deep-sea facilities. From 1967 until 1984 commerce in manufactures has expanded substantially for both exports and imports. However, the deep-sea trade has scarcely participated in that growth. In 1984, the volume of deep-sea exports was above the 1967 level by only about 500,000 tonnes. It was even below the 1976 figures. The trend in the deep-sea container section of manufacturing commerce is downwards. If that continues, the demand for deep-sea container facilities will decline further.

The second most important cargo group is foodstuffs. In 1984 this section had 27 per cent. of deep-sea container traffic. Although the figures are more difficult to interpret, they show a decline from deep-sea areas. The position is similar for basic materials and fuels. Deep-sea containerisation is still only 13 per cent. of the total and is unlikely to grow.

The main conclusion is that in cargo areas which are most likely to grow there has already been a great deal of deep-sea container penetration, which is unlikely to grow much further.

Side by side with that, however, is the fact that the deep-sea container trades of the United Kingdom are not short of port capacity. The present expansion through the Trinity terminal at Felixstowe gives the company a further two berths, while the one before the House into Trimely marshes provides a further three. That will be five extra berths.

It is difficult to see how that can be used to capacity without taking over most of the deep-sea traffic of the United Kingdom. I should not be surprised if that were not the aim. Even if it takes a fraction of the traffic, Felixstowe's expansion will be at the expense of other ports, where there will be a loss of traffic, a decline and redundancies. That is what will happen in East Anglia, and Ipswich will be the first casualty, which is why I am on my feet.

Given the massive efforts that the Government have made, and the substantial financial investment that they have had to make to reduce capacity to the demand, surely it is lunacy to create more capacity at a time of excess. The Felixstowe expansion serves no national need. I challenge the Bill's advocates to demonstrate that it is in the national interest, because they cannot do so. The expansion serves the interests of the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company and Trinity college, which is one of the grasping landlords that we face in East Anglia.

The case will be that it is in the national interest, but some people are involved, not in the national interest, but to make a fast buck for commercial reasons. I oppose the Bill and advise the House to reject it.

8.2 pm

Sir Julian Ridsdale (Harwich): The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) based his case on three contentions. The first related to environmental disadvantage. I shall not reply to that except to say, as a keen wild fowler in East Anglia, that he exaggerates his case and fears.

Secondly, he contended that the proposed extension of the port would take trade from other United Kingdom ports. He does not appreciate the real reason for the extension of the port facility. In Harwich we hope to have the port facilities extended in exactly the same way. We see the need to try and get the trade which at present goes to Rotterdam into the container ports of Harwich and Felixstowe. That would help our balance of payments. Goods would not have to be offloaded at Rotterdam and brought across the North sea in small ships. This is the reason for the dredging which is taking place in both Harwich and Felixstowe, but I shall not go into the matter in detail because it can be dealt with in Committee.

The Bill serves the national interest. Trade will not be taken from other ports, but we shall compete with the main Continental port of Rotterdam. We wish to save our balance of payments by deepening the harbours on both the Harwich and Felixstowe sides of the river. I am delighted at the spoil from dredging at both Felixstowe and Harwich, and that in Harwich we shall also have more berths. I do not oppose what Felixstowe is doing because it is in the national interest. I know that Felixstowe will not oppose us when we extend our port in Harwich.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of navigational difficulties and the fear of navigation. I have consulted pilots in

[Sir Julian Ridsdale]

Harwich, and my information is that navigational difficulties are not great. Obviously, there will be difficulties, but with dredging and the expansion of the facilities, there will constantly be a 24-hour turn round. That will enable the traffic to come to the port of Ipswich. The hon. Gentleman exaggerated the fears about that.

Mr. Loyden: I wish to return to a point I made previously. With all due respect to pilots, they act on the hydrographic surveys that take place on a river, and their information is based on them. Pilots cannot predict the consequences of changes in a port, which alter the meandering of a river or its siltation, or create new banks. No one can foresee that. In a sense that means that our approach to rivers is unscientific. The pilots are not in a position to say that there will be no problems because they cannot know until extremely detailed surveys have been carried out, and, even then, there is no guarantee of the consequences.

Sir Julian Ridsdale: I am sure that the pilots in Harwich and Felixstowe are well aware of the hon. Gentleman's point. Harwich will be the navigational authority and its pilots will decide when and where the turning will happen. Felixstowe has offered priority of passage to and from Ipswich. The point about pilotage has been exaggerated. With the good common sense that prevails in the port of Stour and the Orwell, there will be free passage of ships up the Orwell.

Ever since I became a Member there has been co-operation between the haven ports and we have had good discussions about many matters. I deplore the fact that I must come to the House to argue with the hon. Member for Ipswich. I am sure that with good sense we can find an agreement. I have every confidence that the pilots and the Harwich pilotage authority, which is co-operating with Ispwich, can achieve the objectives.

Opponents of the Bill raised the point about over-investment in capacity. I ask them to look where that over-investment has taken place in Liverpool and Bristol. As the Member for Harwich, I have taken part in many debates about investment policy in Committee on legislation to deal with the nationalisation of the ports. Each time I have said that our investment was in the wrong place. It was a complete waste of money to invest in the west coast, especially as we were to join the European community, where the trade would be. I ask those who oppose the Bill to consider where our trade by sea is. It is in the Thames estuary, the Channel and the North sea.

Mr. Stott: Is the hon. Gentleman denying that there is over-capacity in port facilities in the United Kingdom? I ask him to remember that Southampton, which is a major container port, was almost taken out because of a protracted industrial dispute—hardly anything moved in the port for almost six months — but the enormous capacity that it normally undertakes was absorbed by Tilbury and other British ports. The hon. Gentleman, with his knowledge of the ports industry, cannot say that there is no over-capacity when we all know that there is.

Sir Julian Ridsdale: That is history. We are talking now about reality and the challenge ahead. Harwich and Felixstowe are dredging the river because they wish to take trade from the port of Rotterdam. It will be in the national interest, and we can do it if the Bill gets a Second Reading. That will not only cause Felixstowe to expand, but Felixstowe and the Government I hope, will support an expansion at Bath Side, Harwich, as well.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) on his excellent presentation of the case, and I have no hesitation in supporting the Second Reading of the Bill.

8.11 pm

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): I shall speak only briefly, because on such occasions it is a courtesy in the House to recognise that hon. Members more acquainted with the area concerned should have most of the time that is available to make important points on behalf of their constituents.

Private Bills are always matters of significance and are sometimes much more controversial than public Bills. From the outset, they express the determination of special interests; and, because they do so, they impinge immediately on the interests of others in the area. Therefore, there are conflicts, and hon. Members on both sides of the House are often divided because of the interests that are being expressed.

The Bill seeks to extend the limits of the Felixstowe port authority north-west into the Orwell estuary, which is under the jurisdiction of the Ipswich port authority. The latter is understandably worried, because not only will the dock workers' employment scheme not apply under the Bill, but the Felixstowe port authority will have jurisdiction over and responsibility for making regulations for motor traffic on the dock roads and in all places within the limits defined in the Bill. Therefore, if the powers and responsibilities accorded to Ipswich port authority in many Acts and orders between 1852 and 1979 will cease to apply, this Second Reading debate should contain a word of caution. In Standing Committee, we must at least examine the details so that the promoters' case can be seen to be proved.

We all recognise that facet of the business of the House. The Standing Committee stage of a public Bill often presents Second Reading opportunities, but a private Bill does the opposite. Those who are selected to serve on the Standing Committee must operate in an almost quasi-judicial role to ensure that the case is proved. I am the chairman of the departmental transport committee of the parliamentary Labour party, and it worries me that, on such matters of principle, hon. Members who are not affected by the tides of local opinion should advise the House on how best to consider such Bills.

We must ask whether there is an alternative. I referred earlier in a short intervention to the Bath Side Bay Development Act 1972. The Committee which dealt with that Bill examined in detail areas for possible redevelopment and reconstruction in the Orwell area. That examination persuaded the Secretary of State for Transport, who must have considered the matter with great care, that the period for possible extensions and port developments should be increased to 1992. Therefore, the Government intended this to be a site for port development that would not adversely affect the jurisdictional responsibilities of the Ipswich port authority. It that is the case, the Standing Committee should consider that aspect of the problem carefully. If there is an alternative site for development that will avoid placing Ipswich in the position which the Bill seems to place it—of providing a buffer zone between itself and the open sea because of the proposed development at Felixstowe — and Felixstowe can still have the same trading advantages, the Standing Committee will have a great opportunity to decide whether the case for the Bill is proven.

When a local authority such as Ipswich borough council, working in close harmony with its port authority, believes——

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: It does not oppose the Bill.

Mr. Leadbitter: I stand to be corrected, because I do not come from the area, but if Ipswich borough council is working in close conjunction with the Ipswich port authority in their common interest to preserve their jurisdiction rights, we must consider how best to judge their position. As I understand it, the Ipswich port authority has discharged its responsibilities with considerable efficiency.

Mr. Weetch: Perhaps I could clarify that point for my hon. Friend. Ipswich borough council and the Ipswich port authority are petitioners against the Bill. The entire council—Conservative and Labour—opposes the Bill, so this is not a party political matter.

Mr. Leadbitter: That is the great advantage of hon. Members from the area doing their work——

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: I have just taken advice, and I can tell the House that the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) is incorrect. Ipswich borough council and the port authority are not petitioners against the Bill.

Mr. Leadbitter: This is an occasion when those of us who have been in the House for a long time can sit back and allow a matter to be corrected in the interests of comprehension. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman and to my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich. I cannot lose, and am trying to be helpful from a distance.

I am informed that the Ipswich port authority has carried out its responsibilities under the Acts and orders that have prevailed for more than a century, in that it has provided good safety provisions, excellent navigation and, above all, an understanding of a developing social consideration—leisure pursuits on the river. There are some 1,700 pleasure craft on the river. The port authority has been able to combine commercial and leisure activities in such a way as to avoid conflict.

The records of Ipswich and the Felixstowe port authority are good. No one quarrels with their reputations, but my advice to the House is that as one, in its exuberance, wants to extend into the jurisdiction of the other, it is the responsibility of the House of Commons not to be satisfied merely by good Second Reading speeches. It must add a small caveat that if the Bill goes to Standing Committee, the Committee must ask itself whether the Bill's promoters have proved their case. That is what we should demand of the Standing Committee.

8.21 pm

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): It is a curious experience for me as a former Clerk of the House to hear a member of the Chairman's Panel inform the House that a private Bill, if it receives a Second Reading, will go to a Standing Committee. It will not. It will go to an Opposed Private Bill Committee.

Mr. Leadbitter: It was merely a slip of the tongue. It is not a great debating point.

Mr. Rhodes James: The hon. Gentleman repeated the remark several times.

The debate is of personal interest to me and to many hon. Members on both sides of the House, because Felixstowe is linked in our memory with our late colleague, Keith Wickenden, who was a special and remarkable Member of the House who spoke seldom, but when he did it was with great impact. His early death was a great loss to the House and the country.

I have to declare a direct constituency interest. When the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) referred to Trinity college going for a quick buck, I thought that he was referring to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Sir A. Buck). However, I then realised that the hon. Gentleman was making an observation about the college and my constituency, with which I should like to deal immediately. Trinity college is the owner of the land. If the Bill were to be passed, the income would be substantial, but no individual fellow of Trinity or the college will benefit because the college is a major benefactor of poorer colleges, the university as a whole and, above all, foreign students, in particular from Third-world countries. Any revenue derived from the Bill will be directly and entirely devoted to the cause of higher education in Cambridge and East Anglia. I hope that that deals with that nonsense.

I should like to refer to a book by Segal Quince and Partners called "The Cambridge Phenomenon." It is not, I hasten to add, the long and eagerly awaited biography of myself. It relates to what has happened in Cambridge over the past eight years, which happens to be the period during which I have represented Cambridge. In Cambridge, ten years ago, there were 100 technology and scientific companies, and now there are 150. Trinity college's science park has been very much the result of the investment in Felixstowe, which the hon. Member for Ipswich so derides. When I was elected to represent Cambridge eight years ago, the park had one firm employing fewer than 40 people. Today, there are more than 40 firms employing over 1,400 people.

Last year, three new companies were formed in the city of Cambridge every month. Segal Quince and Partners, analysing why that was so, said that a major factor was communications "to increase the accessibility of Cambridge to most parts of the country, London and the east coast port of Felixstowe being probably the most valuable connections."

The authors further stated:

"The Cambridge phenomenon now has firm foundations and substantial potential for sustained future development . . . it represents one of the very few spontaneous growth centres in a national economy that has been depressed for all of a decade —and certainly the only one where growth is being led by high technology industry, and indigenous and small companies at that."

In that process—communications and exports for old as well as new industries—East Anglia has been crucial. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) has emphasised, Felixstowe is a success story. The proposals before the House will directly create 3,000 new jobs in port and ancillary services.

The hon. Member for Ipswich talked about the environment. As the House will be aware, for several years I was a senior consultant on the environment for the United Nations. I am a conservationist. I have studied the proposals made by Trinity college and the Bill, and they are remarkable—500,000 trees, careful landscaping, and the skilful use of the river frontage.

The hon. Member for Ipswich may not be aware of the fact that I know the river well. I have sailed on it since I was a child. It is one for which I feel strongly. I also feel strongly about the local environment. To go as far as he did about a scheme which covers one third of a square mile and only half a mile of 22 miles of rather grotty shoreline is carrying his argument too far.

I believe in the Bill not merely because of my constituency interest but because of my East Anglian interest. It is an area which needs further opportunities for exports, initiative and inventiveness. We in Cambridge and East Anglia have proved, as Felixstowe has proved, that if other parts of the country were to follow our example, it would be greatly in the national interest.

If the Bill were to be denied a Second Reading, it would be an act of cynical hostility to people who have demonstrated what they can do, what they have done and what they will do in future.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Those hon. Members who have so far spoken are directly involved and almost all politically based in the East Anglian region and I am not. I hesitated therefore before I decided to speak, but I do so for a number of reasons. It is fashionable nowadays to declare a non-pecuniary interest as well as a pecuniary one. I do so as a member of the council of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and one who is deeply worried about the environment.

I can well understand the anxieties of Members who are interested in generating economic activities in their areas. I have a great deal of sympathy for that approach because we desperately need to stimulate economic activity in my area as well.

I am slightly familiar with the locality. I served in that part of the country in the Air Force a long time ago. I was there on holiday last summer when I visited Minsmere and Havergate Island. I realised what a tremendous tourist attraction exists in that delightful part of Britain. I am as anxious as anyone in Suffolk, and perhaps more than some Conservative Members, that the tourist potential of that attractive area shall not be destroyed for short-term economic advantage.

One point which has not yet been made in the debate is that this port development may be embarrassed by the establishment of the Channel tunnel. When the Under-Secretary of State for Transport replies to the debate I hope that he will refer to the very substantial surplus of port capacity in Britain. One imagines that Conservatives in the Southampton area would expect the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) to participate in the debate. I make that point not merely in order to refer to the existing surplus of port capacity but to reflect upon the effect on Felixstowe, Harwich, Ipswich and many other ports when the cross-channel link is established. It surprises me that this point has not been made because every Conservative Member would vote for the establishment of a Channel link. If Conservative Members are prepared to vote for a Channel link today, one imagines that they recognise the impact that it would have and that therefore such a massive expansion as is suggested at Felixstowe may not be necessary.

I must also emphasise that conservation bodies would describe the area which is to be destroyed as an area which is rather more important than an area of unattractive mud flats, which seems to be the accepted description of Conservative Members. Other parts of East Anglia may be more attractive and deserving of concern, but those mud flats are absolutely vital. Mud flats are becoming more vital to wildfowl as each year passes because of the scale of the destruction of wetlands in western Europe. The British Isles have made a real contribution to the destruction of those wetlands.

Conservation bodies in Britain are very pleased indeed that in recent years the Government have made repeated and emphatic claims to be the party which deserves the support of those who are interested in green issues. During the last 12 months there have been repeated claims in the media that the conservationist must associate himself with the Conservative party. It will be interesting to hear how the Under-Secretary of State for Transport defends, if he is to defend, this further destruction of the habitat. The Conservative party claims that it is concerned about green issues, the ecology and the environment, but it has done very little indeed to assist such issues and on occasion after occasion it has absolutely blocked the advancement of the conservation causes which the green lobby has espoused.

The Ramblers Association wrote to me last week about this matter. It pointed out that almost every conservation body in Britain—certainly the conservation bodies in East Anglia—is very much opposed to this development. It points out in a splendid paragraph that the Government's policy on major developments in such areas was set out by the Secretary of State for the Environment in July 1982 and that it would be inconsistent with the aims of designating such areas to permit such development unless there is a proven national need and a lack of alternative sites. That policy has always been thought to command comprehensive and all-party support. If there is to be a departure from that policy, I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will devote sufficient time to defending any departure from that policy. If there is to be such a departure, the Under-Secretary must understand that the irritation and anger that has been generated in the ranks of conservation bodies by the Government's approach and attitude in recent years will become even greater.

Since a substantial number of Conservative Members are listening to the debate, many of whom may still be seeking to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I think it would be wrong if I did not express my deep regret, which I hope all hon. Members who are listening to the debate share, that, despite their so-called concern for green issues which are frequently expressed by the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party, not a single member of those parties is present for the debate. It suggests to me that when the voters of Suffolk decide that they have had enough of the party of the hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) my hon. Friend who now so ably represents Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) will be leading an army back to the House after the next general election. The absence of the alliance parties and their negligence is utterly deplorable. I should have liked them to be in the Chamber to witness the embarrassment of Conservative Member after Conservative Member seeking to defend the destruction of a vitally important international wetland on the grounds that it comprises only a few acres of mudflats and that it does not really matter and seeking to ignore the reality of the prospects for investment if the Channel tunnel is proceeded with.

I am also reminded that the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds commissioned Dr. Gilman, an eminent and highly qualified person, of the marine transport centre to look at this matter in a fair and unbiased way. I know that the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) assured the House, because of his own interest in wildfowl, that the Bill would not damage wildfowl. The RSPB is a very important, large and highly regarded organisation. No hon. Member would deny that the staff of the RSPB are dedicated and very able people. The evidence that has been given by the society either to the House or to Committees in recent years has always been of the highest quality. Therefore, I trust that no Conservative Member will seek to diminish the powerful argument that is presented in the report provided for the society by Dr. Gilman. His case is formidable.

I do not wish to delay the House — as a Yorkshireman it would be wrong of me to delay the House on an East Anglian matter—but may I summarise what is said by Dr. Gilman:

"I do not believe that the expansion of deep sea container port facilities at Felixstowe will serve any important national need, whilst if it creates any local benefits this will be only at the expense of other areas."

This will be at the expense not of Rotterdam but of other areas in this country where investment may already have taken place. Dr. Gilman points out on the other side of the equation that there would be the irreplaceable loss of an area of outstanding natural beauty. In his highly qualified, highly professional assessment, Dr. Gilman finds no evidence to support the conclusions advanced by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) and other Conservative Members.

After studying the evidence presented by Dr. Gilman, which is available to hon. Members and to members of the RSPB, the RSPB made the following points. It has co-petitioned against the Bill, together with the Suffolk Trust for Nature Conservation and a number of other bodies opposing the Bill on nature and landscape conservation grounds, for the following major reasons:

"The Nature Conservancy Council intends to notify a large part of the river Orwell and its foreshore as a Site of Special Scientific Interest under section 28 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981"— an Act which my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), who has so far sat through the debate and who I hope will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, has been seeking to improve. He would have welcomed greater improvement than this Government were prepared to allow. That is to be a site of special scientific interest and the Government have pledged themselves to protect it.

The development site envisaged by the Bill includes a very large part——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): There seems to be great enthusiasm on the part of Conservative Members to protect sites of special scientific interest in general but when a specific site of special scientific interest is considered, they seem to be very happy to let it go.

Mr. Hardy: My hon. Friend is justified in making that remark. I became quite distressed about the Government's lack of enthusiasm. In February or March 1984 I tabled a Bill with all-party support which would have protected sites of special scientific interest. I had hoped that that Bill would go through on the nod in July, but two or three days before that was due to happen I was told that it was technically deficient, although I had not drafted it. An experienced draftsman had been employed and to this day I have never found out what that technical deficiency was. All I know is that since I tabled that Bill in the late winter, early spring 1984 a substantial number of SSSIs have been destroyed and now we are to see another so badly disfigured as to be made useless for conservation purposes.

That site is included in the SSSI that is proposed here. But the reason for the proposition is that that site is of great importance, particularly as an over-wintering area and a migration stop-over for a substantial number of significant species of wading birds and wildfowl. The hon. Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) may imagine that the more common prey species among the wildfowl would not be affected by the Bill, but it is reasonable to assure the House that substantial damage would be done to some important wildfowl species and would mean that we would be failing in our international commitment, a commitment which the Government are supposed to have vigorously and enthusiastically espoused. Six species would be seriously affected.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds assured the House that money will be provided for a bird count. If that is going to be done one would imagine that it would precede the destruction, otherwise one would only be counting the birds and then destroying their habitat. Would people then be prepared to pay for a bird count to see exactly how much havoc they had wrought? Far too much havoc has been wrought on British wetlands, sometimes to provide the extra port capacity that is now lying underused elsewhere.

The estuary is important because, as the Minister will know, the Government recognise the area as a wetland that fulfils the criteria for wetlands of international importance, recognised by parties to the RAMSAR convention. That is important in conservation terms and covers wetlands which are especially relevant as a wild water fowl habitat. The United Kingdom is a signatory to that convention. As Britain already seems to be somewhat sluggardly in its response to that international commitment, we must extract from the Minister whether he, with his colleagues, is prepared to allow Britain to disregard yet another international commitment. He must be aware that Britain is a signatory to that convention.

The proposed development would cause serious damage to the feeding and resting grounds of birds which use this important area. I recognise that birds cannot directly provide the sort of funds that Trinity college may be able to give overseas students. That role of Trinity college is a welcome one, although it is a role which the Government should be fulfilling. If the Government will not do so, I welcome, endorse and applaud Trinity college's record. But it is a record that has become necessary because of the Government's attitude towards education.

I went to Suffolk on holiday last year and it is, as I said, very attractive. It is a splendid area to which many more people in Britain should go instead of perhaps joining in rather congested package tours on the Costa Brava, which hold no appeal for me. As the years pass and sense dawns, so more people in Britain may wish to visit birds on Havergate island rather than queue for sausage and mash in Benidorm.

If Conservative Members are seriously worried about the economy and the prospects of enhancing commercial activity in Suffolk, they will share my recognition that one of the principal employment creators in Britain is tourism. One of the principal aspects of British tourism, which gives us grounds for confidence, is that our ecology, our natural heritage, our areas of outstanding natural beauty, are important. It may well be that Conservative Members and Trinity college will be happy to make some fairly short-term profit from this development, but in doing so they will probably destroy tourist potential and a much larger number of long-term jobs.

Therefore, this is not just a matter for the birds or for a few people who go out to watch wildlife. Hon. Members should understand that the RSPB has more members than the Conservative party. It probably has more members than all the parties represented in the House now, including the alliance and Nationalist parties. The number of people concerned with conservation, substantial though they are, deserve as much consideration as the profits that might accrue whether they be indirectly to overseas students financed by Trinity college rather than the Government, or to the people who feel that they might get a little job which will last as long as it takes the Channel tunnel to be built.

The Government have an obligation of real importance. They have an obligation to the other areas which could be used rather than see duplication of investment. They have an obligation to the international community and to a convention of importance. They have an obligation to their own legislation which re-established the principle of conservation through the site of special scientific interest. Therefore, they have no alternative but to speak up for the long-term interests of Britain, for the environment, for our natural ecology and for the very case which my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich has so powerfully and cogently argued this evening. In view of all that evidence, despite the effective pleading of Suffolk Members, the House cannot possibly afford a Second Reading to the Bill tonight.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): The hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) made an important point when he drew attention to the complete absence from the House today of any representative of either the Liberal party or the Social Democratic party. It sits in a curious fashion with their increasingly frantic espousal of the green vote that they have not even managed to have one of their Members present today. That is deplorable, particularly in the light of the great play that their local representatives have made in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) of their concern about Felixstowe. That is not displayed here in Parliament. I dare say that it is the prospect of having to make up their minds on an issue that has prevented them from being here, or perhaps it is a reflection of their prospect of gaining further ground in Suffolk. I hardly think that the county council election results two weeks ago will be of much hope to the hon. Member for Wentworth or his hon. Friends in the hope that he expressed of a revival of Labour prospects in Suffolk.

The hon. Member for Wentworth said something that I found puzzling. He said that the Conservative party did not seem to be in favour of creating new wetlands. If he had read the press over the weekend he would have seen that we are the party that is spawning wetlands left and right. Whether that will lead to the country being transformed into the land of the wets remains to be seen.

I listened in vain to the speech of the hon. Member for Wentworth for anything that would offer comfort to those who are unemployed and seeking jobs in Suffolk. I listened in vain to the speeches of the hon. Members for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) and for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) for any comfort that could be offered to prospective employees at Felixstowe. Although I readily acknowledge the work which the hon. Member for Ipswich does in his constituency—a neighbouring constituency to mine with which I am familiar—despite his clear knowledge of the views of most of his constituents on most issues, he did not tonight reflect the views or interests of the people of Ipswich. If he were representing any interests tonight, it was the interests of a narrow section of his trade union.

I speak from the viewpoint of someone with a very keen interest in conservation. I have been active in taking up environmental issues, both in the House and elsewhere, and I am strongly opposed to the pursuit of private profit at the expense of conservation and, in particular, of countryside interests. But I also speak from the viewpoint of someone who is passionately concerned about unemployment, and I am particularly anxious to prevent even more jobs from going overseas.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that the number of jobs involved in this development may be just about balanced, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) has said, by the number of those lost from, for example, the tourist trade if such features are destroyed?

Mr. Yeo: I do not know how familiar the hon. Gentleman is with the region. I happen to live a few miles away, just the other side of the Orwell estuary. Consequently, I know that there is no prospect of the tourist trade being adversely affected. Happily, that trade is growing in East Anglia, but I should certainly like to see it expand still further. I live in the village of East Bergholt, which is already very popular, and I know that the tourist trade is attracted to all sorts of beautiful areas in East Anglia. However, I do not believe that the proposed area of expansion draws tourists to Suffolk, or, indeed, to East Anglia.

Many of my constituents have made representations to me about the Bill, as many of them live in a place which overlooks the site of the proposed expansion. They have expressed concern about several things, such as navigation, possible damage to the scenic environment, bird life and the possibility that the expansion of Felixstowe is not really needed. I shall touch briefly on each of those four points in turn. I readily understand the anxieties of local yachting enthusiasts, but I think that their fears have been greatly exaggerated. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) has already ably made points that should cover the navigation anxieties of those concerned with leisure craft and access to the port of Ipswich.

Concern about the scenic environment is very much to the fore among those living on the Shotley peninsula. Of course it is a serious matter, because we are talking about an area of outstanding natural beauty. However, I applaud the considerable efforts made by the Felixstowe company to meet the anxieties of local residents about the possible deterioration of their view. I also pay a warm tribute to Geoffrey Parker, the chairman, to the senior staff of the company and to their professional advisers. My contact with them has convinced me that they will take every reasonable step to mitigate any possible damage to the environment. Therefore, I publicly urge my constituents and the residents on the Shotley peninsula to contact the company and to express their anxieties to it. I shall certainly take up these issues on their behalf and will contact the company to ask for a sympathetic consideration of their views. Particular care needs to be taken over the question of the erosion of saltings.

The hon. Member for Ipswich quoted the report of the Suffolk county planning officer, but Suffolk county council had a far more extensive opportunity to consider the report than the House will have. After detailed consideration, the council came down in favour of the Bill.

The third issue, which was mentioned at some length by the hon. Member for Wentworth, concerns bird life and the loss of feeding grounds and wet lands. I understand that there is already a considerable interchange between the Orwell and the Stour. The company's offer to provide additional acreage for habitat on adjacent marshes is a real and important concession.

The fourth issue concerns the need for this expansion. It would seem that Felixstowe embodies just what anyone who favours the mixed economy should be working hard to support. It is a real private enterprise success story. It offers something which the customers clearly want. If the port of Ipswich is as successful, well managed and so on as the hon. Member for Ipswich has said—I accept that it has expanded considerably at a time when Felixstowe has expanded — what does it have to fear from continuing to compete? Is there really an anxiety that the greater efficiency of Felixstowe might in the long term undermine its prospects? If the hon. Gentleman is genuine in his support of the mixed economy, it is hard to understand why he should be anxious at the prospect of further open competition between the ports.

As hon. Members have said, there is a danger that trade will go overseas. The absence of additional facilities at Felixstowe would not help British exporters, and the House should be particularly concerned about them. Last year we had a clear reminder of the strategic importance to this country of the non-scheme ports. The role that Felixstowe played last summer was very important and could be important again if similar circumstances prevailed. Thus, the need for such expansion is well established.

I am also concerned about the possibility of additional lorry traffic. We already have a good link across on the A45, but there is an urgent need for the A1/M1 link to be built. I very much hope that that project will not be delayed unnecessarily in the planning process. That would be most unfortunate. I am also concerned about the A12, which is now the main link between Felixstowe and London or the south-east. There will be a considerable growth in the amount of traffic going down the A12 and on to the M25. The road is not by any means adequate, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will convey to his colleagues in the Department of Transport our concern about the A12. Not all the right turns have yet been eliminated, and we need more grade-separated junctions on the A12, a central crash barrier, and so on. All those issues will become more urgent as a result of the expansion at Felixstowe.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Felixstowe dock company should take responsibility for that charge instead of leaving it with the national Exchequer? Many other parts of the country could make claims for improved roads, yet they already have adequate dock facilities and are not asking for two lots of money.

Mr. Yeo: The point is that this tremendous investment in Felixstowe is not costing the public purse a penny. Indeed, £100 million of private capital is about to be invested, with the benefit of creating jobs at Felixstowe. It is a little curious to argue that we should be touching the company for a contribution to public investment. Those problems on our roads exist today, and I mention them only because they will become more urgent in future. Even if the extension does not take place, I shall press the Department of Transport for improvements to the A12. Indeed, I may well have the support of the hon. Member for Ipswich in that. I am also concerned about the possibility of lorries straying off the main roads and into the small villages. At some stage we may need to consider having designated lorry routes.

Those areas of concern are far outweighed by the job-creating potential of the scheme. At a time of high unemployment, we cannot afford to neglect the opportunity over the medium term to create 1,000 or more jobs in addition to the employment that will be created during the expansion and construction stage. The additional jobs which the scheme could create is almost the same as that provided by the largest employer in my constituency. That company is highly profitable and has excellent industrial relations. If it proposed to close because it was worried about the effects of its business on some birds nearby, there would be a massive outcry, and rightly, because we cannot afford to allow such considerations to weigh so heavily that we ignore opportunities for jobs. Some of the opponents of the Bill appear to suggest that course.

Felixstowe has an excellent record, a superb labour force and a fine history of harmonious industrial relations. I pay tribute to Brendan Lamb, the chief shop steward at Felixstowe, who gave up a considerable amount of time to discuss his colleagues' anxieties with me. I hope that I do not damn him by mentioning that, but his action is symptomatic of the healthy labour relations there.

Felixstowe is the right place for the development. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) said, the development is in the interests of the work force—existing and potential—of Suffolk and of Britain.

9 pm

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): My hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) said that, as a Yorkshireman, he did not wish to delay the House. As a Lancastrian, I do not wish to delay the House, but it is important to explore the wider port policy issues over which the Minister and I have had some difficulties in the past few weeks.

[Mr. Roger Stott]

The proposal by the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company for an expansion of its boundaries is based on the expectation that traffic will tend to grow. It is in the local and national interest to cater for that growth.

The Felixstowe development has grown over the years and Felixstowe provides welcome employment opportunities. The company is effective and go-ahead, but some of the growth and some of the potential growth is the result of a takeover by Felixstowe of traffic which previously passed through other ports. There can be no doubt about that.

Two processes of substitution have been at work in United Kingdom ports in the past 17 years — the takeover of conventional cargoes by containers and unit load systems and a tendency to concentrate in the south-east on Felixstowe and Southampton.

Although that process has created a high growth rate during a period of substitution, it will inevitably level off once the transition is completed. There are therefore two important questions to answer when considering the need for new facilities at Felixstowe. First, what is the underlying rate of growth in national traffic and port services? Secondly, how far has the process of substitution gone?

Felixstowe is predominantly a deep-sea container port. The port has a special reputation for deep-sea container traffic and it proposes to extend that traffic. My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) in his cogent speech, and my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth mentioned Dr. Gilman of the marine transport centre at Liverpool university. I am grateful to Dr. Gilman for supplying an analysis of cargo movement.

Containerisation was started in 1967 and since then a substantial growth of manufactures has taken place. Imports have increased from just over 13 million tonnes to nearly 36 million tonnes and exports from just under 13 million tonnes to nearly 20 million tonnes. However, deep-sea trades taken as a whole scarcely participated in that growth. In 1984, the volume of deep-sea exports at 4,747,000 tonnes was about 500,000 tonnes above the 1967 level and had declined when compared with 1976 levels. Deep-sea imports, while being slightly above the 1967 level at about 7,200,000 tonnes were nevertheless substantially down on the 1976 and 1979 levels. About 39 per cent. of manufactured imports and 49 per cent. of exports were containerised in 1984.

The figures show that, while there has been a steady growth in containerisation, the deep-sea cargo part of the containerisation programme has not grown in the way in which some have tried to demonstrate. The figures supplied by Liverpool university confirm what I already believed.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): As this is crucial to the argument, can the hon. Gentleman give the comparable figures for the port of Rotterdam?

Mr. Stott: I do not have those figures. We are concerned about the volume and level of imports and exports in United Kingdom ports, and we must look at the proposed development at Felixstowe in that light. It cannot act in isolation from other ports in the United Kingdom. What happens there, and its potential for development, are bound to have knock-on spin-off effects on other ports. Those points were made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich. My hon. Friend also drew attention to the fact that Ipswich is an important port for the export of grain.

The figures show that there has been relatively little growth in container potential in the deep sea sector. They also show that there is already a high container penetration in the sectors that generate most of the container traffic, and little is to be expected in the way of increases. Given the fact that the container revolution began 17 years ago, that is only to be expected. There appears to be a high degree of agreement about that in the industry.

Currently, the deep sea container trade does not appear to be seriously short of port capacity. There is no evidence of serious congestion at ports, and at some of them there is under-used capacity. For example, Southampton is at least as well suited geographically as Felixstowe to take up any slack in the trade at any particular time.

I have to tell the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale), who is no longer in his place, that he thoroughly misunderstood my earlier intervention when I was talking about over-capacity in the industry. It was only last year —it is not history— that there was a major dispute at Southampton and the port was virtually taken out for six months. Other ports coped with Southampton's capacity. There is indisputable evidence that there is over-capacity in our ports, and that any capacity developed is bound to be at the expense of the other ports in the United Kingdom. We have continued to make that point.

I was interested to listen to the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo), who made a fair constituency point about ensuring that the infrastructure is provided if the port facility goes ahead. That is in marked contrast to what his hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) said during the debate on the Ports (Finance) Bill two weeks ago about giving financial assistance to, among other places, Merseyside and London. He represents a municipally owned port, and he said that if Falmouth went ahead—that is another port that could develop in the Channel and become the mother port— he was not prepared to support the provision of massive amounts of public money to provide the infrastructure to service it. He has a more marginal constituency than the hon. Member for Suffolk, South. There is a difference of opinion.

I do not believe that it is right and proper that the taxpayer should facilitate that infrastructure when there are adequate port facilities to meet demand. Southampton has been developed and a great deal of money has been poured into it. It is privatised, and enjoys infrastructure expenditure from the taxpayer. We should not continue to provide port facilities and spend public money to provide the infrastructure to get the goods to such ports at the expense of other ports.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) made an interesting speech. I understand that at one time he was a director of Euro-Canadian Shipholdings. A subsidiary of that company is a company called CAST, which operates out of Ipswich. I understand that when he was a director of that company, the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds took some credit for getting that firm to locate in Ipswich.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths indicated assent.

Mr. Stott: I have with me a letter written to the chief xecutive to the Port of Ipswich by Mr. Gill, the managing irector for the United Kingdom of CAST, in which he ays, amongst other things:

"I know that you are aware of our concern should the elixstowe Bill' be implemented . . . The investment which AST, and the Ipswich Port Authority, have made in the Port Ipswich's new West Bank Terminal runs into many millions pounds. The reclamation of land, the construction of our erminal, the purchase of heavy container handling equipment, well as the office and communications infrastructure, can be ounted in high, hard numbers . . . The major investment in ople and equipment was only made after an extensive search r the most suitable port to act as the UK distribution centre for AST's transatlantic traffic. With experience we discovered that e could supplement this nucleus of traffic, and over the past ree years our Ipswich Terminal has grown to include a strong hort-Sea service, as well as the handling of container traffic for her regular lines. Our volume in the current 12 months is likely be in the region of 60,000 tonnes."

lr. Gill goes on:

"CAST is most unwilling to accept a situation in which the ntrol of ship traffic in and out of Ipswich is effectively in the nds of a competing port. Nor are we satisfied, from a safety ewpoint, with the seeming encroachment of Felixstowe's rths into the mouth of the Orwell river."

he letter continues:

"CAST's Ipswich decision was a good one"—

e hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds was associated ith that decision—

r our customers, our people and the IPA. We hope it will main that way, and that you will do everything possible to otect our mutual interests."

us, the company that the hon. Member for Bury St. dmunds brought, or said he brought, to Ipswich, is now ying that it is fearful about the proposals in the Bill that e hon. Gentleman is now promulgating.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: I have no further connection hatever with CAST. Perhaps I should have, but I do not, ne point that the hon. Gentleman is missing is that the ven ports grow and prosper together; Felixstowe has nefited Ipswich, and Ipswich has benefited Felixstowe. ith an offer from Felixstowe, if Ipswich is concerned out its traffic or navigation, it should discuss the matter cause together they can reach agreement.

Mr. Stott: I accept the first point that the hon. entleman makes, about them growing together, but there mes a time when one outgrows the other to the other's triment, and to the national detriment. That is the erriding point that I am making, the point that my party lieves to be of great contention.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds spoke of vigation, which is an important issue. In particular, it ncerns my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. eetch). The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds and his n. Friend the Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) ould be aware that I am not entirely satisfied on that tter.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds says that the lixstowe Dock and Railway Company can get together th the Port of Ipswich Authority and that they can agree some mutually beneficial scheme. I understand from visit to Ipswich that that port would dearly love to have t in writing — would like some indemnification ainst its traffic being impeded—because Ipswich has a RO system that is finely tuned to tidal waters. That olves vessels getting in and out on time. Any delay uld upset the balance of that finely tuned system.

I have with me a letter sent by Captain Wiechmann, master of the Cast Salmon, on charter to the CAST line, calling regularly at Ipswich. In that letter, dated 11 February, he said:

"From time to time the Cast Salmon has been advised by Harwich radio of large vessels docking or undocking at the Felixstowe Berths. The warnings have been such that a reduction in speed and or liaison with Harwich Radio has overcome a need to come to a dead stop.

No entry in the ship's log has been necessary for these manoeuvres.

The width of the channel off the present Felixstowe berths has allowed room for my ship to pass up or down stream safely whilst larger vessels are mooring or unmooring thus reducing the incidence of delays.

I must express my concern that if the proposed extension of the Felixstowe quays takes place into the narrower section of the River Orwell, then the reduced channel will effectively prevent any possibility of passing whilst vessels are berthing or unberthing at the new quays. The priority presently given to large ships is reluctantly conceded, but in a reduced channel it is evident that severe restrictions on movement will take place."

A sea-going captain who uses the Orwell estuary regularly has written to his employer in those terms setting out the serious difficulties that he foresees if the Bill goes ahead.

I oppose the Bill for the reasons that I have given to the Under-Secretary of State on various occasions. I believe that it flies in the face of any sensible ports policy. The Minister will doubtless claim that he has such a policy, but I rebut that claim because I do not believe that he has any such policy. In my view, any extension of Felixstowe will be damaging to the nation's ports as a whole and especially to Ipswich, it will disrupt the natural waterway for ship movements in the river Orwell and it will be detrimental to the wildlife which enjoys that habitat. I hope, therefore, that my hon. Friends will prevent the Bill from being read a Second time.

9.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): It may help the House if I intervene at this point to give the Government's view on the Bill. We have had an interesting debate on an important private Bill which affects the interests of my Department in relation to the ports industry and matters of navigational safety. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has an interest in the environmental and conservation issues.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) introduced the Bill in a speech which demonstrated the importance of the Bill to the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company and the economic benefits that the promoters foresee for Felixstowe and for jobs in the area.

First, I will set out the Government's view on port development projects in general. It has long been our view that ports should be free to compete for traffic on price and on the services that they offer. We see that as the main way in which they can contribute to our competitiveness as a nation. Jobs throughout much of United Kingdom industry depend on competitiveness; and transport costs are significant to exporters' ability to compete successfully.

Traditionally, the Government stand neutral in relation to private Bills and today will be no exception. That is why the Paymaster General, my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal, (Mr. Gummer), in whose constituency Felixstowe lies, is unable to participate in the debate.

Several hon. Members have suggested that the Bill should be opposed on what might be described as

[Mr. David Mitchell]

"national" grounds. They have argued that such a significant development ought to be the concern of the Government because it affects the national interest. In our judgment, however, there are no grounds of national transport policy on which the Government believe that the Bill should be rejected.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I concede that on ports grounds the Minister may be right, but he emphasised that it was also a matter for the Secretary of State for the Environment. Is he not aware that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has said:

"Confirmation of an AONB designation order confers formal recognition by the Government that the natural beauty of the landscape in the area identified is of national importance. —[Official Report, 29 July 1982; Vol. 28, c. 708.]

Is one Department unaware of what the other is doing?

Mr. Mitchell: I referred to national ports policy. I did not deal with the environmental issues, but, if the hon. Gentleman will allow me to proceed, I shall do so.

Our ports will have to continue to adapt to changing patterns of trade, and Bills of this type may well continue to be required, but that is not to say that the case for this Bill is a wholly good one or that it is satisfactory in all respects.

I hope that the House will give the Bill a Second Reading so that the issues can be debated in more detail in Committee and a closer examination can be made of the various concessions and proposals offered by the promoters to meet the objections put forward, many of which have been mentioned tonight.

I do not think that it is productive to pursue the line of argument that Felixstowe should be prevented from expansion because capacity exists elsewhere. What matters is that capacity should be in the right place, where shippers and ship users want to use it. It is little help to have spare capacity which is inconvenient or too expensive to use. The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) and I have crossed swords on this issue in other contexts, and I do not propose to repeat the cogent arguments that I made on that occasion. In the past, criticism has been made that Britain did not have its "Rotterdam" and that container facilities were spread too thinly between too many ports. Now that Felixstowe is emerging as Britain's leading container port, it would be illogical to stem its growth and prevent shippers and ship lines from exercising that choice: Rotterdam is doing a huge business in trans-shipment of containers for sending to the United Kingdom by smaller vessels. One point that the Committee will want to consider is whether more of that trade could come direct to the United Kingdom.

It may be helpful to say a few words about infrastructure. This point was raised by a couple of my hon. Friends. The A45 from Ipswich and beyond runs down to the entrance of the Felixstowe dock. During the past five years it has been improved as far as the A1 at Huntingdon via the A604 from Cambridge. It is now a high-standard, all-purpose, dual carriageway trunk road. A public inquiry is still in progress on the A1/M1 link to Birmingham and the midlands. Subject to the inquiry's outcome, the link will be completed by the end of the decade providing a route connecting Felixstowe with the midlands and beyond. No further improvements to roa infrastructure will be needed to cater for any increase traffic arising from the proposed development.

On the question of the railway line, my Department ha recently received an application for grant under section of the Railways Act 1974 for the Felixstowe link line ar terminal expansion at a total capital cost of £4·377 millio to build up railway capacity from the current 140,00 containers per annum to 265,000. The railway is require for the opening of the new Trinity terminal, for whic approval has already been given. The House may reca that section 8 grants are the way in which Governme contribute to environmental protection by encouragin movement of goods off the roads and principally by rai The water, gas, electricity and telecommunicatio undertakings have said that they do not expect th proposed development to cause them insuperab problems.

I turn to the navigational issues. The hon. Member fo Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) and other hon. Members have mad the point that vessels using the new docks could be danger to navigation at the mouth of the Orwell and coul damage the interests of the port of Ipswich by delaying i traffic. This is a problem of traffic control and th allocation of priorities. It must be examined in detail. have been to see the problem on the ground and the wate My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (M Griffiths) says that there is no problem, but the hon Member for Ipswich envisages significant problem delays and obstruction. Interestingly enough, I note tha my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale believes that agreement can be reached locally. I hope tha all parties can agree on a solution, but this is very muc a matter for examination in Committee.

Many hon. Members have expressed concern about th environmental impact of the Bill's proposals. I know tha the Secretary of State for the Environment is similarl concerned about the effect that the development may hav upon the environment and conservation issues.

We have here a highly successful commercia enterprise whose continued success, with all th employment and wealth creation that that implies, is see to require an extension of the docks. The propose expansion is over land and an area of outstanding natura beauty. The plans are objected to on environmental an conservation grounds by a number of organisation covering different interests.

The relevant Suffolk county structure plan approved b the Secretary of State for the Environment in August 197 contains the following statement:

"The exceptional landscape and wildlife quality of the Area of Outstanding Natural Beauty will be safeguarded through th strict control of development and through positive measures o management and enhancement . . .

The expansion of Felixstowe dock and associated industria area will be limited in a westerly direction to those areas whic do not conflict with the Suffolk Coast and Heaths Area o Outstanding Natural Beauty."

In the Felixstowe town map, which was approved i 1972, the area of outstanding natural beauty is shown a extending over the western part of the site. The House wil be aware that areas of outstanding natural beauty ar designated by the Countryside Commission, subject t confirmation by the Secretary of State for th Environment.

The Government's policy towards areas of outstandin natural beauty was oulined in a statement by the forme

Secretary of State on 29 July 1982. I confirm that in our view the natural beauty of the landscape in these areas is of national importance and that in general it would not be consistent with the aims of designation to permit the siting of major industrial and commercial development in areas of outstanding natural beauty. Only national interests and lack of appropriate alternative sites can justify an exception. But each case must be determined on its merits, including consideration of the environmental effects.

In that respect the House will wish to know that the Countryside Commission is firmly of the opinion that the proposed development at Felixstowe would contribute a major intrusion into the area of outstanding natural beauty whose landscape the commission considers to be still the same high quality as when it was originally designated in 1969. The commission has visited the site and discussed the proposals with the Bill's promoters. It recognises that there are arguments in favour of the Bill. None the less, it is not satisfied that the present evidence demonstrates conclusively that there is no alternative site elsewhere.

The commission has, however, determined not to object formally to the Bill, because it is not in a position itself to suggest an alternative site with any degree of authority. The factors involved are in fact complex. None the less, it is believed that Parliament should thoroughly satisfy itself on this point before permitting the proposals to proceed.

If the House votes in favour of giving the Bill a Second Reading, the commission will submit detailed advice to that effect. The commission's advice will form part of the Department's report to be put before the Committee.

The site of the proposed development is also an area of considerable nature conservation interest which has been identified by the Nature Conservancy Council as a site of special scientific interest. That, too, has been referred to during the debate. The inter-tidal mud flats and the salt marshes provide a feeding and roosting area for large numbers of wintering wildfowl and waders. The Nature Conservancy Council estimates that about 10 per cent. of the Orwell estuary site will be affected by the proposed development and has formally advised the Department of the Environment of its objection to the passage of the Bill.

If the House decides to give the Bill a Second Reading, the Nature Conservancy Council's detailed evidence will also be annexed to the Department's report to be put before the Committee.

As to the attitude of the planning authorities concerned, as the House knows, Suffolk county council has withdrawn its petition against the Bill following its reaching a provisional agreement with the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company and Trinity college Cambridge, the landowners, on a number of safeguarding measures, including landscaping, nature conservation, public rights of way, highway improvements, lighting, rail traffic, lorry parking, noise, development control, height of buildings, future expansion of the docks, public access and providing wetland for bird life.

On the other hand, the Suffolk coastal district council, which is the local planning authority for the area, is continuing to pursue its petition against the Bill. It, and other petitioners, will have a chance to present their objections to the Select Committee, where the issues can be examined in detail.

With regard to the environment, it is clear that the proposed development will detract from the amenity of a small part of the Suffolk coast and heath area of outstanding natural beauty. It would intrude over the ridge that separates the areas of outstanding natural beauty from the port and, as I have seen for myself, would enter the extensive flat river valley that forms the major part of the area of outstanding natural beauty. It would also damage the wildlife interest on part of the proposed site of special scientific interest, which is nationally important for certain bird species.

Against this has to be set the prospect of up to 1,100 new jobs which will be created directly, plus the 1,800 or so jobs which should follow in port-related businesses, and of the associated wealth that expansion would bring to the area. The Bill contains no environmental safeguard as it stands. It is understandable that those with a particular interest in the environment and amenity should expect the development to be justified in terms of national need and wish to satisfy themselves that there is no suitable alternative before accepting a development of this kind.

If the Bill were passed as it stands, the company would not require planning permission from local planning authorities and would be free to erect a number of buildings and structures outside normal development control, although it has agreed to some control in the agreement reached with the county council. The Bill does not contain information that would normally be incorporated into a planning application. If it were to be approved, some additional safeguard might therefore be prudent in view of the sensitivity of the location. On the other hand, the House may consider that the expansion of Felixstowe port as proposed is so important to the national economy and to the creation of jobs as to justify allowing the Bill to proceed even without such safeguards.

It is for the House to judge the arguments, but most of the matters spoken of so far can be decided only in Committee, when the detailed evidence on either side can be presented, examined and evaluated, together with reports from the Departments concerned. Therefore, I recommend to the House that the Bill be given a Second Reading and allowed to proceed in the usal way to Committee, where its provisions can be considered in proper detail.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): I congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) and for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) on their speeches giving compelling arguments against the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich spoke about locality and constituency interests, which we all understand, and then about the broader-based effects of the development of Felixstowe not only on his port, but on every other port in the United Kingdom. My hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth's ecological argument was so good that if the House were to decide on the Bill only on that argument it would vote against Second Reading. I shall deal with a different argument, but I give my clear support to the arguments used by my hon. Friends.

I was not surprised to hear the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) in his parliamentary confessional box saying that on reflection he would not have given the £45 million to support the port of Liverpool. I am sure that on Merseyside the people will consider that a further reason why they should never again elect a Tory Member of Parliament for the area.

Tory Members have advanced a narrow argument. I know of their hostility towards the national dock labour scheme and registered dock workers. That has been shown on every occasion when the docks industry or the port transport industry has been debated in the House. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds has confirmed my view that the Government adopt a narrow attitude. Because of his obsessional hostility towards the national dock labour scheme and registered dock workers, he does not take into account the effects that the decline of the northern region ports has had on the hinterland of Merseyside and, indeed, of the whole north-west area. The population of the hinterland is about 19 million, and the decline of the port has had a direct effect on the people and the industry on that scale.

There has been no attempt by the Government to compensate for the decline of the port, which has been an act of deliberate policy on the part of the Government. In effect the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds has said that the port of Liverpool should die. His argument today has sentenced to death the northern region ports. We cannot view Felixstowe in isolation from other United Kingdom ports. There is an effect not just on the adjacent ports in the area but on all United Kingdom ports. My hon. Friends have explained that there is already surplus capacity in the United Kingdom ports industry.

Infrastructure is important. Not only are the northern region ports being sentenced to death, but the whole region's socio-economic position is being threatened. If we are being asked to accept that in future the south-east and south-west ports will be the basis for the port transport industry, any revival of the manufacturing industry in the northern region will be written off by the Tory party. If ports developed in that part of the country and if there were a revival of the manufacturing industry in the northern region—it certainly will not be under this Government—road and rail transport would be overburdened by all the traffic flowing to one or two points in Britain. One can draw that conclusion from the arguments put forward by Tory Members.

I spent most of my working life in the port of Liverpool. Before that I was a seaman.

Mr. James Prior (Waveney): I apologise for not having been in the Chamber earlier, but what the hon. Gentleman has said causes me to get to my feet. Is it not true that the workings of the national dock labour scheme, however well intentioned, have resulted in the decline of the port of Liverpool? That is probably why Felixstowe has done so well and now needs to expand. Would not the hon. Gentleman be doing a greater service to the hinterland of Liverpool and Merseyside as a whole if he recognised that fact? In recent years there have been restrictive practices and everything else that has gone with that, for reasons which we understand but are outdated in a modern society.

Mr. Loyden: I do not accept the right hon. Gentleman's analysis. The port of Liverpool was much affected by Britain's entry into the EEC, which was a political decision. I was not a registered dock worker but I was employed in the hydrographic section of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company as it then was. I know that, before a new dock was built at Liverpool, there was a four-year feasibility study. I understand that there has been no such study on the Orwell. Unless one is carried out, there will be much uncertainty about navigation and no certainty about the natural meanderings of the river once construction takes place that bears on the flow.

It is astounding that we should be considering the Bill's Second Reading when there is no evidence that the important issues which have been highlighted have been examined by the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company. A feasibility study should have been presented and navigation and ecology problems should have been considered before the House was asked even to entertain the Bill.

Opposition Members are not saying that Felixstowe workers are not entitled to jobs. I shall support any job creation programme at Felixstowe. However, jobs at Felixstowe should not be created at the expense of jobs in other ports. I am not prepared to accept job creation in one area that exports unemployment elsewhere.

The trade coming into and out of the United Kingdom is finite and this means that the strategic dispersal of the ports is of considerable importance. To suggest that we are out to overtake the port of Rotterdam is to whistle in the wind. The development of Felixstowe cannot endanger such a well-established port.

There has been a sad decline in coastal trade and the use of our inland waterways. There is increasing concern about the growth of the traffic on our roads that passes through towns and the countryside generally. Our coastal waters offer the best possible highways, but the Government have failed to revive and encourage what was once a flourishing industry. I was a seaman in the late 1930s and I know that coastal vessels ran from port to port around the British Isles carrying cargo. That was acceptable environmentally. If that coastal traffic is not redeveloped, the environmental consequences will be severe.

Ipswich may suffer the same consequences as Merseyside. Merseyside has lost 100,000 jobs since 1979, mainly because of the loss of a port. Although a port remains, all the port-related industries have faded and disappeared. The tremendous problems that exist with more than 21 per cent. unemployment show what has been happening. The Government have done nothing to deal with the problems which are the consequence of decisions based purely on market economic forces. With one or two honourable exceptions, we have heard only about how the market forces should dominate and influence the decisions. Those who support the Bill have not seriously questioned the consequences for jobs in other areas, the environmental consequences and the ecological consequences of those decisions.

The House would do itself a service if it did not agree to give the Bill a Second Reading. An appropriate strategy is needed for British ports such as Liverpool and the ports of the northern region. Throughout two world wars, they provided the best port facilities that we had, and now they are going into decline because of a deliberate act of policy. The thinking behind port strategy is short-term, and there are no signs of a long-term strategy. The technology of the dock industry can change, and in the not-too-distant future we may recognise that containerisation and palletisation have merely transferred the cost from the port to other areas. If there is a revival of industry in the northern regions, that may make us realise the importance of the northern region ports. We are debating an extremely serious issue and we should not give a Second Reading to the Bill.

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): I must declare an interest as the deputy chairman of Furness Withy, which owns the Walton terminal at Felixstowe, and an interest in associate companies, whose ships use the port. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) presented the Bill with a well informed and balanced speech; the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) in turn, made an admirable constituency speech. I am glad that it does not fall to myself to answer his environmental arguments. He is hard to please. If one plants 500,000 trees that is wrong; and if one does not it is more wrong.

During the evening, while we listened to the opinions of about 20 hon. Members, I wondered what the views of the people of Rotterdam would be. They are going ahead with great conviction with plans to enlarge both Zeebrugge and Rotterdam. They do not have the doubts that have been voiced tonight.

I warn the hon. Members for Wigan (Mr. Stott) and for Ipswich of the dangers of using academics to forecast the future of ports. They are always wrong. If an academic of one's choice had been asked in 1955 to forecast what was likely to happen at Felixstowe, he would certainly not have said that it would become a great port. It was a very small one then. However, even had that been forecast, the Opposition, on tonight's form, would have said, "On no account must it be expanded because that would harm Liverpool and Bristol."

Some years ago the Rochdale report was published, in which the greatest or the most informed in the land foretold the future of the ports. They got it hopelessly wrong. The then biggest ports would remain the biggest ports and would become even bigger. The main ports then were Liverpool, London, Manchester, the Clyde and Bristol, and they had half the trade in the country; now they have a quarter. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds discovered, Governments cannot decide which will be the biggest ports. The people who use the ports will decide that.

There was a great movement to the east from the western ports, partly for structural reasons, because the shipowners had to deal with Europe and wished to use the eastern ports. But they also declined to use some eastern ports because the service there was so bad. For example, there is no finer port than Southampton. It is a more natural port by far than Felixstowe, and everyone would wish to use it, but, as the hon. Member for Wigan said, for six months last year it was closed. Shipowners cannot afford that sort of treatment.

Shipowners could not afford such treatment even when ships were small. I do not know whether hon. Members realise how they have increased in size. I was in Lima three or four weeks ago and visited one of our ships, which carries 2,000 containers. It is not an exceptionally large ship by today's standards, but when one stands beside it, it looks colossal. My first thought was how vulnerable it would be in war. Larger container ships use Felixstowe; they are loaded and unloaded at astonishing speed. In 30 hours, at least 1,000 boxes can be dealt with. By "dealt with" I do not mean simply loaded. The boxes are put on the ship in a place handy for unloading at a particular port. The ship may have another 16 ports to visit, and everything must be packed in order. It is a highly technical operation.

Shipowners cannot afford to have expensive ships hanging round. To stand idle for even a day could cost about £60,000. Delayed ships not only lose cash and customers, but get behind on the timetables with which all conference ships must comply.

The position that I have just described will be out of date almost before I have finished speaking. Just as in the 1970s there was a revolution in oil tankers, with enormous ships being built — finally reaching a size of half a million tonnes — exactly the same is happening with container ships. I mentioned a ship with about 2,000 containers, the new ships are more than twice that size. The number of such ships being built is phenomenal. In two or three years, United States Line will have produced 14 of those vast ships, which will operate, as never before, a round-the-world service. They are being followed by Evergreen, with ships not quite so large, and by two or three other groups. This revolution once again puts in doubt every forecast that every academic and, indeed, every business man has been making during the past few years.

The hon. Member for Ipswich need not worry about the container port on the other side of the river beoming a white elephant. That is the worry of the people who put their money into the venture. They are much more likely to be right than the hon. Member for Ipswich, Professor Gilman or any of the other people who have been quoted, because they have something at risk. We should let them take the risk. If they do as well as Felixstowe has done, God bless them.

I cannot resist making one more point which has nothing to do with the Bill, but which is relevant to the use of ports. My hon. Friend the Minister said the other day:

> "For deep-sea containerised cargo UK port costs are significantly, indeed on average, half as dear again as continental levels. . . . It is an on-cost which increases the cost of imports and loses us export orders."

However efficient people and ports are, we must get the issue of light duties right.

Ships can enter Rotterdam without payment, whereas the big ships that I have been describing would have to pay £20,000 to enter our ports. That is a penalty which they cannot be expected to endure for long. It is doubly unjust, in that merchant ships pay dues, whereas fishing boats and the Navy do not. As merchant ships become more sophisticated, they need less help from lights or pilots, but they still have to pay these enormous sums. I am aware that an inquiry has been set up to go into this matter. It is important that we get it right.

As the Merchant Navy declines, this country is getting into a humiliating position, as more and more of the trade of this famous seafaring nation is having to be carried in foreign ships. If our ports are not allowed to keep up to date, more and more of that trade will not be carried in our ships or landed in our ports. In future the biggest ships may ignore this country and deliver their cargoes across the ocean. We shall have to collect our goods in small ships. This is unacceptable. Every help should be given to those who are willing to provide up-to-date ports, and for that reason I support the Bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Surrogacy Arrangements Bill and the Prosecution of Offences Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. — [Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Orders of the Day

Surrogacy Arrangements Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 1

MEANING OF "SURROGATE MOTHER", "SURROGACY ARRANGEMENT" AND OTHER TERMS

10.22 pm

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 20, at end insert—

'(10) In any contract for a surrogacy arrangement, no part of the contract shall be enforceable at law which requires a surrogate mother to hand over a child to another person or persons.'.

We had a long debate in Committee on a number of issues, in the best possible spirit, while endeavouring to grapple with the immense complexity of the whole issue of surrogacy, and especially about the detailed items drawn out of the general debate about Warnock and about embryology and surrogacy as embodied in the Bill.

There is a general consensus among hon. Members that we do not want the delicate and intimate arrangements that might be made about surrogacy to be subject to commercial gain or even commercial contracts. Together with the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) and other Committee members, I sought to probe the Government's view on a number of delicate and specific issues. The Government's responses, to some extent, went to the heart of the amendments, and in each case they were not pressed to a vote. It is because of the only partial response to some of the issues that have I tabled the amendment.

On Second Reading my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) raised the whole question of the enforceability of contracts. The Bill leaves somewhat vague the question whether any contract should be enforceable in law. It has left open the question whether someone could take to court the case person who had sought to enter into a financial contract or—and this is the ground of the amendment — whether a surrogate mother should be forced to give up the child. The Secretary of State seemed to take the view that the law as it stood was clear and that no such contract—a contract to hand over the baby or the money — would be enforceable in the courts. My hon. Friend then asked the Minister whether, if he had any doubts on the point, some provision should be included in the Bill. No such provision has been made, so we are left with an ambiguity.

Replying to the debate on an amendment tabled by me in Committee upstairs when I probed the question whether any contract for a surrogacy arrangement would be enforceable by law or against any persons making it, the Minister responded that while the question of the entire enforceability was an issue about which strong feelings were held — indeed, the Warnock committee had recommended that no contract under any surrogacy arrangement should be eforceable and that any such arrangement, commercial or non-commercial, should be made illegal—in his personal opinion it should be made unenforceable for the mother to be compelled to hand over the child. He went on to say that nobody wished to see a surrogacy contract enforced, with a surrogate mother who changed her mind being obliged to hand over the child. That, he said, was straightforward.

Because the Minister made comments such as that, I have tabled the amendment. I am testing whether it is possible to distinguish between undue pressures being brought to bear on a surrogate mother and a financial arrangement which might be sought to be enforced in the court. It is reasonable to say that the whole question is highly charged with emotion. It is said that in certain circumstances it should not be illegal for a woman to bear a child for another woman. If it is said that, within a close family or, indeed, a close friendship, we would not wish by legislation to make such an arrangement illegal, we must go on to consider the question whether it is possible to exert undue pressure on the woman involved in that arrangement.

Given the delicacy of the issue and the emotion involved, our view is that such an arrangement should not be enforceable by law if the surrogate mother decides at the end of the pregnancy that she does not wish to give up the child. I understand that that is also the view of the Minister. That being so, we thought it wise to test the view of hon. Members on the issue, in particular to see whether our view and that of the Minister would gain the approval of the House as a whole.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Having been a member of the Committee which considered the Bill, of which I am strongly in favour, I could not understand why the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) had tabled the amendment. Indeed, having heard him move it, I see neither the need for it nor how it would be enforceable. It says:

"In any contract for a surrogacy arrangement, no part of the contract shall be enforceable at law".

What is the point of an amendment that is not enforceable at law? The handing over of a child is something that we do not want to happen in the first place. I should have thought that the point was amply covered by clause 9, which provides that the "Act applies to arrangements whether or not they are lawful and . . . are enforceable by or against any of the persons making them."

That seems perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mrs. Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): There is no clause 9 in the Bill.

Mr. Bruinvels: Yes, there is. Clause 9 is already in the Bill as drafted.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Perhaps I can assist the hon. Gentleman. I think that he means subsection (9) of clause 1. The Bill has only five clauses.

Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will also explain what he means when he says that something is not lawful. I thought that the whole purpose of introducing the Bill was to make law.

10.30 pm

Mr. Bruinvels: Yes, I meant subsection (9) of clause 1. I should have thought that that was clear. The amendment refers to page 2, line 20, and that is the part of the Bill to which I am referring. Subsection (9) states:

"This Act applies to arrangements whether or not they are lawful and whether or not they are enforceable by or against any of the persons making them."

The Bill as drafted seems to cover all the points that we debated in Committee. What is the point of amendment No. 1 when subsection (9) already makes the position clear? Subsections (1) to (9) deal with the contracts and their legal effect and I am confident that the Bill as drafted, as we debated it on Second Reading and in Committee, defines the law with regard to surrogacy arrangements once and for all.

I find it very strange that anyone should regard the amendment as necessary. I am concerned that the law should be carefully encapsulated as it is in the Bill. Most people regard surrogacy as abhorrent. We debated the matter in Committee and considefed all the amendments tabled at that stage. Whatever the hon. Member for Leeds, West may say, it seems strange to me that no amendment of this kind was put forward at that stage. Most of my colleagues accepted the Bill exactly as it was in Committee, and so did I. We had a tremendously quickly debated Committee stage under the very able chairmanship of the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) and I believe that the Bill should be left as it is.

The most important thing is to get the Bill on to the Statute Book as quickly as possible. We do not want any more commercial arrangements and we do not want any more surrogacy arrangements. Unfortunately, we know full well that three more children are liable to be born before the Bill reaches the Statute Book. Any kind of filibustering or delaying tactic today is totally unnecessary.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) rose——

Mr. Bruinvels: The most important thing is to pass the Bill as it is, unamended, in the interests of preserving family life and ensuring that no form of engagement or contractual arrangement of this kind will ever be allowed again. For that reason, I cannot possibly support the amendment.

I welcome the Bill, I am delighted that it has made such rapid progress, and I wish it every success when it goes to another place.

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): I really cannot understand the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels). He seems to have gone right over the top, as he always does—or at any rate as is his usual bent.

The hon. Gentleman said that he welcomed the Bill and that he was against the commercial aspects of surrogacy. We are all against the commercial aspects. He went on to say that he wanted no more surrogacy, but that is not the purpose of the Bill. The purpose of the Bill is to deal with the narrow, profit-making aspect on which we all agree, and we wish to ensure that it does not stray any further into an area that the Government and all of us may be considering at a much later stage — the far more sensitive and difficult issue of surrogacy as such.

I support the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft). The hon. Member for Leicester, East said that this issue was not raised in Committee. In fact, however, it was raised in the Committee, as reported at column 5 of the Official Report. A very similar amendment was moved and the Minister gave a most thoughtful reply, which clearly induced the hon. Member for Leeds, West to table the amendment now under discussion. The amendment merely clarifies something that could be a doubtful area if the Bill were left as it is. A number of parts of the Bill are doubtful areas, and I hope that we shall refer to them on Third Reading. I do not think that it was necessary for the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) to go over the top as though something disastrous had been proposed which would run a coach and horses through the Bill. Nothing like that has been proposed.

Mrs. Jill Knight: I should like to ensure that this is not altogether a party matter. I did not have the inestimable benefit of being a member of the Standing Committee, but I have read the amendment. I shall listen with enormous care and interest to my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister. It cannot be wrong to pass an amendment which says that, whatever the arrangements made at the outset of a pregnancy, a woman should not be forced to give up her child. One's mind can change very much during pregnancy and especially when the child has been born. I cannot envisage the possibility of giving up a child.

Unless the amendment has some dastardly purpose behind it which I have not spotted, it merely says that we should not have a law on the statute book which says to a woman, "However you may feel when your child is born, you must give it up." For that simple, straightforward reason, I support the amendment.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I am not surprised that only one amendment has been tabled. As we discovered on Second Reading and in Standing Committee, there is a consensus on both sides of the House in support of the Bill. It is plainly the wish of the House that we should not have commercial agencies to organise surrogate motherhood and advertisements freely circulating seeking partners to surrogacy arrangements. I cannot recall legislation produced by any Government which has commanded such widespread support and had such an easy and comparatively speedy passage.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) that it would be extremely undesirable to delay the passage of the Bill. If this debate turns into a filibuster, I think that there will be concern. On this occasion, it is possible that my hon. Friend has made a rare error and misunderstood the purpose of the amendment. He rightly drew our attention to clause 1(9).

Mr. Meadowcroft: The suggestion that we might be filibustering impugns our professional motives.

Mr. Clarke: I did not make that suggestion. It was a passing reference in the heat of the moment by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East. This debate cannot yet be accused of being a filibuster.

Clause 1(9) does not have quite the meaning attributed to it by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East. The amendment goes back to the sympathetic response that I gave to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) on Second Reading when he asked the extent to which a surrogacy agreement between any parties might be enforceable at law. I stated the opinion, which has been stated by others before and since, that it is almost certain that most aspects of a surrogacy agreement would be regarded as unenforceable by the courts as being contrary to public policy. The Warnock committee recommended that this point should be expressed in statutory form so that the matter could be put beyond any doubt and not need to wait for case law to be determined with absolute clarity for the purpose of parties to would-be surrogacy arrangements.

[Mr. Clarke]

We discussed this in Committee, and I explained that the difficulty that arose in deciding how to express such a matter in statutory form came when one considered those aspects of a surrogacy agreement which one wished to make unlawful and non-binding on the parties. We agreed that it should not be a case that any woman was legally obliged to hand over a child because at the time that the child was conceived she agreed to do so. If a woman changes her mind when the birth takes place, plainly it would be wrong for a court to order a protesting mother to hand over her child.

Similarly, we are agreed that if a would-be surrogate mother enters into an agreement with would-be parents and then the parents change their minds and do not go ahead with the arrangements, it would be quite wrong for the would-be mother to be allowed to sue for the fee under some contract into which she had entered.

As I explained in Committee, difficulties arise. One has to consider what happens, for example, where there is a voluntary surrogacy arrangement which for the time being would remain lawful until the House decided the wider issues when we reached the full Warnock Bill, and the sister, say, of the putative parents gives up her job, becomes pregnant, and incurs medical expenses, and then the intending parents renege on the arrangement and will not even pay her expenses or compensation for loss of employment.

I throw that out as a question. I am not sure what the right answer is when it comes to the possibility of the pregnant woman suing for at least the expenses that she will have to incur in going ahead with the pregnancy. But those are the difficulties that have led the Government not so far to be able to move an amendment to meet the Warnock recommendations and the wish of the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) and others that we might put this in statutory form.

Mrs. Jill Knight: Do we know what would happen if the child was born mentally or physically handicapped?

Mr. Clarke: That is just such a situation which led us to think that commercial surrogacy was not a practice that we wished to see adopted. However else one resolves that appalling situation, I do not think that it is best resolved by, say, the mother who had given birth taking legal action to force the would–be parents to assume parental rights over the child. I am not sure how she would set about doing so, anyway. That would have to be resolved in some more suitable way by the Family Division of the High Court. It would not depend on the enforceability of the contract between the parties.

The Government remain sympathetic to the idea of providing a statutory provision to put the law beyond doubt, but we are having considerable difficulties in deciding on its exact form. If we can resolve them, we hope to consider bringing forward such an amendment in another place.

I shall then be asked by the hon. Member for Leeds, West why his amendment is not an adequate step in the right direction. On the face of it, there is nothing wrong with the amendment. He is merely saying that there shall be no contract enforceable at law which requires a surrogate mother to hand over her child to another person. The slight difficulty is that it carries the implication, or it might be argued that it gave rise to the inference, that other parts of the contract were enforceable. It might therefore unintentionally be a slight step backwards in that it could be argued that it carried the implication that, as Parliament had concentrated on that aspect of the contract and set it out specifically, it was somehow the intention that otherwise the contract might be enforceable.

In view of that, I suggest that the best way of proceeding might be for the amendment to be withdrawn or negatived at this stage on my undertaking that my Department will continue to struggle with the difficulties. I cannot give an absolute assurance that we shall produce an amendment, but we shall make efforts to do so in a form which meets the wishes of the House and makes clear those aspects of a surrogacy arrangement which ought to be unenforceable in any court of law.

Mr. Beith: The Minister for Health has been uniformly constructive and helpful throughout the consideration of this and other aspects of the Bill. That cannot be said for the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), who thought that the alliance was filibustering. One sitting of the Committee and 45 minutes on Report must be the shortest filibuster in the annals of parliamentary history. If we are to be accused of a filibuster every time we make any attempt to debate any Bill to any extent at all, Parliament might as well pack up and go home. What are we here for if not to try to ensure that the laws passed by Parliament are sensible, workable and carry out the objectives which they are intended to carry out? I regard it as part of my job as a Member of Parliament to pay a part in that process, as do my hon. Friends.

The hon. Member for Leicester, East said that as a result of the Bill the laws on surrogacy arrangements would be clear once and for all. Of all the claims that the Government might make about the Bill, that is not one. The Bill will, I hope, effectively outlaw commercial surrogacy. I say "I hope" because I still have some doubts about some aspects of the Bill. It is a genuine attempt to do that, and the Government have drafted it carefully with that intention in mind. However, the Bill does not ensure that the law on surrogacy arrangements generally, or even on some aspects of commercial surrogacy, will be clear once and for all. They will not be, and there are many unclear aspects yet to be considered about this part of the law.

For example, as I have reminded the Minister on a number of occasions, we are still not clear, although I have my view of what the interpretation might be, whether when someone has given birth to a baby in these circumstances the child will be entitled to know the identity of his natural mother when he reaches the age of maturity, as with adoption cases. I think that the law will give the right to an 18-year-old to know the identity of the natural mother, and I am sure that that is not envisaged by people who would contemplate making surrogacy arrangements.

The Bill and the law are still unclear about whether it is possible to enforce surrogacy contracts in the courts. The general view is that they would prove to be unenforceable. That was the view taken by the Warnock committee, but that did not deter it from saying that the law should be clear on the point. It was emphatic, by a majority, on that view. It seemed to some members of the Committee that it would underpin the ban on commercial surrogacy if the contracts could not be enforced, because people are much less likely to enter into a commercial arrangement if they know that it is not enforceable. If the key element in that arrangement—the transfer of the baby—cannot be enforced by law, they will lose the money which they have invested and the profits which they hoped to gain by it.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels rose——

Mr. Beith: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman, because he refused to give way to me.

Most of us feel that it would be ethically objectionable if a mother, after giving birth to a baby, could be forced by a legal contract to give that baby to someone else. It would be wrong to try to enforce that through the courts. Therefore, we have considered at various stages the desirability of using the Bill to make that point clear.

I recognise that there are difficulties, although some of the difficulties which the Minister mentioned would apply to anything in the Bill that we clarified, because whatever we clarify, we shall leave other matters unclear. There cannot be an argument about clarifying a major and important matter such as the rights of the mother who has given birth to the baby, although there are other aspects which might be deemed to be left unclear by not treating them in a similar way.

I recognise the Minister's genuine willingness to try to resolve this problem and to see whether we can get the law more clear on this point through the vehicle of the Bill. I accept his undertaking to attempt to make progress on the matter in the other place. I appreciate that that has to be a qualified undertaking, because he is conscious that the task may prove too difficult, and a satisfactory form of words may not be arrived at. I believe that his intentions are of the best, and I willingly accept his suggestion about the amendment.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Major.]

10.50 pm

Mr. Beith: It is right that we should discuss the general principles of the Bill on Third Reading. I am glad that a Bill was introduced to outlaw commercial surrogacy, but the consideration of that Bill has shown us what a difficult and complex area of law it is.

There have been those who, during our discussions on the Bill, seem to have formed the opinion that it either will, or could, if it had been suitably amended, outlaw surrogacy generally. That is not what the Bill will do. It was not the intention of the Bill. In my view, it should never have attempted to do so. It would have been wrong had either the Government or hon. Members attempted to do so.

After careful consideration of the matter, I have come to the conclusion that to attempt to outlaw surrogacy generally would be unrealistic and involve extending the area of criminality into places where it should not be. However, in doing so, I believe that we accept that, if we give the Bill a Third Reading tonight, we will appear to have acted in defiance of a firm Warnock recommendation that some matters should be made criminal. For example, in the Warnock report there was a clear recommendation that professional people would be committing an offence if they involved themselves in many of the matters in the Bill. We have decided not to frame it in such a way that it has that effect, so in some respects it is an anti-Warnock Bill. It goes against a definite Warnock recommendation. In other matters, it has simply deferred consideration. That was inevitable.

The Bill represents a valuable step, rightly applauded by many in the country, to outlaw the odious practice of seeking to make profit out of infertility and childless couples. For that reason, it will be widely welcomed.

Ms. Richardson: At the risk of incurring the wrath of the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), I hope to make a few points. Nobody should accuse me of filibustering. I have some important points to make.

The Bill has gone through the House speedily. It has gone from Second Reading to Third Reading in just two days under a month. That is a measure of the willingness of Parliament to respond to the natural distaste that has been evident among the public at large and also in Parliament towards the commercial aspects and profit-making by another party or agency, the intention of which is simply to bring couples and surrogate mothers together to make money out of their situation.

While we may congratulate ourselves on the speed with which we have dealt with the Bill in the House, I am a little more cautious in saying that I believe that we have got the Bill exactly right. The Minister for Health, in response to the short debate on the amendment, had one or two reservations about whether there should be an amendment here at an amendment there, which could be tabled in another place. Areas of doubt remain, which I find worrying. I tabled several amendments in Committee and withdrew them. I have been unable to find a way of tabling them in a way that would meet the approval of the Minister and the House. Therefore, I propose to air again the three principal points that I raised in Committee.

It is no shame to say that it is difficult to frame amendments because we are, after all, legislating for an entirely new area of the law. Surrogacy is not something that the House has considered before. Although there are precedents in some respects with regard to adoption and so on, it raises different matters from what the House has talked about on previous occasions in other ways. Therefore, we are right to be cautious about how we handle the matter. The Minister, and hon. Members on both sides of the House, has said frequently during the passage of the Bill that we need time to consider all the remaining aspects of what he calls, and what I suppose will become known as, the wider Warnock Bill to come. I can understand that he and his Department may be having some difficulty drafting the Bill.

I hope that the speed with which we have considered the Bill will not cause problems for the innocent. That is my principal worry. Unless the Bill is amended in another place, we shall have to wait to see how the Bill works when enacted. We may have to catch up with certain nasty practices when the wider Warnock Bill is introduced.

I shall refer briefly to the three areas about which I am still uncertain. First, there is the possibility of payment to those who advise or counsel the parties involved in a surrogacy arrangement and who receive payment for professional services. In Committee we had a fairly lengthy and most interesting exchange on this issue. It appears that a solicitor who is consulted by the parties may tell them what the law is — what we have decided in Parliament — but may not suggest that parts of arrangements to which they have come are not fair. The Minister says that to do so would be to negotiate and would mean that the solicitor would fall foul of the Act, unless he or she took no money for doing so. It is unlikely that a solicitor would advise without taking some sort of fee. Indeed, I do not see why he or she should give professional advice for nothing. Perhaps we shall see the springing up of advisers in law centres where charges are not made. That might be a way of skirting the problem.

Since our consideration of the Bill in Committee, I have been advised by one or two solicitors that, if it were not possible for a solicitor to tell one of the two parties to be wary about part of the agreement, the solicitor might be in breach of his professional standards. There is a duty upon a solicitor to give the best advice that he can offer. It will be ludicrous if a solicitor has to stay silent when he reads an agreement which he is asked to put into legal words and thinks that it is manifestly unfair to one side or the other.

Similarly, I assume that if a host mother engages a solicitor to advise her—that would not be a stupid thing to do—and the parents engage another solicitor, neither legal representative will be able to act without flouting the law or without taking any money. In other words, we are saying to the parties, in effect, that there is no point in ascertaining the best arrangement to which they can come. This measure is entitled the Surrogacy Arrangements Bill, but notwithstanding that title a solicitor will not be able to help or advise the parties without falling foul of the law or offering advice without charging a fee. It is probably not possible to do that in legal cases. That is a bad feature of the Bill and I hope that the Minister will give it further thought. Perhaps it will be considered by those in another place so that persons such as solicitors and others who give helpful advice will not unwittingly be caught by the bar on negotiating.

Secondly, I am concerned about the liability that is imposed on publishers by clause 3(2). The Minister will have read the letter from the Newspaper Society of 15 April, which was 10 days before we considered the Bill in Committee. I received a copy of the letter only this morning. I shall quote from it briefly as I think it important to place certain passages on the record.

The Newspaper Society said

"the comparison which Mr. Clarke made with libel law is not a valid one: leaving aside the fact that in many cases newspapers are protected by 'privilege' in libel actions, the law relating to editorial matter is quite distinct from that relating to advertising. At the very least, the law presumably reflects the point that editorial matter is by and large produced 'in house', whereas advertising matter merely consists of the reproduction of that which is composed by others."

We explored that point in Committee. I said what the position of someone on a newspaper would be who took the text of an advertisement over the telephone and might not know exactly what it meant. The Newspaper Society continues—

"The distinction drawn in the Bill between newspaper publishers and broadcasters does not seem to have been discussed in Committee."

It was not. The letter continues—

"This, in effect, gives broadcasters a defence of innocent dissemination. Why should newspapers not have similar protection?"

The Newspaper Society finally stated:

"we were a little confused by Mr. Bruinvels' reference to 'disclaimers'."

Indeed, the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) leapt to his feet from his vast experience in the newspaper industry before he came to the House. The letter continues:

"In our experience this is not the usual practice. Mr. Bruinvels may be thinking of a newspaper's terms and conditions of acceptance of advertisements, which sometimes contain provisions relating to the recovery of legal costs. However, these conditions cannot always be enforced and are no substitute for a clear defence in law."

That is the alarm expressed by the Newspaper Society. It makes genuine points, to which the Minister may be able to reply.

My third point relates to my continued anxiety about the penalties attached to the offence. In Committee we discussed the inhibition placed on a defendent through not having the option of a trial by jury. I could not find a way to draft an amendment. In Committee the Minister gave a flat "No" when I asked him whether there was a way to ensure that the option of trial by jury could be available, although the maximum sentence is three months. That "No" cannot be right. Parliament is sovereign. If we wanted to provide the right of trial by jury for parking on a single yellow line, we could do so if we had the will. In 1964 the point was made strongly by the then Sir Peter Rawlinson, who is now in the other place. He is remembered by hon. Members as a former Conservative Attorney-General. When he was asked whether the House could amend the Obscene Publications Act 1964 with no imprisonment or fine, but merely the destruction of books, he said:

"there is certainly no objection in principle to proceeding for forfeiture . . . being tried by a jury in a court of criminal jurisdiction. It would be an innovation, but that . . . should not prevent it from happening."—[Official Report, 3 June 1964; Vol. 695, c. 1216.]

When one argues today for the precious right of trial by jury, one is told that it automatically increases the term of imprisonment. I have done a little research into the matter and found an example where that is not so. The Official Secrets Acts lay down penalties for conviction on indictment and conviction on summary jurisdiction. In both cases the term of imprisonment provided is not a minimum or a mandatory sentence, but a maximum. Therefore, it follows that it is not necessarily true that trial by jury automatically carries longer sentences of imprisonment.

The Minister also said in Committee that the courts were clogged up—those are not his words, but that is what he meant — and that it was not a practical possibility to draft legislation that would give the option to defendants. But it would be a sad day when Parliament said that it is not a practical possibility to uphold the Magna Carta's promise of trial by jury to all who stand in danger of losing their liberty. I hope that the Minister will take the points I have raised in the spirit in which I made them and will reflect on them. Perhaps it will be possible to alter the Bill, or to have something said about it, in another place.

I have voiced some worries and warnings about the drafting of the Bill, but I do not doubt the Minister's and the Government's intentions. I know that the Minister wishes to leave the general issue of surrogacy until later, but, as it stands, the bill could effectively prevent any involvement in surrogacy by a non-profit making agency or any professional assistance being given to surrogates. It could catch innocent people and people who could help the commissioning parents and the surrogate mother. It could send surrogacy underground. All those would be retrograde steps which none of us would want.

Although I support the Bill, I hope that the Government will take those warnings to heart. I hope that the Department will reflect on them and will see whether they can reconsider the drafting of the Bill without destroying its intention, thus ensuring that we shall not have something on the statute book that we may regret later.

11.6 pm

Mrs. Jill Knight: I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) that it is not my intention to filibuster, but it would be wrong if I did not express now my reservations and worries about the Bill.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said that the Bill would outlaw commercial profit from surrogacy, but, from my reading of the Bill, that cannot be right. As I understand it, no profit-making agency may set up in business to provide surrogate mothers, but there is nothing to prevent the woman herself from setting up in business as a surrogate mother. That is how I read clause 2. I shall listen carefully to my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister's reply, because I know that he has done his best with a Bill in a difficult area about which there is much public concern.

However, if I have read the Bill correctly, it would appear that a woman may become a surrogate mother and earn a profitable living. Money may change hands, as long as it goes to the woman directly from the would-be parents. That worries me greatly, because I find womb-leasing utterly repugnant, and I believe that the Warnock committee also took that view.

Non-profit making agencies are not covered by the Bill. Perhaps I have become cynical after many years in the House, but there are many ways to get round such a ruling. Will the police check the accounts of non-profit making agency set up to make surrogacy arrangements? Will there be investigations to ensure that that agency is not benefiting from the arrangements that it makes?

I cannot help wondering about foreign agencies, because hon. Members will be well aware that it was an American agency that set up the Baby Cotton case which alerted the public to the dangers of what is happening. I do not see how the Bill could stop any arrangement made with a foreign agency, for example in Holland or America, which advertised for women to become surrogate mothers and relayed such information across the Atlantic.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The hon. Lady mentioned profit and asked whether accounts would be examined. As far as I am aware, profit is not mentioned as a criterion. The criterion is a "commercial basis". In the Bill "commercial basis" is defined as any payment that is received or given. That is rather different from the profit that the hon. Lady suggested. She may have mistaken "commercial basis", for "profit". They are different things under the Bill.

Mrs Knight: I do not know whether I am being oversimplistic or overcynical. As I understand it, under the Bill an agency cannot arrange a surrogate mother to bear a child for would-be parents for profit. An agency can make such arrangements provided that it does not make a profit.

Mr. Meadowcroft: No.

Mrs. Knight: I am delighted to hear that. I shall be interested to hear what my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health says. Outside the House the view is that non-profit making agencies are not covered by the Bill. I am anxious to know the true position.

The Bill covers only advertisements in the United Kingdom. I fully understand that we can cover only those advertisements. Agencies could advertise in America or Europe. A woman could be informed of those advertisements and make her arrangements with the agencies if they were not in the United Kingdom. The agencies might be in Jersey, Guernsey or somewhere like that. That would be handy.

I am worried about the suggestion that has been made — it was contained in the Warnock report — that surrogacy is all right provided that no profit is made from it. I questioned Dame Mary Warnock, as she then was, about that point. I said, "Have you ever known cases where women have borne children for nothing?" She said, "Oh, yes. I knew of a case where the eldest daughter, who was 16, had a child, and the family brought up the child as its own." That is not what I understand to be a surrogate mother. We are talking about financial arrangements by which a woman lets out her womb and conceives and bears a child which she will give up for money.

I have never known a case where a woman has been willing to do that for no return. That aspect of the matter worries me, because I can imagine difficulties in the family if a sister were involved. There could be problems later with the marriage. All kinds of difficulties would arise when the child was known to be the child of the person whom he or she calls aunt.

When we tinker with such matters we uncover difficulties which we have not fully understood. I salute my right hon. and learned Friend for his efforts, but I must place on record my deep anxiety about how the Bill will work in practice.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I am glad that we have finally reached the Third Reading of the Bill. I want to reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight) that if she reads the explanatory memorandum she will note that it says:

> "This Bill prohibits the recruitment of women as surrogate mothers and the negotiation of surrogacy arrangements by agencies acting on a commercial basis."

That is why I could not support the Liberal amendment. I should prefer there to be no surrogacy arrangements, but the Bill deals specifically only with commercial surrogacy arrangements.

The Bill also prohibits advertisements of or for surrogacy services, and it covers the whole of the United Kingdom. This is a very important point. The advertisements referred to in clause 3(2), (4) and (5) make it quite clear that the proprietor, editor or publisher of a newspaper or periodical published in the United Kingdom which contains an advertisement to which the section applies is guilty of an offence. Later we read what that offence is. Furthermore, the offence is not restricted to advertisements published knowingly, because the proprietor, editor and publisher should know what they are publishing.

The hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) referred to my involvement in the newspaper industry, in which I spent two and a half years. I do not regret what I said in Committee, and I repeat it now. I said that newspapers have a right to be protected. The letter referred to by the hon. Member for Barking from the Newspaper Society dated 10 May makes it quite clear that I was referring to the terms and conditions relating to the acceptance of advertisements. If advertisements are inserted which newspapers know contain this information they will be liable at a later date.

Clause 3(4) provides that one must not publish such advertisements. If one does, one is clearly committing an offence. If, therefore, as my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston pointed out, foreign advertisements are knowingly put into the shop windows of newsagents, they will be breaking the law. Similarly, anybody who knowingly causes advertisements in foreign newspapers to be distributed in the United Kingdom—this covers the point made by my hon. Friend—will be committing an offence. The distributor of a newspaper or periodical which is published abroad and sold in this country will be committing an offence.

The British Medical Association who wrote to me on 24 April 1985 said that from a medical point of view it completely supported the Government. I apologise to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed for not giving way earlier, but I knew that other Liberal Members wanted to speak. It is important to protect the baby and we need to provide an arrangement that will last. The Newspaper Society wrote the same letter to me as they wrote to the hon. Member for Barking. I share its concern about one point. It is extremely concerned that clause 3(2) imposes a strict liability on the publisher of any newspaper containing an advertisement referring to surrogacy arrangements. My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health will, I know, allay that particular fear.

The Newspaper Society refers to inconsistency in the drafting of the clause. I believe that it is well drafted, but if the Newspaper Society is concerned about this point a reply is obviously required.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde) I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. Does he not think that all the panic about advertisements and the possibility of mail shots from the United States are completely unfounded? It is a question of scale. Very few people require surrogacy arrangements. Therefore it would be impracticable and uneconomic for anybody to indulge in this practice, even some fanatic in the United States.

Mr. Bruinvels: I agree with my hon. Friend, who has done so much about the surrogacy arrangements, who introduced a ten minute Bill almost a year ago and who has been a leading light in the campaign. The claimed advertisements will not happen. Arrangements for commercial reasons will not now be made. Of course, in the past in Scotland non-financial arrangements were made when a girl was unable to have a child. An agreement was reached with her sister, for example, and no finance was involved. Such arrangements are made and they will not be precluded under the Bill.

I welcome the Bill which I believe to be desperately wanted. The Bill is absolutely right for our society, for protecting our families and for ensuring that never again will the unseemly arrangements associated with the Baby Cotton case arise. It will ensure that when couples want a child they can have it in the normal way and that money will never enter into such sickening and unfortunate arrangements.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I finish the debate on a note of complete support for the Bill. I hope that the House of Lords will take note of that and that the Bill will enjoy a speedy passage.

On Third Reading, hon. Members have confirmed their support, and a number of Committee points have been repeated. Hon. Members are anxious not to hold up the measure, but the issue is so complex that worries have to be voiced about the exact drafting of various provisions. The Government will continue to pursue those anxieties and they will be examined closely in another place. The opportunity will be taken to tidy up certain matters.

The Bill addresses itself to two narrow issues. They are deliberately narrow so that we can achieve an agreed objective. We reserve for later the much wider and related issues of assistance for infertility, the legitimacy of children and the legality of many issues considered by the Warnock Commission.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) does not think that we can do much more in relation to voluntary surrogacy. I share his view that the private, informal arrangements that have existed since time immemorial will not be tackled by the law. The big question that the House will find difficult to resolve is that raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight) about agencies acting on a non-commercial, non-fee basis. A division of opinion is inevitable and the House will return to that issue later.

The Bill makes it illegal for commercial agencies to thrive in this country. That is done in a particular way, set out in clause 2, which is aimed at making the negotiations and the assembling of information which would enable agreements to be negotiated unlawful if payment is received for those negotiations. I paraphrase the provisions loosely. Those interested must look at the exact text. The Bill also makes illegal advertising by anybody in a publication published in the United Kingdom or through a broadcast aimed at the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) expressed again her anxiety about the position of professionals such as solicitors, social workers or doctors who might accept a fee for giving certain advice to parties to voluntary surragacy arrangements and thereby fall foul of the Bill.

I shall attempt, as briefly as possible, to reiterate the points I made in Committee, in the hope of making matters a little clearer. The starting point must be that anyone who is trying to work out whether he or she is committing an offence under the Bill must look at clause 2. Clause 2(1) sets out under three subheadings the acts that are made unlawful. They will be unlawful if they are done on a commercial basis as defined in subsection (3), that is, if any payment is received for committing the act. Therefore, it is unlawful only if anyone receives a fee for being involved in negotiating arrangements as defined in that subsection.

To apply that to the points raised by the hon. Member for Barking, first, a lawyer or any other professional cannot really commit an offence if he is giving advice only to one party or the other. Any lawyer dealing only with the intending parents or only with the would-be surrogate mother cannot become involved in any negotiations. As long as advice given to one party or the other does not extend into negotiations or anything plainly aimed at negotiations as defined in clause 2, it would not be unlawful. Therefore, a lawyer can safely give advice to one party or the other provided that he deals only with the one side and has nothing to do with the other side.

Ms. Richardson: What the Minister is saying is interesting and helpful. But surely where two parties, in whatever sort of contract, have their own solicitors, there must come a time when they wish to communicate to make an agreement. Is the Minister saying that the solicitor for one party cannot write to the solicitor for the other party because the moment he does so he is negotiating and therefore flouting the law?

Mr. Clarke: I am saying just that. If one solicitor gets in contact with the other solicitor, and the moment that he does any of the acts defined in the clause, he will be guilty of a criminal offence if he takes a fee.

In drafting a Bill aimed at outlawing commercial surrogacy agencies, the most effective way to achieve that is to aim at the principal activity of those agencies, which is to bring together the parties or to compile information to enable them to be brought together—for example, lists of would-be surrogate mothers and lists of intending parents—and then to negotiate an agreement between the two. That is why the Bill is drafted to make that unlawful.

The moment we say that that is unlawful unless that person is a solicitor, a doctor or a professional social worker, we have an anomalous position and the law will be unenforceable.

While a solicitor is giving advice about the general law to one party or the other, who has come to him with his worries, it is highly unlikely that he could fall foul of this legislation. The question arises of what happens if all three parties go to a solicitor together to get his advice. That solicitor will no doubt realise that he must address himself to the precise terms of what will be an Act of Parliament to know what he can or cannot do. He could certainly give general legal advice to all three parties and tell them what it is unlawful for them to do. But he would be committing an offence if he began negotiating an agreement or arrangement between the parties and took part in the interchange about terms and so on.

I do not think that I can explain the bill further than that. I underline te fact that, in practice, whether an act is unlawful will depend entirely on whether it falls within the definition in clause 2 and whether that act has been for payment. If hon. Members still have doubts, I ask them to consider how else one is to define the activities of a commercial agency in an effective way.

Mr. Beith: In supposing that a solicitor could give extensive advice on a surrogacy arrangement, is not the Minister relying on a narrow interpretation of clause 2(1)(c), which refers to compiling "any information with a view to its use in making, or negotiating the making of, surrogacy arrangements."

The right hon. and learned Gentleman talked of that as though it meant information such as the location of a possible mother. It could mean information about the existing law relating to that matter.

Mr. Clarke: I will reflect on that. What the hon. Gentleman puts forward is ingenious, but I do not think that if a solicitor, for instance, had copies of surrogacy arrangement legislation on his shelves, he would be likely successfully to be accused of compiling "information with a view to . . . making, or negotiating the making of, surrogacy arrangements."

Thus, if the parties all went to a solicitor and asked, "If we go ahead on our own with a surrogacy arrangement by which we hand over a fee from one to the other, what then?" He would be able to advise them, for example, that no penalty could apply to any of the three people, or he could try to advise them on whether the contract would be unenforceable as contrary to public policy, if we were not able to secure a clause in another place.

He would, therefore, be able to give general legal advice, but he would not be safe if he began to do anything which amounted to the making or negotiating of a surrogacy arrangement—if, for example, he began to draft a suitable form of contract and negotiate terms between the parties.

I have not had the advantage of seeing the letter from the Newspaper Society, I apologise if it has reached my Department but has not reached me. I appreciate that most hon. Members seem to have their copies. I will consider the letter when I receive it. My reaction to the point made about it by the hon. Member for Barking is that a newspaper can be liable for publishing a defamatory advertisement in its pages, just as it can be liable for publishing defamatory editorial matter. A newspaper would not escape entirely if some wholly defamatory advertisement aimed at any one of us appeared in its columns.

There is a distinction between the drafting of the Bill as it affects newspapers and broadcasters. That is because publication in a newspaper means putting out the printed word. It is reasonable for the publishers and others to be held responsible for what they have allowed to appear on a printed page that they could have read.

For a broadcaster dealing with, say, a phone-in programme, it is possible for things to be blurted out over the air—for example, if a delay button has not been fitted—in a way that is completely beyond the control of the broadcaster. That is why "knowingly" appears in the Bill in relation to broadcasters and gives them a slightly advantaged position.

I accept that the hon. Member for Barking is concerned not so much with penalties as with the right to trial by jury of any parties who are brought to court under the Bill. It would not be impossible to draft a Bill to give a right to trial by jury even when there is no penalty of imprisonment. Indeed, if this measure were to provide for a penalty of imprisonment of six months or more, there would automatically, under other legislation, be a right to opt for trial by jury. That is not given by the Bill because the maximum penalty is three months.

As we pointed out in Committee, we are against the hon. Lady on this issue and do not see the case for trial by jury. There must be some, less serious, criminal matters which are reserved to the magistrates' court and which need to go to the Crown Court at the option of the accused. The nature of proceedings under the Bill is not likely to be similar to those in ordinary criminal proceedings.

The very existence of an Act of Parliament will stop any reputable commercial body from seeking to make a living in this way. Trying to break the law will become a rather foolish and high risk way of making a very limited living. If proceedings have to be brought, however, they are unlikely to turn on the issues of fact that often arise in criminal cases. I do not envisage people producing alibis or denying a large part of the factual information. Evidence will be given describing a particular state of affairs and the court will be called upon to decide whether it is unlawful within the terms of the legislation. That should be well within the competence of a magistrates court.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston raised a point that was not dealt with by the other three hon. Members who spoke—the position of the woman who offers herself as a surrogate mother and, as my hon. Friend fears, seeks to make a living by so doing. My hon. Friend is certainly correct in saying that under the Bill the woman could not be guilty of a criminal offence if she received a fee in that way, although she could be guilty of a criminal offence if she advertised her services the opportunities for making money in that way will be seriously inhibited.

It has not been made a criminal offence for a woman to enter into such an agreement because we were seeking consensus on this and that was the view of quite a large number, although not all, of the people who considered this aspect. In some circumstances, one could regard the surrogate mother as a victim or potential victim whom we should be seeking to protect. The would-be parents could also be seen as possible victims, their desire for a child being exploited by an agency arranging surrogate mothers.

To impose criminal penalties on a foolish woman who may have given way to the temptation of a large sum of money when she was in a vulnerable position is a contentious matter. To impose such penalties on the would-be parents, who may have been carried away by their desperate desire for a child, would also be a contentious matter. Moreover, if any child was born as a result of such arrangements it would be a very unhappy start in life for a child if either its natural mother or its intended parents were promptly prosecuted. It would also be extremely difficult to preserve the confidentiality of the child in such circumstances.

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston that we considered the point seriously, but we were sure that we should not command universal support in the House if we attached penalties of that kind to the mother and I think that it would be unwise to consider doing so at this stage.

I hope that I have dealt with all the points raised, although probably at too great a length, and I return to what remains the one common theme of this evening's debates on the Bill. Everyone supports the Bill and is anxious to see it on the Statute Book. There is absolutely clear agreement between us, which I am sure reflects the vast bulk of public opinion outside, that the sooner we have a law that stops commercial agencies and advertisements in this area, the better.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Prosecution of Offences Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

EXPENSES

'.—(1) There shall be paid out of money provided by Parliament such sums as the Attorney General may, with the consent of the Treasury, direct in respect of the expenditure incurred by the Director of Public Prosecutions in the discharge of his functions under this Act.

(2) Any expenditure incurred by the Secretary of State or the Attorney General which is attributable to this Act shall be payable out of money provided by Parliament.'. — [Mr. Mellor.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

11.38 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The clause enables expenditure arising as a result of the Bill to be funded by parliamentary Vote. I commend it to the House.

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): I wish to make just one point. Those who have read the Official Report of the Second Reading debate will know that I was particularly anxious to ensure that the cost of administering the Crown prosecution service did not fall within the orbit of the Home Office. It is extremely important that not only the financing but all the arrangements for the Crown prosecution service should be completely outside the orbit of the Home Office. I am delighted that the new clause has been introduced, and I welcome it warmly.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time and added to the Bill.

Clause 11

TRANSFER OF STAFF

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 7, line 29, leave out 'and'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 2 and 3.

Mr. Mellor: These are technical amendments which make some changes to the regulations so that the existing contracts of employment of any employee who considers himself adversely affected by the regulations may be terminated so that he might, under certain circumstances, receive redundancy payments.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 2, in page 7, line 30, at end insert

'; and

(c) for the termination of the employment with the authorities concerned of persons to whom the regulations apply (whether or not they are transferred in accordance with the regulations) and as to the consequences of that termination.'.

No. 3, in page 7, line 35, at end insert

'and may make such modifications in the application of any enactment as the Attorney General considers appropriate in connection with any provision of the regulations of a kind mentioned in subsection (2)(c) above'.—[Mr. Mellor.]

STAFF COMMISSION

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 8, line 27, leave out 'one month' and insert 'three months'.

The amendment is made necessary by the welcome speed with which this measure has proceeded through the House. The period of three months instead of one month will give us that amount of extra time to ensure that the staff commission can be appointed within the time scale prescribed by the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 16

DEFENCE COSTS

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 14, line 35, leave out 'or' and insert

'(a)

(on an appeal under that Part against conviction—)

(i) substitutes a verdict of guilty of another offence;

(ii) in a case where a special verdict has been found, orders a different conclusion on the effect of that verdict to be recorded; or

(iii) is of the opinion that the case falls within paragraph (a) or (b) of section 6(1) of that Act (cases where the court substitutes a finding of insanity or unfitness to plead); or'.

The amendment enables the Court of Appeal to make a defendant's costs order where, on an appeal against conviction, it substitutes a verdict of guilty of another offence, orders the recording of a different conclusion of the effect of a special verdict, or substitutes a finding of insanity or unfitness to plead.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 20

REGULATIONS

The Solicitor-General: I beg to move amendment No. 6, in page 20, line 38 after 'means', insert '(a)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 7.

The Solicitor-General: These are technical amendments consequent upon an amendment moved by the Lord Chancellor in another place.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 7, in page 20, line 41, at end insert 'or—

(b) an order made in a criminal case by the House of Lords for the payment of costs by a party to proceedings.'. — [The Solicitor-General.]

Clause 22

POWER OF SECRETARY OF STATE TO SET TIME LIMITS IN RELATION TO PRELIMINARY STAGES OF CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 22, line 37, at end insert:

'(2A) Regulations made pursuant to subsection (1) above shall be made either,

(a) as experimental regulations, which regulations shall be expressed to apply for a period not longer than 18 months; or

(b) as permanent regulations, which regulations shall be made by statutory instrument requiring an affirmative resolution of the House of Commons, and in respect of any area specified in such regulations only one set of experimental regulations may be made.'.

We went over this ground in Committee. The object of the amendment is to ensure that there is ample opportunity for the House to consider and approve any permanent regulation and to limit temporary regulations for an experimental period. I thought in Committee that the Minister was showing some sympathy with the idea. I am glad that the amendment has been selected. I want to be sure that the Government will give an assurance that the House will have an opportunity to consider the proposals that emanate following the experiments that are now taking place.

Mr. Mellor: As the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) has said, I have considerable sympathy with his point. The only obstacle that stands in the way of acceptance of the amendment is the possibility that, as a result of the field trials, we may well think it expedient to introduce perhaps as many as half a dozen different time limits to cover different parts of the country. Obviously, circumstances vary from area to area. A time limit would be pointless unless it was specifically geared to the part of the country in question and toned up the system there.

I suggest that if a number of different time limit orders were needed, or they needed to be changed, it might be oppressive to require an affirmative resolution each time. Plainly, it would be a good idea to ensure that we had at least one debate, and possibly more. I give an undertaking to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that I shall ensure that he is informed when we are ready to lay these orders. Arrangements can be made for a debate the first time and on subsequent occasions, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman wishes. It may well be that after one or two occasions it would not be thought necessary that a change had to be made each time. I hope that, on that basis, the right hon. and learned Gentleman will feel able to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. John Morris: On the basis of that assurance, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

11.45 pm

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 24, line 44, at end insert—

'(12A) For the purposes of section 29(3) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 (High Court to have power to make prerogative orders in relation to jurisdiction of Crown Court in matters which do not relate to trial on indictment) the jurisdiction conferred on the Crown Court by this section shall be taken to be part of its jurisdiction in matters other than those relating to trial on indictment.'.

I trailed this amendment in Committee. It does what I said then we intended to do. On that basis, I hope that it will be acceptable to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 23

DISCONTINUANCE OF PROCEEDINGS IN MAGISTRATES' COURTS

Mr. Mellor: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 25, line 17, leave out from 'discontinued' to end of line 19 and insert:

'with effect from the giving of that notice but may be revived by notice given by the accused under subsection (6) below.

(3A) Where, in the case of a person charged with an offence after being taken into custody without a warrant, the Director gives him notice, at a time when no magistrates' court has been informed of the charge, that the proceedings against him are discontinued, they shall be discontinued with effect from the giving of that notice.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this amendment it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 11, 12 and 14.

Mr. Mellor: Again, these amendments deal with matters in respect of which I revealed to the Committee the Government's intention to introduce provisions to this effect. I hope that they will be acceptable.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 11, in page 25, line 29, at end insert

'within the prescribed period; and where notice is so given the proceedings shall continue as if no notice had been given by the Director under subsection (3) above.'.

No. 12, in line 34, at end insert—

'(8A) In this section "prescribed" means prescribed by rules made under section 144 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980.'. —[Mr. Mellor.]

Schedule 1

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 29, leave out lines 9 to 18.

The amendment raises a matter which has not been referred to earlier in proceedings in this House or another place.

In the administration of justice, the magistrates' courts face a difficulty in the impression that the public have of how they function. The police investigate an alleged offence, they charge an alleged offender, a summons is served on him to attend court — a court still known popularly as "the police court"—and in court the police conduct the case against the defendant.

Some defendants who are not familiar with the ways of the court—and some of those who are—are convinced that once the police have started investigations and pressed a charge, that is it, because the police and the court are part of one set-up to ensure that that person is convicted under the system.

We know that that is not so, that it is the job of the police to investigate a crime and to bring a case to court if they consider that there may be a case to answer, and that it is left to the court to decide—a magistrates' court or a higher court, all of whom form part of our independent judiciary. It is up to the court to decide guilt and to sentence.

Alas, that is not how it is always seen. This Bill is a very important step in clarifying the position by setting up an independent prosecution service—independent of the police and independent of the courts. They will be three quite separate entities.

My fear is that if the lines to which I refer remain in the Bill, that appearance of independence will be seriously prejudiced. That is not only my view, because I speak for the Magistrates' Association, which represents more than 90 per cent. of active magistrates in England and Wales — and its concern is shared by the Justices' Clerks' Society and by the Association of Magisterial Officers, which I have the honour to advise.

As the Bill stands, in a case where there is a plea of guilty by letter, as frequently happens, the normal procedure will be for the clerk to read the prosecution statement. That will be the case even if the defendant appears in court having already pleaded guilty by letter, because presumably there will be no one present from the prosecution service, and the clerk will be expected to read the prosecution statement.

The magistrates and the court staff know that others have prepared that prosecution statement and that the clerk is simply the mouthpiece. But others who are not familiar with court procedures will not know that. What sort of impression will they get? What will be the impression of those sitting in the public gallery—the casual visitor, or those sitting waiting for their cases to be heard later in the morning? The impression will be given that the clerk is very much involved with prosecution procedure, and he will be seen to get up and apparently to present the case. This must undermine the image that we are trying to convey—that the prosecution service is independent.

I suspect that my hon. Friend will argue against this on grounds of expense, but I am not suggesting that it is necessary to have a highly qualified solicitor in court simply to deal with a strong of please of guilty by letter. However, an assistant in the prosecution service, or somebody from it who is not part of the court staff, should be seen to be presenting the case, even when it is a guilty plea by letter.

I hope that my hon. Friend will feel able to accept my amendment. If he is not, perhaps he can explain to the House the thinking behind the proposal in the Bill. Is it intended to cover exceptional circumstances? That is understandable, but if it is to be the general practice that the court clerk is expected to read out the prosecuting statement in the circumstances that I have described, that is regrettable, both in principle and in practice, and it will impose upon the clerks a duty that they do not wish to have, and, for the reasons that I have set out, it is inappropriate for them to have.

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) has considerable experience, as a justice of the peace, of Home Office matters. Therefore, it is with some care that I deal with his points. I know that he is putting concerns that are felt by the Magistrates' Association and the Association of Magisterial Officers. I reassure him that in most circumstances courts will be attended by members of the prosecution service, and that will plainly be in everybody's interests. However, there are circumstances, when a court is dealing with pleas of guilty by letter, when it would not be contrary to the interests of justice if the clerk were to read out the agreed statement of facts.

We would be sensitive to any suggestion that we were placing an officer of the court in an invidious position. We would not allow matters of economics to compel us to take that action if we thought that we were doing that. While economics are relevant in this sector as in any other, and we must govern our actions to som extent by this, we would not do anything just for the financial aspect alone.

However, there is some sensitivity about this, and officers need not be as troubled as they are. After all, we are dealing in the main with traffic offences, relatively trivial matters by the standards of the worst crimes in the criminal calendar, which the defendant has decided is a fair charge, and should be the subject of a guilty plea by letter.

It has always been the case that when the guilty plea by letter arrives, it will almost certainly contain some passages of mitigation, and it has always been the case that the clerk reads out those passages of mitigation. All that we are suggesting that he will do under these arrangements is also to read out an agreed statement of facts, which will already have been submitted to the defendant, and about which he will know before making a plea of guilty. If he were unhappy about any of those facts, he would either have asserted that by way of his plea, or by mitigation in his letter.

As it has not been suggested, and it would be wrong if it were suggested, that the clerk of the court was entering the arena on behalf of the defendant by reading the defendant's letter to the justices, it would also be wrong to suggest that the clerk was entering the lists on behalf of the prosecution by reading out the statement of fact.

On a proper analysis, I believe that the statement of facts, once they are agreed by the defendant, becomes more than a partisan assertion. They become the agreed facts of the matter.

I hope that, on that basis, my hon. Friend will see that there is quite a compelling case for doing what we do. Although one is always reluctant to be at odds with any part of the magistracy or its clerks, it would be difficult for me to do as he asks. I hope that my explanation has been helpful and that on that basis he will agree to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Sims: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his explanation. I accept that the defendant would be well aware of the situation, and the statement being read out by the clerk would be an agreed statement. My concern was the impression that the general public might have as to the involvement of the clerk in the prosecution procedure. I have explained the fears that the magistracy and the magistrates' clerks have. My hon. Friend has done his best to put those fears at rest. I hope that in the event they will prove to be unfounded. In the light of what my hon. Friend has said, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 14, in page 29, line 36 at end insert—

'Contempt of Court Act 1981 (c.49)

3A. In paragraph 7 of Schedule 1 to the Contempt of Court Act 1981 (meaning of "discontinuance" in relation to criminal proceedings), the following sub-paragraph shall be inserted after sub-paragraph (a)—

"(aa) in England and Wales, if they are discontinued by virtue of section 23 of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985",

3B. After paragraph 9 of Schedule 1 to that Act there shall be inserted the following paragraph—

"9A Where proceedings in England and Wales have been discontinued by virtue of section 23 of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985, but notice is given by the accused under subsection (6) of that section to the effect that he wants the proceedings to continue, they become active again with the giving of that notice.".'.

No. 17, in page 30, line 6 leave out '(1)' and insert '(2)'.—[The Solicitor-General.]

The Solicitor-General: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 30, leave out lines 29 to 44 and insert—

'(5) For paragraphs 6 and 7 there shall be substituted the following—

"6. Where the criminal division of the Court of Appeal makes an order as to costs to be paid by—

(a) an appellant;

(b) an applicant for leave to appeal to that court; or

(c) in the case of an application for leave to appeal to the House of Lords, an applicant who was the appellant before the criminal division.".'.

This is a technical amendment substituting a new paragraph. It deals with the enforcement of cost orders made by the Court of Appeal. Cost orders made by the House of Lords will be enforced as part of the inherent jurisdiction of that House.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 16, in page 31, line 13, leave out 'award' and insert 'order'. — [The Solicitor-General.]

Schedule 2

REPEALS

Amendment made: No. 18, in page 32, line 26, leave out '32(1)' and insert '32(2)'.—[The Solicitor-General.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

11.57 pm

Mr. John Morris: The Bill has been improved during the legislative process. I, for one, welcome very much what was achieved in another place, in that acquitted defendants in summary trials are able to obtain their costs. That is a major improvement.

Great as is the temptation, I do not propose to go through the Bill at this late hour, save to say that in our deliberations we concentrated on three matters—costs, children, and time limits, to which we returned tonight. The Bill went through its processes speedily, speedier than most of us had anticipated. Some organisations felt that had there been more time available, some of their views might have had further consideration.

I wrote to the Solicitor-General about a document that I had received from Mr. John Harrison of the Paddington Law Centre, and the hon. and learned Gentleman kindly replied to me on 29 April, on the eve of the last consideration of the Bill, about the fear of Mr. Harrison that the Bill inadvertently abolished the tort of malicious prosecution or at least substantially reduced its scope. The hon. and learned Gentleman kindly went through the arguments. What had escaped Mr. Harrison was the fact that the initial decision whether to institute proceedings continued to be taken by the police, so for the most part it would appear that those fears were dealt with by the hon. and learned Gentleman. There remained a small proportion of cases where the Director of Public Prosecutions instituted prosecutions. The Solicitor-General set out the record and reputation of the Director and explained the unlikelihood of him being sued. Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman will explain further the extent of the reduction to which proceedings in tort may be instituted for malicious prosecution. If he does so, we shall know exactly what has been done.

I spent much time on Second Reading talking about accountability and I ended by saying that Parliament will have only begun its task in establishing the machinery of accountability when the Bill is enacted. We shall have to monitor its workings in the years ahead. I welcome the Bill and wish it well, because its main purpose is to establish a prosecution service that is independent of the police, which is what many on both sides of the House have talked about for a long time. I am pleased that that has been achieved tonight.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): At this late hour I am sure that the Ministers, who have worked on the Bill from Committee until this stage, will not welcome lengthy contributions. Consequently, my remarks will be brief.

The Bill makes sense, and I welcome it. I regret the entire removal of the prosecution function from the police service because over the years, with its faults, it has been a relatively efficient and not terribly expensive service. However, the House has been right to agree to the proposals contained in the Bill.

I wish to ask my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General three general questions. First, "criminal proceedings" are henceforth to be the responsibility of the prosecution service and no longer that of the police. Will this relieve the police of responsibility for all criminal proceedings that take place in the courts? Is it intended that "criminal" shall be an all-embracing definition covering any breach of common and statute law, including minor motoring offences? Will it remove from the responsibilities of the police administrative matters that are dealt with in the magistrates' courts such as firearm certificates, liquor licensing and objections to occasional licences and extensions, which currently involve police time? If the prosecution service is to take over criminal matters, let it take them all over.

I am concerned about resources. If the Bill is to achieve its main intention, it is essential that all court work, not most of it, be undertaken by the new service. Any savings which do not release the police from all forms of advocacy will be insignificant. It is the Government's judgment that 600 police officers, mostly of supervisory rank, will be freed by the Bill. They will not be relieved of advocacy work unless all the minor matters are undertaken by the prosecution service.

Secondly, in clause 13 a "fair contribution" is to be made by other bodies for part of the service. The inference is that, in addition to the money from the Government, other funds will be extracted, perhaps properly, from county councils or the police authority. At present budgets in the police service are tight. Some of my hon. Friends may be shocked to hear that throughout the country police numbers are not rising, but falling sharply. Almost 1,500 officers fewer are now in post than there should be according to establishment figures. We were elected to achieve establishment figures. I recognise, however, that there has been a substantial increase on previous years.

If a "fair contribution" is to be extracted from police authorities, where is the money to come from? Is it to come from not recruiting more policemen or not building more police stations? I have read the Committee reports, but I have not seen a detailed quantification of the amount of money that the phrase "fair contribution" means. I should like some assurance from my hon. and learned Friend that those contributions will not be extracted from police budgets if it means less police man power when the service is as stretched as it is today.

My final point, on which I should like my hon. and learned Friend to comment, is the matter of delays in bringing cases to trial. My hon. and learned Friend will recall that last year the Home Affairs Select Committee reported on those inordinate delays — they were commented on frequently in Committee — but was misguided in that it appeared to suggest that each and every delay in bringing often complex cases to trial was occasioned by the prosecution. I am willing to accept that many, and perhaps most, delays arise because of the prosecution, and the terms of the Bill appear to follow that assumption. However, anyone with a little experience in legal affairs—I am so advised by the police service—will accept that often those delays are occasioned by the defence.

I hope that the Bill is even handed, but I do not read it that way. I should like my hon. and learned Friend to comment on the view of the Police Federation that the Bill is not even handed, that it implies that all delays arise from prosecution and that it does not provide for effective pressure on the defence to get a move on.

I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will be able to deal with those questions. I join the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) in welcoming the general drift of the Bill.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): The fact that little controversy has surrounded the stages of the Bill does not mean that it is perfect. It introduces a most welcome and much awaited element of independence into the prosecuting function. We look forward with confidence to the development of that independence. I hope that when the Government monitor the way in which the independent prosecution service operates, and if it works well, they will consider the possibility of extending its role to include other forms of prosecution, such as trading standards' prosecutions and other functions which are administered at considerable expense by local authorities, which are not always best equipped to deal with them.

The most significant improvement was made in the other place when an absurd provision to give the prosecution the power to make theoretical appeal against certain sentences was removed. I welcome that removal, but I hope that we shall have an assurance from the Government that that proposal will not be regurgitated in the next Session of Parliament.

I join those who have expressed their good wishes to the Bill, and I hope that it will prove to be at least the basis of the success which most of us believe it will be.

12.9 am

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): I welcome the Bill, in that, since the peak age of offending is 15, it seems reasonable on Third Reading to spend some time on the implications of the Bill for juveniles. In Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister said that the Director of Public Prosecutions was well seized of the special considerations affecting juveniles and of the implications for training and development of the new service. He said that he had undertaken that where there is sufficient juvenile court work to justify specialisation, whether whole time or part time, officers of the new service will be assigned and trained specially to deal with juvenile cases.

That is some assurance, but there is anxiety among those used to dealing with the juvenile courts that the Bill will lead to further delays. Slow justice is poor justice for everybody, but especially for juveniles. They have great difficulty in understanding the process, and the strain on them and their families while waiting for a court hearing is great and potentially damaging. In the case of juveniles, the damage of a case coming to court with insufficient evidence is most harmful, and no doubt the new Bill will assist in that area.

I have been a magistrate in an area where there was special difficulty between the police and the local community, and I would welcome the clear separation of the police having to apprehend and investigate crimes, but the decision to prosecute being made elsewhere. But I would not wish to underestimate the important expertise that many police juvenile bureaux have developed over the years in knowing the local circumstances and in understanding juvenile crime in context. It would be a shame if an unintended consequence of the Bill was that the widespread and variable use of cautioning was undermined. We are agreed that, for juveniles, prevention and diversion are essential.

In conclusion, I welcome the Bill and I hope that it is but a first step to an overall review of the juvenile justice system.

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): Unashamedly, I take a few minutes of the time of the House, because my involvement in the Bill goes back to 1979, when the roots of what we are debating started. That was the Royal Commission on Criminal Evidence, under the chairmanship of Sir Cyril Phillips. Then I came across the fundamentals of this move in the Home Affairs Select Committee, and yet again I look to the Government Front Bench and remember with great pleasure the many weeks we spent together in Committee on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, which eventually fell immediately before the general election. I have great pleasure, as I am sure do all hon. Members, in seeing this measure come before the House. I also have a great sense of duty fulfilled.

However, I must make two points which I hope my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General will consider in the days ahead. I was especially impressed by the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths), who made the plea that even-handedness should saturate the pages of the Bill. It will not come as a surprise for those hon. Members who served in Committee to hear that my next words will be in direct conflict with the comments of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile).

I have had the opportunity of speaking with magistrates who have expressed genuine anxiety about some sentencing procedures. I pay a warm, generous and sincere tribute to the members of the bench who give up their time to administer justice in the courts. When magistrates have a defendant before them who they believe should receive a higher sentence they have the power, which they exercise, to commit that person to a higher court for sentence. Magistrates feel frustrated by the fact that under the new public prosecution system people will receive a lighter sentence than they would from the magistrates.

Under clause 16 we have a right of appeal against conviction or severity of sentence. I have consistently held the view that the Crown prosecutor should equally have the right to appeal against the leniency of a sentence. That point was well ventilated on Second Reading and in Committee. Even at this stage it is something that could be considered. I commend that point to my hon. and learned Friend, because it is one that has been debated since the Bill was conceived.

Mr. Sims: I shall avoid the temptation of pursuing the point mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn). I know that his comments about the work done by magistrates will be appreciated. I can say that they are well deserved, because I am now precluded by the rules laid down by my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor from sitting on my Bench, much as I should like to do so.

I invite my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General to tell us to what extent he anticipates court staff will be involved in the administration of the prosecution service. If that seems a strange question, I ask it because I understand that informal approaches have been made to court staff about the extent to which their accounting facilities might be used by the prosecuting service. I understand that in some circumstances that might be convenient; for example, for paying the expenses of prosecution witnesses and such matters.

On principle, I should have thought it better, for reasons that I have already given, to keep the prosecution service and the court staff separate. If, however, it is found convenient to use the court staff for some aspect of the prosecuting service's work, I hope that the Home Office will bear in mind the fact that court staff are already heavily engaged, with limited numbers, and that if extra work is to be imposed upon them, the resources to do that work should be made available.

The Solicitor-General: I am grateful for the expressions of support and approval that have come from so many of those who have spoken on Third Reading. The Bill primarily implements the decision of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to establish an independent prosecuting service for England and Wales. The Bill has, as we are aware, also provided a useful vehicle to make important and necessary changes in the arrangements for costs in relation to criminal cases and to bring into the English system measures analogous to those which have operated for a long time in Scotland relating to delays in bringing cases to trial.

I have been asked to reply to a number of individual points. In Committee the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) asked about the fears which had been expressed that, inadvertently, the Bill might have abolished the common law tort of malicious prosecution, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman fairly summarised the reply that I gave to him then. At this time of night I think that I can usefully express it in this way.

It was thought that because under the provisions of the Bill prosecutions were to be conducted by the prosecution service it would no longer be possible to sue the police for the tort of malicious prosecution. However, as I explained to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that argument failed to take account of the fact that responsibility for the institution of proceedings will remain, under the provisions of the Bill, with the police. It will be recalled that the recommendation of the Philips Royal Commission was that a distinction should be made between the functions of the police, which were respectively the investigation of offences and the institution of proceedings — that is, charging suspects — and the functions of conducting the prosecution and taking the decisions that are relevant to prosecutions once a charge has been laid. Those latter responsibilities are to be conducted by the independent Crown prosecution service.

There is, therefore, no effective change in the position of the director. Certain matters will fall to be considered by him, and in rare cases he will be empowered to institute and will in practice institute proceedings. I accept that in those circumstances it would be difficult successfully to bring proceedings against the director, but, as I pointed out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that is a measure of the respect in which the director is held by reason of the record for impartiality and for diligence that he has acquired over the years in the course of the conduct of his duties. Therefore, we do not believe that there is any need to fear that inadvertently the Bill has abolished the tort of malicious prosecution or that it has abolished the means whereby the police can be prosecuted for malicious prosecution in a proper case.

On the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) on behalf of the Police Federation, whose interests he so diligently represents, he asked, first, whether the criminal proceedings referred to in the Bill will be all-embracing, in the sense that the independent service will be responsible for every offence committed under any statute which can strictly be described as a criminal statute. Strictly speaking, the answer is no. Firearms certificates and liquor licensing applications will continue to be dealt with separately and will be the responsibility of the police, as will minor motoring offences. That is a sensible division of responsibility. I do not believe that the information that I have given contains any surprises.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds also referred to the equivalent of 600 full-time police officers being saved by the new provisions. That calculation was made on the basis that the new service will undertake functions which do not include such minor matters as firearms certificates and liquor licensing applications, to which I have already referred.

I was asked about the cost referred to in clause 13 and whether it would involve the resource currently allocated to the police. Clause 13 requires that the Secretary of State shall make "a fair contribution" and provides for disputes to be resolved. The balance will have to be found by the local authority, which will have to decide from where that balance can be found. In a slip of the tongue earlier I added, motoring offences to the category which included fire arms applications and licensing matters. That was an inadvertent slip, for which I apologise. Motoring offences will be the responsibility of the new service.

I was asked about the new provisions on time limits. The Scottish law provisions relate to time limits which have to be observed by the prosecution at all stages of the prosecution process. The object is to ensure that delays for which the prosecution is responsible are not allowed to result in the accused person being denied trial. The same pattern is followed in the Bill. In some cases the defendant is responsible for delays, but the defendant usually pays the cost of being in prison pending trial on remand. The Bill deals with delays caused by the prosecution.

I am grateful for the welcome which the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) gave to the Bill. A major change is being made and much remains to be finalised in regulations to be made by the Attorney-General. The report of the management consultants, published by the Home Secretary only last Friday, has still to be considered in detail before we can decide on the precise form of the service.

I agree that a body of expert and experienced people should remain to deal with juvenile crime. It is not necessary to extend the Bill's provisions, but I acknowledge that juvenile crime is an important part of the responsibilities of those who have to deal with criminal justice.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn) I recall with pleasure the many weeks that we spent examining another Bill, when I learnt to enjoy and to value his contributions.

I realise that there is a real sense of public concern about sentencing. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, in his Second Reading speech, said that it was entirely proper that the public should be concerned in these matters and that the House and the Government should recognise that concern.

My hon. Friend said that, on occasions, magistrates were disappointed with the sentence passed by the Crown court. I do not doubt that that may happen, but Parliament has laid down a procedure whereby the Crown court considers matters afresh. I do not think that my hon. Friend would wish to deny it the independence and judgment which the statute has conferred upon it and hold that it could impose only a sentence which was in excess of what the magistrates may, by law, impose.

I differ from my hon. Friend when he argues about a right of appeal by the prosecutor against too lenient a sentence. The Government hold to the view that it is important to distinguish between the proper function of a prosecutor and the proper function of the judiciary. It is the judiciary, quite independent of any other influence, that should deal with sentencing. It would be sad if the prosecution were to identify itself with sentencing. That could lead to many undesirable and dangerous developments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) asked what would be the extent of court staff involvement in the arrangements for the operation of the Bill. It is not possible to give a clear answer. He knows that the management consultants' report was published recently, and we shall have to decide what is the best, the most economic and the most effective way to deal with such matters as witnesses' expenses. I take his point about the importance of distancing court staff from association with the prosecution. I understand his anxiety in that regard.

I do not wish to detain the House. The provisions of the Bill are well known to hon. Members in the Chamber tonight. I reiterate only the pleasure of the Government in the Bill meeting with general approval from all sides of the House. My right hon. and learned Friend and I are grateful for the constructive and consistently helpful contributions of the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon and all who have taken part in our debates. They have enabled us to make rapid progress with a Bill that is of major value and importance to our criminal justice system. I commend its Third Reading to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time and passed, with amendments.

PROCEDURE

Ordered,

That the Standing Order of 20 March 1984 relating to the nomination of the Procedure Committee be amended, by leaving out Mr. Allen Adams and Mr. Jim Callaghan and inserting Mr. Gregor MacKenzie and Mr. John Golding.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

Great Britain (Economic Divide)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

2.33 am

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): The words of Lord Stockton in another place in November last year echoed the thoughts of millions of people in this country when he said:

"it breaks my heart to see what is happening in our country today." — [Official Report, House of Lords, 13 November 1984; Vol. 457, c. 240.]

Without any doubt, Britain is a divided country and becoming more so with this Government's divisive economic strategy that is superimposing new inequalities on the traditional regional disparities.

In 1979 the Prime Minister pledged to rebuild our economy and to reunite a divided and disillusioned people. In truth, the nation has never been more torn and separated than it is today. From the outset, I wish to make it clear that the social and economic deprivation rampant in our society are not confined to the north. When my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and I toured the country as regional spokesmen for the Labour party before the last general election we saw problems in the south-east as great as any experienced in the north. In London, the Medway towns, the Isle of Thanet, Portsmouth, parts of the south-west and Cornwall, we saw those problems writ large. Nevertheless, the southern parts of the country have a significantly better deal than the areas in the north-west, the north-east, Yorkshire, Humberside and the midlands.

Both provinces—for that is, in effect, what they are — have approximately the same populations; 23·5 million in the north and 23·3 million in the south, namely, in the south-east, the south-west and East Anglia. But the economy of the southern province is significantly larger. Its GDP in 1981 was £13 billion greater than the GDP in the northern province. In total personal income terms, there is £7 million less in the north than in the south.

Low pay, compounded by unemployment, means that a southerner has £100 in his pocket for every £88 in a northerner's pocket. Male average weekly earnings in Greater London in April 1983 were £200 whereas in Greater Manchester they were £160. The proportion of full-time male workers in Greater Manchester earning less than £75 a week was double the figure for Greater London in the same period.

Since 1979, the northern region has lost over 784,000 jobs, or 42 per cent., of total job losses in the United Kingdom. Today, there are more manufacturing jobs in the south than in the so-called industrial north. However deeply ingrained were the traditional problems of the regions prior to 1979, they have been intensified since then.

The scale of job losses has heightened the intensity of the regional problems. Since May 1979, 1·5 million manufacturing jobs have been lost, with an unprecedented level of redundancies. For every redundancy in the southern province during the conservatives' reign, there have been two in the north. The northerners have suffered 190,000 more redundancies than have those in the southern province. The north-west has been hit most of all, with 111,000 redundancies since 1979.

When the Conservatives came to office, the north-west had 1·1 per cent. higher than the national average unemployment rate. Today it is 2·6 per cent., and it is 6 per cent. higher than in the south-east. The problems of the northern region are further compounded by a tax on public spending imposed by the Government, much of which has been centred on housing. Between 1979 and 1983, the number of housing starts fell by more than 38,000, and 83 per cent. of those cuts were concentrated on the northern province.

Cuts in housing capital expenditure, also an element of regional injustice, have been compounded by cuts in housing benefit. About 1·5 million people have lost housing benefit completely and 4·5 million have been affected in some way. Again, the northern province has been pushed into another downward spiral.

In local authority expenditure, the Government's logic belies belief. Their understanding of need is, to say the least, puzzling. They say that the northern province is less in need than the southern province. Although 170,000 more people live in the north, it has 375,000 more pupils to teach, has vastly more poverty by any criteria, has more single-parent families, according to the Black report, and it has areas such as Tameside, one of the most deprived health districts in the country, and much more unemployment. Yet in the view of the Department of the Environment the local authorities in the north need less help than those in the south. I put it to the House that that is nonsense.

With the new Right at the helm, what chance have the poorer regions? I wish the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) luck with his Centre Forward group—he will need it. Very few Tory Members from the north and the north west seem to want to join that group and to redress the imbalance in our society. My own authority of Tameside is monitoring the activities of Tory Members in the north-west and the reports make interesting but disturbing reading, especially for those of their constituents who are living on or near the poverty line. Naturally, they will be rumbled before or at the next election, but in the meantime their actions merely widen the gap between north and south and make areas such as the north-west even poorer.

In the short time allotted for an Adjournment debate it is impossible to set out all the arguments and to bring home the full impact of the Government's policies on the poorer regions. Until the Government recognise the need for a regional dimension in planning and public expenditure, and reverse their narrow monetary policies, the two parts of our nation will be pulled ever further apart.

If there was a crowning act of madness by the Government which would exacerbate the problems of the division still further, it would be to develop Stansted airport at the expense of Manchester airport. Is it really a priority of our nation to encourage the creation of 25,000 jobs in rural Essex where they are not wanted when all the logic calls for the development of Manchester airport where jobs are vital? I hope that the Minister will assure the House that the Government do not intend to take that course. I hope that he will also announce a change of course on the economic front, although I very much doubt it.

With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to conclude my remarks at this point so as to allow some time for my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). No one in the House has spoken up more for the people of Tameside and the north-west than my right hon. Friend, and I hope that the Minister will heed what he says.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The House will have listened with great interest to what my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) has said about Britain being a divided country. That fact is becoming ever more widely accepted—and fact it is, as my hon. Friend so clearly showed. Not only are people becoming more aware of it. In the north they are becoming angry about it. That is the major change that has taken place.

In the 20 years that I have been Member of Parliament for Ashton-under-Lyne I have witnessed many complaints, but I have never before witnessed such a level of consciousness and of frustration as, day after day, people see on their television screens the kind of life being lived in the more favoured part of the country.

The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who represents a constituency in the south-east, put the matter very well when he said that the south-east was overdominant. That is the situation today. Up to 40 per cent. of the firms in my constituency have closed since 1979. The firms in my area are not large firms. They are small firms, which the Government are supposed to support. They are neither high tech nor low tech—just middle tech, but doing a valuable job for their employees, their customers and their town.

Those firms find themselves in great difficulty because of the enormous advantages enjoyed by the south-east. They watch with horror as Johnson Matthey Bankers receive £75 million while the firms in my constituency get nothing. They see with growing awareness the £12 billion a year that passes out of our country via the City of London to other countries. This money, which could and should have been used to expand our industrial base in the north, is used to finance other economies.

These firms know full well that the high value of the pound is a great disadvantage to the manufacturing sector. My area earns its living from manufacturing industry. It does not have the international banking or financial operations of the City. The people earn their living by making and selling goods. They see that the way in which the economy has been run has favoured financial rather than industrial operations. They note full well that this system has no particular bearing on the needs of the country as a whole.

I ask more Ministers to come to the north. If one gets out at Piccadilly station in Manchester and walks around the streets there, one sees the difference between that area and London and the south-east generally. One does not need statistics or facts to note that great difference; one can see with it with one's eyes. I have drawn attention to the fact that because of economic stringencies, certain roads in my area are not looked after in the same way as roads elsewere.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde rightly drew attention to the discussions on Stansted airport. There will be extreme anger and dismay in the whole of the north-west if there is expansion in the more favoured parts of the country again. It is not just a matter of deciding where the airport should be. A whole area could use a successful airport based upon Manchester which used the initiative of the people of the north-west.

[Mr. Robert Sheldon]

Britain is a divided country, and a nation cannot be operated in that way. There is a growing feeling that Britain is divided. Sooner or later, unless the process is reversed, there will be grave problems with regard to unity. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will offer us some hope that this reversal will come about shortly.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): It is legitimate for the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) and the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) to raise this topic in the House, albeit on the Adjournment. I am sure that they agree that the subject is huge, wide and complex. Perhaps, we should have more time to debate the complex reasons behind the discrepancy in the economic performance of the various regions of Great Britain.

A number of figures have been bandied around. I put it to the House and to those who are concerned about discrepancies in economic performance that there is something rather chilling in the following figures: in 1964, the United Kingdom had 14 per cent. of the share of world trade in internationally tradeable goods and services; by 1978 that figure had fallen to 8 per cent.

The CBI tells us—and I am sure that we all believe the integrity of its figures—that for each 1 per cent. of loss in our share of world trade, Britain exported 250,000 jobs. From that one factor alone, we have exported 1·5 million jobs.

I ask hon. Members to consider other good, hard, data produced by the Labour party in its finance and economic affairs committee report in 1976, which, I am advised, pointed out that by 1980 there could be 2·5 million people unemployed in the United Kingdom. The committee cited all sorts of factors—the demographic factor, the loss of competitiveness, the erosion of the advantages that we gained through successive devaluations, and so forth. But, just as I agree with hon. Members that it is the manufacturing sector which has borne the brunt of Britain's decline in job opportunities through loss of world market share, the recession and other factors, I hope that they will agree that we have a very complex set of clauses on our hands and that it is disingenuous for any hon. Member to lay the blame for the totality of the 3·25 million unemployed at the door of the current Administration.

I leave those thoughts with the House only by way of inviting a further response by hon. Members when we discuss this very serious issue.

First, let me agree that there are differences between the economic situations of various parts of Great Britain. Of course there are economic differences, as there are geographical, social and cultural differences. They are by no means a new phenomenon.

Variations in, for example, unemployment rates and gross domestic product per head of population have existed for a long time. For many years, unemployment rates in the northern regions have tended to be higher than in the south and midlands. Since 1979, unemployment in the west midlands has also been above the national average, but the causes of the problems of that region go back well beyond that year. I shall come back to unemployment a little later in my speech.

Before I do that, let me look at some of the other aspects of this so-called divide. If we look at GDP, we see that the south-east is the only region with above average GDP per head. The region contains 31 per cent. of our population and contributes 37 per cent. of GDP. But, again, although there have been changes in the pattern of GDP per head in the past decade or so, there have long been significant differences between regions.

A further major point about the north-south differences is that the contrast between a depressed north and a prosperous south can be overstated. In saying this, I do not want to deny what I have just acknowledged in the generality. As a generalisation, there are significant and long-established differences, as shown by various methods of measuring economic wellbeing between the south and the north. Various remedies have been tried by successive Governments to solve the problem, and the evidence suggests that a lot of extra jobs have been created in the assisted areas—of the order of 500,000 by the early 1980s — but, despite this massive programme of assistance, the problem still persists. This is a reflection of the deep-rooted causes of regional economic disparities.

Regional economic problems used to be largely ascribed to dependence on low growth or no growth industries, and to peripherality—that is, distance from main markets. Over the last two decades there have been significant changes in the industrial structure of the assisted areas, in part as a result of the operation of regional policy, and the differences are now less marked. Nevertheless, in some cases the problems of an area can still quite clearly be attributed to the decline of a major industry in the locality. There is no preordained law which states which industries go into decline, and therefore it is folly to describe whole industries as sunset industries. In the words of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, there is no such thing as a sunset industry; there are only sunset managements. Differences in performance by companies in the same sector beg a whole series of questions, many of which are far too complex and perhaps controversial to be dealt with in an Adjournment debate.

With improvements in transport links, the nature of the peripherality problem has changed. Fast road links are more comprehensive than they were 20 and 30 years ago, though many business men in the east and west midlands would give their eye teeth for a cross-country route to match the Liverpool-Manchester-Hull motorway capacity. The peripherality problem today may rather be one of keeping in touch with the myriad decisions made by business contacts and maintaining awareness of market opportunities in the major commercial centres, most significantly in the south-east, but even in this area technology is coming to the rescue. The provision of telecommunications infrastructure is as important for today and for the future as the development of railways was in the 19th century, and the upgrading of the road network has been in the past decades.

More recently, academic research has pointed to the existence of other structural characteristics and perfomance measures which may help to explain variations in the economic performance between regions. There is evidence that, particularly in relation to the south-east, many of the assisted areas have a somewhat unfavourable rate of product innovation and an industrial milieu less conducive to successful new firm formation. Those features are thought to be related in part to he relatively low numbers of managerial and professional people resident in some assisted areas, and to a high level of dependence on manufacturing employment in branch plants owned by national or internatinal companies whose United Kingdom headquarters and research and development facilities are concentrated in the south-east. The low proportion of new firm starts in the assisted areas is particularly marked. In 1983, the four northern regions accounted for 29 per cent. of business starts as against their 36 per cent. share of working population.

Mr. Tom Normanton (Cheadle): There can be no doubt on either side of the House that there has been for a long time growing concern about what is called the north-south syndrome. Is it not true to say two things? First, to describe the north as a wilderness dying is a complete distortion of the reality of the facts. In that context, I quote the example of Stockport where, until a year ago, successful efforts were made by the Conservative-controlled council in attracting new and expanding industries. Secondly, is it not wrong to categorise the north as being beyond hope? There are many prospects for expansion of the new types of industry. These are the ones about which we are talking, and we should be bringing the national and European interest to be more aware of them.

Mr. Butcher: I recognise the long-standing and distinguished work that my hon. Friend has put in on behalf of the north-west region as a whole. I agree that it is ludicrous to categorise a whole region in a particular way. Within any region there may be significant areas of dynamism and growth. Labour Members have made a political point tonight and seem to be conniving in a campaign mounted by the Thameside borough council to target north-western Conservative Members of Parliament. Therefore, I have to respond in kind by saying that if the Stockport idea, were to be adopted, in some of the Labour-controlled local authorities there would be grounds for more optimism about attracting more business for existing firms within those localities.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford) rose——

Mr. Butcher: If the hon. Gentleman had come in earlier, we might have been able to come to an arrangement, but I have much information to respond to, and there have been two contributions from the Labour Benches.

I shall look particularly at the issue of the great divide as it has been described by a report published and put together by the Tameside district council. I believe that I am quoting accurately the leader of that council, Councillor Oldham, as he in turn was reported in the Ashton-under-Lyne Reporter on 17 April, as follows:

"'This Government, aided by people such as our own North West Tory MPs, has damaged the fabric of the North to a greater degree than the South.'"

To a certain extent that tends to give the game away, that that report is mainly a propaganda exercise. It seems to be short on economics and long on politics. The leader of the council was further quoted in the newspaper as follows:

"'Places like Tameside have ratepayers who are suffering as a result of this. If we can stop it, and expose it, it will be to their benefit, because they will pick up the extra cash and support that is due to them'"

That is very cynical nonsense. If we look at the record, we find that, for example with block grants, the rate support grant system does much to compensate the differences in wealth and social problems between the north and the south. If block grant were paid on rate bills, some £3 billion would go to the north—in this case including the east and west midlands—and £5·5 billion to the south. However, it is distributed to compensate areas with lower rateable resources and higher incidence of needs. In practice nearly £5 billion goes to the north.

Similarly, when we talk of doing down the ratepayer, we should look carefully at the Tameside record. It did not do too badly out of the 1985-86 rate support grant settlement. While it gained only a 1 per cent. increase in its spending target, its block grant entitlement for keeping to target this year—about £47 million—was slightly more than it received in 1984-85. However, the council has decided to overspend its target by 3·3 per cent. and will therefore suffer grant loss or penalty of about £5 million. As a consequence, the council had to increase the rates by 10 per cent. The rise could have been lower if Tameside had kept to the Government's guidelines. In so doing, it could have looked after the interests of the commercial and industrial ratepayers in the borough.

Even more spectacular than that, we have to note a figure that has been accepted in the past in recent debates. Since the general election in 1979, when this Administration first took power, some £2,700 million in industrial assistance has gone into the four regions that we can define as the north of Great Britain, in terms of the motion. That is an act of massive generosity by any stretch of the imagination. With block grants, there has been a similar and significant incidence of positive discrimination.

I notice that there was a reference in the report, "The Great Divide", to the discrepancy in Arts Council grants. If one takes out of the equation support for national arts companies such as the Royal Shakespeare Company, the Royal Opera House or the English National Opera, the highest per capita spend on regional arts associations is in the northern region. Northern Arts received 58·4p per head of population, whereas the Southern Arts Association received 20·9p. When we discuss such an issue, if it is seen to be relevant to the report published by the council, surely we can get our facts right. I am afraid that the basis of the Tameside borough council report is spurious, but I am grateful to it for kicking off a debate on reasons for discrepancies and differentials in performance between the regions.

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SERVICES

Ethnic Minority Groups

1. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social rvices if he will ask the Social Services Inspectorate to estigate the provision of social services to members of nic minority groups.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): The cial Services Inspectorate is continuing the work on this ject already started by the former Social Work Service. have sponsored research, disseminated the results of t research, and held seminars with staff of social vices departments on this subject. The inspectorate's gramme of work outside our formal powers will be ided shortly by a joint steering group of representatives our Department and local authority associations. I will ure that the needs of ethnic minorities will be discussed en that programme is being decided.

Mr. Deakins: As this is a very important topic, ecially for those hon. Members who live in areas with stantial ethnic minority populations with special blems of language, culture and age structure, will the nister bear in mind the long-term need for a special elopment group in his Department to co-ordinate gress and research in that area and perhaps provide rmation and advice to local authorities with these blems?

Mr. Clarke: I am not sure about the hon. Gentleman's posal, but I will consider the matter. A great deal of earch is being carried out, and the results are being seminated among local authorities. I agree, however, t there is some evidence that ethnic minorities have less ess to social services than the bulk of the population. n sure that everyone would wish to address themselves hat problem.

Mr. Terlezki: I appreciate that we should consider the nic minorities, but may I say that, as a member of an nic minority, I sincerely hope that we shall not be ted any differently from or better than anyone else?

Mr. Clarke: The main purpose of social services work o aim at the needs of deprived people, of whatever ial origin. However, we must consider the special blems of particular sections, and we are doing so.

Mr. Janner: When considering the connection ween ethnic minorities and social services, will the nister take the opportunity to pay tribute to the members of the Asian minority for the way in which they not only look after their own elderly people but serve the elderly of the rest of the community? Without them, we could not keep open the old people's homes in areas such as Leicester.

Mr. Clarke: I quite agree. One reason why the Asian community makes so little call on the work of the social services departments is its excellent record of caring for its own old people in a wide family network. However, even among the Asian community, social patterns are changing. We must ensure that we do not over-rely on that aspect of the Asian community, with the result of neglect.

Mr. Budgen: May I remind my right hon. and learned Friend that the ethnic minorities have already been damaged by the Department of the Environment's policy of reverse discrimination in the granting of various forms of financial aid? If my right hon. and learned Friend's Department now adds a policy of reverse discrimination in the social services, the ethnic minorities will be severely damaged because they will come to be deeply resented by the white majority.

Mr. Clarke: I take my hon. Friend's point. We have to make sure that we give sensible assistance to local authorities to help them to deal with the problems of ethnic minorities. We are researching into the problems of aging and of the under-fives in ethnic communities, and so on, and we are trying to develop a sensible pattern of provision that will not unintentionally damage the interests of those ethnic minorities.

Ms. Harman: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recognise that there is some evidence that members of ethnic minority groups do not have equal access to services? Would it not be helpful for local authorities which are attempting to provide services for all those who need them to have a development group set up to advise them? Will the Minister ensure that such a development group, if set up, has enough money to do the job, that it starts soon, and that the Government provide the finance to ensure that the proposals that it makes are carried out?

Mr. Clarke: Access to services must be based on need rather than on statistics, as the hon. Lady will agree. We have sent to all local authorities works such as that by Juliette Cheatham, entitled "Social Work Services for Ethnic Minorities in Britain and the United States". So long as her approach is applied sensibly, we can add to the work of social services departments. We must beware of some of the pressures from so-called anti-racist groups, which probably do more harm than good.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is it the Minister's opinion that the recruitment of social workers from the ethnic minorities is both culturally and linguistically useful? Will he encourage such recruitment?

Mr. Clarke: Yes, Sir.

Chief Executive Officers

2. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many health authorities have so far appointed chief executive officers in pursuit of the recommendations of the Griffiths committee; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): The appointment of regional general managers is almost complete. Thirteen have been appointed, and the remaining post has been advertised. Good progress is also being made in appointing district general managers. One hundred and sixty-five district health authorities out of a total of 191, and six out of eight special health authorities, have now appointed general managers.

Mr. Hirst: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the importance of chief executive officers in the proper and efficient disposition of human and physical resources in the Health Service? Is he satisfied, from the appointments made, that the salary scales are sufficient to attract applicants of the necessary calibre?

Mr. Fowler: Yes, they are. Of the total that I have just given, about 30 have been attracted from outside the Health Service.

Mrs. Renée Short: Is the Secretary of State aware that I have considerable sympathy with general managers who have been appointed, especially those who were in similar posts before the Griffiths report was introduced? They face two major problems: first, the considerable reduction in the number of hospital beds since 1979; and, secondly, the transfer of resources from the Health Service, for which they are responsible, to local authority services for the care in the community policy.

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Lady will agree that improving the management process inside the Health Service will help with those problems, as with all others. The reforms that we have made in that area are some of the most important that have been made during the past 10 years.

Mr. Hickmet: Is my right hon. Friend aware that his Department refused to sanction the appointment of the chief executive to Scunthorpe district, and that that has caused anxiety to the health authority there? Will he look at the matter again? Will he not refuse to sanction such an appointment because the terms and conditions of service, for example, may not be in line with what some of his departmental officials believe is right?

Mr. Fowler: We are recognising the terms of service of that appointment. The Department and I would be much more open to criticism if we rubber-stamped every proposal from health authorities.

Mr. Pavitt: When did the Secretary of State last discuss the Griffiths appointments with Mr. Trevor Clay and the Royal College of Nursing? Has he taken into account the fact that the only paramedical workers in the National Health Service, on whom his Department spent millions of pounds on training management, are nurses? Will he alter his present policy, under which too few nurses are being appointed as managers?

Mr. Fowler: I am entirely happy to talk to Mr. Trevor Clay about that situation. Indeed, I have in the past talked to him about it, but I am content to talk about it again.

I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman's second point. I should like to see more nurses appearing in management jobs, because the potential of nurses in the Health Service is one of its underused strengths.

Housing Problems

3. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the effect of housing problems on the demand for social services.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): There may be important connections between housing conditions and demands on the personal social services, but research has not so far established and quantified the various relationships.

Mr. Sedgemore: As bad housing is causing outbreaks of dysentery in some parts of the country, and in Hackney is placing such a strain on the health and social services departments that people are dying before their time, will the Minister plead with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to restore the cuts in the capital housing programme to prevent poisonous and deadly consequences?

Mr. Patten: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman should speak in such extravagant terms about the connection between dysentery and housing conditions and spread unnecessary alarm. I understand that there is anxiety in Hackney about housing conditions, and that the director of social services has produced an interesting report suggesting some connection between bad housing and the demands on social services. I ask the hon. Gentleman to produce some real results and statistics rather than unfounded general allegations.

Mr. Kennedy: When taking note of the relationship between demands on social services and housing conditions, will the Minister use all the means at his and his right hon. Friend's disposal to ensure that the Department of the Environment ploughs money into the housing programme at a time when the care in the community programme will offload more mentally ill people, in a welcome sense, back into the community? Does he agree that they will need housing and special services to achieve the objective of the programme?

Mr. Patten: Bad and inadequate housing conditions are taken into account when the personal social services element of the grant-related expenditure assessment is calculated.

Secondhand Cookers (Supplementary Benefit)

4. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the policy of his Department on the provision of secondhand cookers to people on supplementary benefit.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): Single payments of supplementary benefit for cookers are intended to meet the cost of reconditioned items, if these are available, and of new items if they are not.

Mr. Loyden: Is the Minister aware that many of the cookers that people in receipt of social security are compelled to buy because of the price limit are dangerous and inefficient? Is he further aware that recently one of my constituents bought a cooker which subsequently exploded while her four children were in the house? Does he agree that it is about time that this matter was considered? Simply because people are in receipt of social security, they should not be put at risk in that way.

Mr. Whitney: I am aware of the case to which the hon. Gentleman referred, and I have called for a further report from the Garston local office about that incident. On the hon. Gentleman's general question, I should say that the guide set by local officers for such cookers allows for the purchase of safely reconditioned cookers and for proper safety standards in their installation.

Dr. Glyn: Does my hon. Friend agree that the important point is not only that the cooker is properly tested, but that its installation is tested?

Mr. Whitney: Of course, I agree with that. The allowances made under the single payments arrangements allow for such installation.

Mr. Meacher: Will the Minister confirm that single payments for items, such as cookers, for those on supplementary benefit—2 million of which were made last year at an average value of £77—will be axed under the Government's supplementary benefit review? The Government are already taking back £700 million a year from the unemployed through the taxation of unemployment benefit, have already ended the earnings-related supplement to unemployment benefit, which was worth £16 a week, and are now apparently demanding that the unemployed and those in receipt of supplementary benefit should pay one fifth of their rents and rates. How much further will this vendetta against the unemployed and those on supplementary benefit be taken?

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Gentleman must contain his impatience about the contents of the social security reviews until those reviews are published. I remind him that spending on the social security programme has increased in real terms by 28 per cent. since the Government came to office.

Nottinghamshire

5. Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about personal social services in Nottinghamshire.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In Nottinghamshire, as with every other local authority having a social services department, the provision of personal social services is a matter for the local authority to decide, taking into account its statutory duties, local circumstances and its priorities.

Mr. Ashton: Exactly. Will the Minister take note of the local election results 10 days ago, when my constituents showed that they were delighted with what the Labour-controlled county council was doing for them? They voted on a basis that would have increased my majority from 3,000 to almost 11,000, and the Labour party would have won back three seats in the city of Nottingham and in Sherwood. Does the Minister accept that if he continues with his plans to remove earnings-related pensions, maternity grants and death grants, that trend will sweep the country and his party will be out of office?

Mr. Clarke: My recollection is that the net loss to the Labour party in Nottinghamshire in the local elections was about six seats. Matters may have been all right at the hon. Gentleman's end of the county, but the Labour party is now almost extinct at my end of the county, and it lost seats in Nottingham and in Gedling. There is no doubt that the social services in Nottinghamshire have greatly advanced during the past five or six years, despite the allegations of so-called Tory cuts. I hope that the electorate in Nottinghamshire will ensure that they get proper value for money from the increased expenditure that the county council is incurring.

Mr. Lester: Will my right hon. and learned Friend take note of the fact that in constituencies covered by the same county council we actually won seats back from Labour, so presumably the same criteria apply? Will my hon. Friend also take note of the extensive and worthwhile review by the Nottinghamshire social services committee on the position of the mentally ill? There is a great deal of concern that the community care policy, which both he and I support, should be carried out in the most intelligent and sensible way, and that there should be adequate provision by the social services in Nottinghamshire for those who would be better off in community care than in institutions.

Mr. Clarke: I accept what my hon. Friend says. There is considerable commitment to the idea of moving over to a community-based service in Nottinghamshire. It is vital to have the right level of community services in place as the patients are transferred from hospitals, and that will require a high level of co-operation between the health authority and the county council. We have to ensure that that co-operation is forthcoming, regardless of political control, over the next two or three years.

Mr. Alexander: I point out to my right hon. and learned Friend and to the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) that more than three quarters of the spending on social services in Nottinghamshire goes on wages for its employees. I remind him that for one administrator——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should be asking questions of the Minister.

Mr. Alexander: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that in Nottinghamshire the social services are spending the money for one administrator per 1,995 people, whereas in the rest of the country the figure is one administrator for nearly 1,000 people more?

Mr. Clarke: The background in Nottinghamshire is not one of cuts. In the past five years, spending on social services has gone up by one quarter over the rise in prices. Nottinghamshire, rather more than most shire counties, has to ensure at least that amount of added service and value to the community. Administrative costs are high there compared with most other Conservative-controlled county councils.

Children in Care

6. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to reduce the number of children in care.

Mr. John Patten: I am glad that the number of children in local authority care has been decreasing. We support the growing emphasis on preventive measures in child care. It is for local authorities to provide services for children in need, so as to keep them with their families or, in the interests of the children, to provide alternative arrangements for their care.

Mr. Fraser: Will the Minister take steps to amend section 1 of the Child Care Act 1980 to enable local authorities to spend money on preventing children from going into care as well as spending resources to get them out of care? Secondly, as the number of children in care is often concentrated in the areas of greatest deprivation, will he in future disregard, for rate support grant penalty purposes, the money that local authorities, such as Lambeth and Southwark, spend in keeping children out of care instead of penalising those authorities for spending money in that way?

Mr. Patten: Matters relating to rate support grant penalties are for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, and not for me or my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. However, the hon. Gentleman raises a serious point, and I know that he means it seriously. The provisions under section 1 of the Child Care Act 1980 are very important. Some councils use them in such a way as to aid preventative measures, and social workers do a very good job by and large in preventing children going into care. We are adding our contribution by doing more to get children out of care. Yesterday, we announced the bringing into force of the provisions of custodianship from 1 December this year, and we are seeking to introduce a new and better system of review of the cases of children in care so that they will be brought out of care as soon as possible and put into a proper family environment where possible.

Mr. Pawsey: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the best place to bring up children is in the family? Will he remind the House of the actions that his Department has taken over the past five years and what it proposes to do in future to ensure that more children remain in the family?

Mr. Patten: Above all else, we want as soon as possible to get out of care as many children as we can from among the 85,000 children in care at the moment—and that is a fall from 100,000 five years ago. That is why we introduced the custodianship provisions of the Children Act 1975. That is why we are seeking, through regular and better reviews of children in care, to get them out of care and into foster homes, homes that provide custodianship or adopted homes, as soon as possible.

Basildon Hospital

7. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were waiting for urgent operations at Basildon hospital in each of the last five years.

Mr. John Patten: On 31 December 1984 the provisional inpatient waiting list total for all surgical specialties in Basildon hospital was 1,720. The corresponding figures for the years 1980 to 1983 were 2,194, 3,190, 2,100 and 1,891, respectively, the figure for 1982 reflecting the effects of the unfortunate National Health Service industrial action in that year. It is not known centrally how many of these were urgent cases.

Mr. Amess: Will my hon. Friend join me in condemning the alarmist and highly irresponsible remarks of one or two of the Opposition Front Bench spokesmen when they visited Essex, and Basildon in particular, and take this opportunity to put the record straight by praising our local health service?

Mr. Patten: I think that my hon. Friend must be referring to the hon. Members for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and for Peckham (Ms. Harman) who have got hold of a set of totally incorrect and fallacious figures and have used them to knock the National Health Service, in particular the National Health Service in Basildon, which has a splendid record of increased numbers of operations and, best of all, has brought about since 1979 a radical reduction in the number of people on waiting lists for over a month.

Mr. Dobson: As the Minister says that his Department does not hold figures centrally relating to those on urgent waiting lists in Basildon, perhaps he will explain to me why I am in possession of a document headed "Form SBH 203, Dept of Health and Social Security", which records that on 30 September 1984 no fewer than 436 inhabitants of Basildon and Thurrock were awaiting urgent operations and that no fewer than 279 of them had been waiting for more than a month for urgent treatment.

Mr. Patten: I do not know where the hon. Gentleman gets his figures from and in which brown envelopes the figures were delivered to him. What I do know is that the waiting lists in the Basildon area are decreasing, that waiting times are coming down fast and that the standard of health care has improved radically in the last five years.

Privatisation

8. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimates he has made about the effect on the budgets of regional health authorities of the introduction of privatisation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: None, Sir. All savings derived from competitive tendering will be retained by health authorities and used to improve their services to patients.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Are not all of those savings being made on the backs of National Health Service workers by cutting their wages? Is it not immoral for the Minister to instruct the West Cumbria district health authority to vary its standing orders in such a way as to secure wage cuts? Is he aware that many members of that district health authority believe that such action is morally indefensible and that it simply cannot be done by means of a resolution?

Mr. Clarke: The savings are being made by better management of the services and by reducing costs to an acceptable level. Failure to do that can only be at the expense of patients and patient services. I understand that West Cumbria has made a commendable proposal, whereby its in-house service will save about £100,000 each year. That is a good bid, which should be compared with what reputable contractors can make in order to examine whether greater savings can be made. Other health authorities are saving almost £500,000, or more, on their services, and that is £500,000 that can be spent extremely well by the health authorities concerned.

Mrs. Jill Knight: Is it not the case that private contractors usually effect savings of about 20 per cent. by means of greater productivity and increased efficiency, which surely must mean that more money is available to be spent on patients? Will my right hon. and learned Friend therefore resist those who seek to let expensive sleeping dogs lie and instead continue to pursue his present policies?

Mr. Clarke: I shall certainly take my hon. Friend's sensible advice. It is pointless deliberately to put up the cost of cleaning, cooking and laundry at the expense of patient services. Despite all the controversy about a number of contracts, there are hospitals that have found a marked improvement in the standard of those services when they have gone out to good and reputable contractors.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Is the Minister aware that the North-West regional health authority recently wrote to the Trafford district health authority telling it that if it did not withdraw the fair wages clause in its privatisation contract it would not pass on to it some £70,000 which should have been made available for the elderly and severely mentally infirm and, more importantly, to deal with the drug abuse problem, a programme which the Government have been emphasising? This is clearly a case of blackmail. Will the Minister condemn that and tell the regional health authority to give that money to Trafford, or does he condone such an action?

Mr. Clarke: Off the cuff, I cannot remember the precise details of Trafford's proposed tender documents, but where the so-called fair wages clauses are being insisted upon they tend to involve a combination of pay terms and conditions, sickness benefit, holiday and pension entitlement, trade union rights and so on. That is an absurd attempt by health authorities to intervene in negotiations between private contractors in their areas and their employees. If a district health authority insists on proceeding on a wastrel basis, a regional health authority is entitled to consider whether that health authority should have the difference made up, usually at the expense of other districts in the same region, which carry out the policy sensibly.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Is the Minister aware that there is a disagreement about privatisation in Salford? Will he give a firm undertaking to the House that he will not be involved in any disproportionate cuts in the allocation to Salford as a result of that dispute?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman may not be aware that the Salford district health authority has, I am glad to say, resolved to follow the Government's tendering policy. I am sure that the patients of Salford and the service there will benefit as a result.

Mr. Dickens: Are there not many hidden benefits from privatisation within the NHS? Is it not amazing how hospitals all over Britain have rushed to put their house in order in their laundries, kitchens, transport services and other areas because the very mention of privatisation has crystallised their thinking about efficiency within the Health Service in their desire to prove that they are as competitive as private enterprise, which, of course, they are not?

Mr. Clarke: The benefits are not that hidden. So far, savings of about £13 million have resulted from the tendering exercise, and that is being spent on patient services. But the process has only just begun and we expect substantial benefits to come to the NHS when all authorities have made proper progress in implementing the policy.

Mr. Meadowcroft: What co-ordination is there in the Department of Health and Social Security to ascertain the transfer costs of low-paid workers from one part of the DHSS to another? Is it not the case that there is no saving whatever simply because the cost of low-paid workers is transferred under social security either through family income supplement or unemployment benefit?

Mr. Clarke: A standard pattern is for most employees who already work for the in-house service to be taken on as employees by the contractor who wins the contract if it goes outside. If the hon. Gentleman is trying to say that somehow family income supplement claims wipe out the benefit to the Health Service, his mathematics are way out.

Mr. Meacher: Is the Minister aware that, whatever profits privatisation is producing, it is also worsening standards of care in the NHS? Is he aware that a hip operation on a woman in her sixties had to be cancelled last month at Addenbrooke's, Cambridge, when blood and bone was found on the floor because the private contractors, Office Cleaning Services, failed to clean the theatre after the previous day's operation, and that such examples are frequent? How does he justify the fact that the level of cross-infection in hospitals has now reached the record level of 9 per cent., which it has never been anywhere near before, and is undoubtedly due partly to the squalid standards of much privatised cleaning?

Mr. Clarke: A great deal of scandalous propaganda is going on in support of vested interests, largely in the trade union labour movement, which wishes to keep cleaning costs up. The example that the hon. Gentleman quotes is entirely untrue in the way that he has given it. The blood and bone dust found at Addenbrooke's was found in a part of the hospital not included in the specifications of the outside cleaners. A great deal has been made of it, when in fact the fault cannot be laid at the door of the outside contractors. There is no intrinsic reason why the service should be better whether the employees are employed in-house or by a contractor. It does not make any difference to the standard of service whether they are in the union or not. What matters is good management to produce a cost-effective service of the right standards. Many health authorities find it easier to get the standards of outside contractors improved than to cope with the low standards of some in-house cleaners, when bad management over the years has allowed standards to decline.

Nursery School Places

9. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to increase the number of places available in public sector day nurseries for children aged under five years.

Mr. John Patten: This is a matter for local authorities.

Mr. Barron: Is it not right to say that the Minister's own Department feels it necessary to put £2 million a year until 1986 into voluntary bodies, while at the same time the Secretary of State for the Environment is attacking the public sector and it is very likely that there will be no increase in day nursery places, either full or part-time, if he does not stop this attack on the public sector by attacking the rate support grant?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman's question presupposes that most people think that day nurseries are the best form of help and care for under-fives. That is not the case with a great many authorities. Indeed, the Select Committee on Social Services said

"it is expensive and unwieldy to provide unlimited facilities of day care."

What we need is a mixed economy of care for the under-fives, including an increased number of places with child minders and an increased number of places in play groups. All of this must be supported and underpinned by the excellent under-fives initiative to which the hon. Gentleman has already referred.

Mr. Jessel: Are not day nurseries of great value in giving children a sense of security? Is it not an unkind and needless act for the Richmond upon Thames borough council to threaten to throw out 38 Vietnamese boat orphans at present in the care of the Save the Children fund at Hampton Court house? Will my hon. Friend repeat the offer that he has already made, in view of the fact that the sale of the house has been advertised in the latest number of Country Life, to provide not only for the maintenance of the children but for the payment of a fair rent to the borough council?

Mr. Patten: I am deeply concerned about the welfare of the children. There have been suggestions that Richmond upon Thames borough council, which I understand is under Liberal party control, is more interested in making money than in the welfare of the children. I do not know whether these allegations are true, but Liberal-controlled Richmond upon Thames borough council has a fine opportunity now to demonstrate that it does have those children's interests at heart.

Supplementary Benefit (Review)

10. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he now expects to announce the results of his review of supplementary benefit; and if he will make a statement.

16. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the review of the social security system has now been completed; and if he will make a statement.

17. Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he now expects to announce the results of his review of housing benefit; and if he will make a statement.

18. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now publish the evidence submitted to his review committees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: The Government's proposals on social security will be published in a Green Paper after Whitsun. Over 4,500 written pieces of evidence were received. Those who submitted evidence are free to publish it and many have done so.

Dr. McDonald: Does the Secretary of State agree that the phasing out of the state earnings-related pension scheme will mean that more pensioners in the future will have to rely on supplementary benefit and that both workers and employers will have to pay higher national insurance contributions for workers to get far less by way of pensions in the future? Does he further agree that the Prime Minister has moved on from being the milk snatcher to being the pension snatcher?

Mr. Fowler: No, I think that that is a pretty silly statement, even by the hon. Lady's standards. The House will have to wait for the proposals. I am entirely content to be judged on the proposals in the Green Paper, but I am not prepared to be judged on half-baked scare stories put forward by the Opposition. Whatever changes are made, the proposals do not affect the basic pensions, and our position on that is clear. The basic pension has increased by 84 per cent. compared to a 77 per cent. rise in prices, and we remain absolutely committed to the pensioners of the country.

Mr. Hughes: Is not the much-heralded campaign to scrap the earnings-related pension scheme yet another attempt to cut public expenditure so as to give further tax handouts to the rich, irrespective of the fact that 11 million contributors could lose their pension rights and that many thousands more could be living in poverty at the turn of the century?

Mr. Fowler: I certainly do not accept the last part of the hon. Gentleman's comments, and nor will he when he sees the proposals. It would be utterly irresponsible of any Government not to look forward and make some judgment about the costs that the country will have to meet.

Mr. Roberts: Instead of devising ways to take money from those in our community least able to support themselves and instead of devising ways to scrap housing benefits for millions of people, why does the Minister not consider in his review ways to help those in most need? For example, why does he not extend to the elderly living in public sector housing the right to live rent-free in the way that owner-occupiers, having received, quite rightly, income tax relief on their mortgages, live mortgage-free after 25 or 30 years of subsidy?

Mr. Fowler: One of the aims of the social security review—and I think that there is no difference between the two sides on this—is to have an overall look at social security provision. Another aim is to seek to simplify the system, and again I think that there is a consensus on that. A third aim is to make the best use of available resources and to channel them to those most in need. That is the right way to proceed, which is why the Government set up the review.

Dr. Mawhinney: Does my right hon. Friend accept that many of us are eagerly looking forward to his review, in the confident expectation that it will fully protect the standard of living of those of our fellow citizens who are genuinely in need?

Mr. Fowler: Yes, and that will be one of the standards which my hon. Friend and the country will want to apply to the proposals when they are set out. There appears to be total agreement that the social security system must be reviewed. The Government are doing that, while other Governments have funked it.

Mr. Eggar: Have not our society and the needs of our citizens changed during the past 40 years? Would we not be failing in our duty if we did not take this opportunity to review the system?

Mr. Fowler: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is clear that need, and the definition of need, have also changed. One of the areas that gives me most cause for concern is that of families with children, where there is undoubted need. We must have a modern social security system, which is why the Government are putting forward a Green Paper. The public will then know what the issues are.

Mrs. Beckett: Since extending private pension cover to those covered by the state earnings-related pension scheme seems likely to cost about £3 million to £6 million in tax reliefs alone, can the Secretary of State tell us how soon we can expect the Chancellor to renege on his commitment not to change tax reliefs for occupational pensions, as thoroughly as the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister have reneged on their commitments to pensioners?

Mr. Fowler: There are no plans to change the tax relief on occupational pensions. The biggest deceit is to make the promises that the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) does, when he knows perfectly well that they cannot be fulfilled. The biggest swindle of pensioners was carried out in 1976 by the last Labour Government when they changed the basis of uprating and saved £1,200 million. That is what the Opposition did when they were in government.

Mr. Forman: When announcing his reforms in his statement after the recess, will my right hon. Friend be careful to leave open the possibility of moving towards an integrated tax benefit system as one of the longer term consequences of his proposals?

Mr. Fowler: It is an important aspect of the study, and the debate which will follow it, to consider the relationship between the social security system and the tax system. I am conscious of that, as is my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

Private Residential Care

11. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will announce the membership of the team to review private residential care for the elderly.

13. Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the percentage increase from 1979 to the latest available date of the number of private, not voluntary, residential care homes for the elderly.

Mr. John Patten: I assume the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) is referring to the proposal that has been put forward by the Social Care Association for a general review of residential care, which would not be confined to the private sector nor to the care of the elderly alone. We are currently consulting the local authority associations about this proposal, and I shall be meeting them later this week. As far as the number of private homes for elderly and disabled people is concerned, these have increased by 99·3 per cent. between 31 March 1979 and 31 March 1984.

Mr. Boyes: During the discussions, will the Minister take into consideration the fact that in the newly introduced regulations on board and lodging for people living in the voluntary sector the allowance is far too low? I understand that the Leonard Cheshire Homes, for example, have to raise over £1 million to carry on their services. Is not this attack on the elderly and disabled another example of the Government's hit and run philosophy?

Mr. Patten: It is no attack whatever on the elderly and disabled. My hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security has the issue under active consideration.

Ms. Harman: Is not the boom in private profit-making old people's homes being largely subsidised by the Department of Health and Social Security? Would not public money be better spent on allowing local councils to provide meals on wheels and home helps to enable people to stay in their own homes rather than on subsidising institutionalisation in private homes?

Mr. Patten: The private sector has an important part to play. We are also concerned about the public sector. The hon. Lady will be aware from the position in her own constituency, at Nye Bevan lodge old people's home, that there seems to be a substantial cover-up by Southwark borough council, which is not making information available to Opposition members of its social services committee. I believe that the hon. Lady is very keen on the disclosure of information. I hope that she will join me in pressing Southwark council to make all the information available.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Dr. McDonald asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 May.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others, including one with the President of the Cameroon. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Dr. McDonald: Does the Prime Minister repudiate the views of ex-Cabinet Ministers in her own party that the Government should intervene directly in industry to create jobs and that the Chancellor's cherished tax cuts are becoming a victim of his own economic strategy?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Lady is aware, the Chancellor's tax cuts, indicated in the Budget recently, will take effect this month. I do not think that the hon. Lady will oppose them. With regard to what has been said by former members of my Cabinet, I heartily agree with the comments on the Labour party:

"Labour is riddled with anti-democratic elements and saddled with policy commitments that would undo most of the good of the past six years."

I am grateful for the support of my right hon. Friend who made that comment.

Mr. Moynihan: In view of the succession of Conservative swings in the last three council by-elections in Lewisham, East, culminating in the outstanding victory last Thursday in a once safe Labour ward, does my right hon. Friend agree that their Lordships would be wise to listen to the views of those in Lewisham rather than pay attention to the redundant and ill-informed propaganda above County Hall, behind the far Left of this Chamber?

The Prime Minister: I heartily congratulate my hon. Friend on the excellent election result in Lewisham. It is an absolute confirmation of the wisdom of rate capping.

Mr. Kinnock: As we grieve with those who were most directly affected by the tragedy at Valley Parade on Saturday, may I ask the Prime Minister two questions of immediate relevance, on both of which immediate reassurance is required? First, will the Government ensure that none of the bereaved or those who suffered grievous injury on Saturday will have to endure additional suffering if it becomes evident that Bradford City Association Football Club does not have sufficient insurance cover to meet all legitimate claims? Secondly, are the Government prepared to use part of the large revenues which they derive direct from football for the purpose of immediately undertaking an extensive programme of improvements to safety at public sports grounds?

The Prime Minister: The answer to the first part of the right hon. Gentleman's supplementary question is that it would be best if he allowed us time to look into all the financial matters first to see exactly how much is covered by insurance. Various disaster funds have been started. The answer to the second part is that I shall be seeing the chairman of the Football Trust tomorrow. The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that the situation is complicated, in that £7 million a year goes to the Football Trust from 20 per cent. of the turnover from "Spot the Ball" competitions. Half of that goes to the Football Ground Improvement Trust for ground improvements at Football League clubs. Last year, 1984, the Football Ground Improvement Trust accumulated £3·3 million in its bank balance because there had been insufficient extra demand from league clubs for improvements. That money was distributed, on the initiative of the Football League, as retrospective grant to those clubs that had already received grants from the trust. I have been inquiring into the finances. It would be best if we made a very thorough inquiry before jumping to any conclusions.

Mr. Kinnock: I trust that the inquiries will not merely be thorough — as I would expect them to be, and I certainly support the right hon. Lady's activity in that respect—but will also be urgent, because, both in terms of those who are now in deep anxiety and in terms of the implications for crowd safety, it is clearly necessary that effective action is taken as quickly as possible.

The Prime Minister: As I told the right hon. Gentleman, I shall be seeing Lord Aberdare tomorrow. I had intended to see him long before the tragedy last Saturday; that makes it all the more urgent.

Mr. Lawrence: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the remarks attributed in the Falklands to Labour's Front Bench spokesman on foreign affairs will have left the Falkland Islanders in no doubt that Labour has not the faintest interest in protecting their rights?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Mr. Speaker — [Interruption.] Those remarks must have been deeply wounding and we on these Benches reject them absolutely.

Q2. Mrs. Peacock asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Peacock: Will my right hon. Friend today extend congratulations to those involved in the building of the Falkland Islands airport? Nowhere else in the world has a project of this nature been achieved under such difficult conditions in such a short time. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is evidence of British industry and the British work force at their very best?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I gladly join my hon. Friend in congratulating all of those concerned in the building of the airstrip—[Interruption.]—and I should have thought that Labour Members would have been more generous-minded and would have wished to congratulate the work force, which achieved the building of that airstrip in 16 months from the date of its being started — a truly brilliant achievement.

Q3. Mr. Dixon asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dixon: During the right hon. Lady's busy day, will she reflect on the fact that since she first came to power in 1979 the last shiprepair yard in my constituency has closed, the last shipbuilding yard in my constituency has been put in mothballs, the last pit in my constituency has been closed, the last steelworks in my constituency is to be phased out at the end of this year and that MacGregor has just announced that the Whitburn workshops in my constituency will be closed? — [Interruption.] If some Conservative Members would stop shedding crocodile tears about unemployment, we might get somewhere.

Is the Prime Minister aware that in my constituency one in three men are unemployed and that of those 40 per cent. have been unemployed for more than 12 months? [Interruption.] This is no laughing matter and if some Conservative Members tasted unemployment, they would not be so niggly and sniggly about it. Is the right hon. Lady further aware——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is taking a long time over his supplementary question.

Mr. Dixon: Some of the hooligans on the Government Benches should be called to order, Mr. Speaker, rather than me, because we are talking about men and women who are anxious to earn a living. Will the Prime Minister speak to the Secretary of State for the Environment—bearing in mind the devastation that Conservative policies have caused to my area—and tell him to redesignate the area from a programme authority to a partnership authority?

The Prime Minister: I shall of course speak to my right hon. Friend. May I point out to the hon. Gentleman that he knows some of the answers to some of the problems? In shipbuilding, there is a surplus of world capacity. We cannot go on keeping a surplus capacity here. We cannot compete, even with the generous subsidies that have been given to shipbuilding. In steel, he will be aware that his Government also had to close surplus steel plants. As for coal, he will be aware that if we want a successful coal industry we must concentrate on the pits of the future. No Government have put greater investment into the coal industry than this one.

Mr. Conway: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to study the latest CBI report about a 50 per cent. reduction in the number of strikes? Will she consider ways of promoting such an achievement by this Administration, in order to encourage not so much the Centre Forward but those of us who play left back?

The Prime Minister: I saw the report. I believe that it is partly due to the legislation passed by this Government to give each and every person in trade unions the right to a secret ballot, first, to elect their own officers and, secondly, to reach a decision about whether there should be a strike if the union is to keep its protection and immunities.

Mr. Steel: Does the Prime Minister recall telling the House a fortnight ago in answer to a question from me that the matter of planning permission for the Palumbo tower was not for her but for the Secretary of State for the Environment? If that is the case, will she confirm press reports that she was round at the Department of the Environment the next morning looking at the planning application? If so, what was she doing there, and what is her attitude to the application?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That visit had been arranged long before the right hon. Gentleman asked his question. Of course I went round and looked at the model. The decision was, and is, for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, and I hope that he will be making it shortly. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman realises that it is not unknown for a Prime Minister to visit a Department to see exactly what the problem is.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Has my right hon. Friend noted the apparent Damascene conversion of the Labour party with its decision to allow council house tenants to buy their own homes? Does she agree that, while there may be greater joy in Heaven over the one sinner that repenteth, council house tenants should remember that it was the Tory party which gave them that right?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Mr. Speaker. But I note that the Labour party's conversion is far from complete. I understand that it has left it to Left-wing authorities to opt out. I can, therefore, hardly say that the Labour party has been converted. I should be more likely to say that it was shown in its true colours when it fought the Bill line by line during its passage through the House. Those who own their council houses owe that to the Government's courage and determination.

Q4. Mr. McKay asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 May 1985.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. McKay: Will the Prime Minister note that tomorrow is the launch of the coalfields community campaign? [HON. MEMBERS: "What is that?"] I regret that that remark shows the opposition's ignorance. [Interruption.] It shows the ignorance of Conservative Members about organisations, led by many eminent people in the House and outside, representing over 11 million people who are worried by the Government's policies on colliery closures, which have raised unemployment figures to 18 and 20 per cent. in those areas. Will she send a message of congratulations to that campaign and insist that collieries do not close, except for economic reasons, unless there are replacement jobs?

The Prime Minister: No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Gentleman is fully aware that he is asking for management to opt out of its responsibilities to manage and for unlimited amounts of subsidy from the taxpayer. He is well aware that this Government have poured more investment into the coal mines of the future than any other. He is also aware that there were more colliery closures under Labour than under the Conservatives.

Mr. Colvin: With regard to the earlier question from the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon), will my right hon. Friend find time today to refresh her memory on what was known as the King's Lynn scheme whereby 100 jobs and 100 houses were offered to unemployed workers in Jarrow? Does she recall that only 36 people applied for those jobs and that, at the end of one year, only 15 remained in King's Lynn? Will my right hon. Friend consider getting in touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and asking him to send a load of bikes to Jarrow?

The Prime Minister: I think that we would all wish that we could bring more jobs to people. As my hon. Friend knows, that can be done only if more people are prepared to start up businesses and more goods are sold in this country and overseas. That means good design and good salesmanship. There is no other answer.

Q5. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cook: Will the Prime Minister take time this afternoon to ponder on the fact that, during Prime Minister's Question Time last Thursday — [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading".] I am not reading. I am prepared to let hon. Members see the document. Will the right hon. Lady ponder on the fact that, in response to a question from her colleague the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt), she allowed herself to be misled, that in doing so she misled the House and that, in her anxiety to malign the honourable and dedicated teaching profession, she misrepresented the facts relating to the Endeavour school in Middlesbrough? Will the right hon. Lady agree this afternoon to accept a copy of a letter setting out the truth, which was written by a constituent of mine who is a member of the staff at that school? Having had that letter checked, will she have the decency and courage to return to the Chamber and admit that, yet again, she has got it wrong and apologise not only to the teaching profession but to the staff of a very dedicated establishment?

The Prime Minister: Of course I will receive that letter. I believe that the hon. Gentleman is referring to a question about a school where supervision at a meal times had been withdrawn. I understood that that school was in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) and that he was well aware of the matter. If I am wrong, I apologise. But I wish to see the facts.

Mr. Bell: On a point of order Mr. Speaker. We often consider the question of the Prime Minister's accountability to the House of Commons. Question Time is a treasured opportunity for Back Benchers to render that accountability real. Is it not important, Mr. Speaker, to remind the House that questions to the Prime Minister should be related to her executive responsibility and not to statements made by members of the Labour party and to matters that have nothing to do with her executive responsibility?

Mr. Speaker: I think that I was in error in not pulling up the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence). Of course questions to the Prime Minister must be about her responsibility.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Did you receive any nods or winks during Prime Minister's Question Time from members of the Centre Forward team? It has come to my notice that one of the members of the Centre Forward team—the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour)—looks as though he was tripped up by a dirty centre half. His arm is in plaster.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that we all commiserate with the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour). I do not always read the newspapers, so I do not know what the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is talking about.

Mr. Tom Clarke: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, arising from questions to the Prime Minister. You will recall that the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) asked a question that referred to my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes). I ask you, in the interests of fair play, to ensure that my hon. Friend is given the opportunity to give his account of recent events, in view of the fact that not all statements in recent months and years on the Falklands have been shown to be entirely accurate.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) will have to seek an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Bill Walker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I draw your attention to the fact that the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) had the opportunity on the radio this morning to explain to the nation what he said in the Falklands? I think that when one reads the transcript one will——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is an extension of Question Time. We have already dealt with that matter.

Rating Revaluation (Scotland)

3.35 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Younger): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the Government's proposals for legislation to give some relief to certain ratepayers in Scotland who have in 1985-86 seen the rateable values of their property increase very steeply.

In the August 1983 White Paper on rating reform in Scotland—Cmnd. 9018—the Government reaffirmed our earlier decision to have a full Scottish revaluation in 1985. That was approved by all parties in Scotland and by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, which considered it important that the valuation rolls should reflect fairer and more up-to-date values.

As information became available from assessors about the likely general effect of revaluation, I took various steps to offset the more extreme effects. In particular, I have twice increased the domestic element of the rate support grant—by a total of some £88 million—so that it now amounts to 8p in every £1 rateable value for domestic ratepayers: and, because of the benefits secured by industry overall, I reduced the percentage of industrial derating from 50 per cent. to 40 per cent.

Nevertheless it is all too clear that there are still many domestic ratepayers whose valuation increases have been particularly steep and who still face very substantial increases in their actual rate bills. Furthermore, in the commercial sector, though the average effect of revaluation has been neutral, there are significant numbers of businesses facing very severe increases. No small business man, however enterprising, could ever have been expected to plan for a rates demand like some of the hugely increased bills that have now arrived.

The Government have therefore decided to introduce a scheme to help ratepayers faced with very high increases in their valuations. They will be given a new statutory right to claim 100 per cent. relief in respect of that part of their 1985-86 rates bill related to all of their new valuation which is in excess of three times their 1984-85 valuation. That will be subject to a limit to the total relief payment in the case of any particular subject, to ensure that maximum help is targeted towards the smaller businesses. The right will extend to domestic and commercial ratepayers alike; it will not extend to property occupied by local authorities and the Crown; public undertakings valued by statutory formula; and manufacturing industry and freight-transport subjects. The scheme will be administered by rating authorities, to which I shall reimburse the full cost of the payments. The new relief will have no effect on statutory rights of appeal or on other rights and duties, though where an appeal is successful, the amount of relief will fall to be adjusted accordingly.

The new relief is intended to ease the immediate burden arising from the high valuation increases that took effect at 1 April and will apply in the year 1985-86. I shall consider in due course whether there is a case for any special relief in 1986-87. I estimate that tne relief will probably cost at least £50 million. That will be new money from the taxpayer.

A Bill providing for the new relief will be published as soon as possible. I hope that hon. Members opposite will, as the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) has already said, give support to us in our endeavours to bring the scheme into force at the earliest possible moment. There is no need for any ratepayer who thinks that he will benefit from the scheme to act until the Bill has been brought into operation.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Of course we welcome any decision by the Government that will help ratepayers in Scotland. It is—if I may say so—remarkable how fear concentrates the mind. A Secretary of State, who has repeatedly said, "Not a penny more," is now scrambling for safety. We do not complain about any retreat by the Government. We would welcome retreat in a number of other fields. However, it is a sad spectacle to see Scottish Office Ministers in incoherent and confused disarray, being driven from pillar to post and desperately claiming as triumphs policies that they never planned and which have been imposed upon them by public opinion and the wrath of their own supporters. The pass has been dragged from the right hon. Gentleman, and the concession made only because necessity drives.

The Secretary of State's statement was ingenious. No hint was given to the faithful in Perth that the scheme would extend beyond the commercial sector. The scheme looks much less generous to the commercial sector once the whole domestic sector has been included.

What percentage of the £50 million will go to commercial, and what to domestic ratepayers? We will want the limit figure to be designed to make sure that the lion's share does not go to supermarkets and national chains but helps those who are really at risk—those under pressure. Will the Bill settle such matters? Will the Bill contain details, or is it to be an enabling Bill and will we have to wait for an order?

The Opposition will wish carefully to analyse the effect on the domestic sector. I suspect that there will be little cheer for those at the bottom end of the housing market and the vast majority of council tenants. We will wish to take a long, hard look to make sure that a disproportionate share does not go to Eastwood, Pollokshields, Newton Mearns and Ayr. We recognise the difficulties and the tottering prestige of many of the Secretary of State's hon. Friends in their own areas, but there is a limit to the distortion of the pay-out that will be acceptable to us.

Will there be a cut-off on the amount of relief to an individual householder, analogous to the one that the Secretary of State has announced for commercial ratepayers? How does he estimate the impact of this announcement on the average increase in the domestic rates bill in Scotland? I am sure that he has made the calculation.

I welcome the fact that this is to be new money and that the right hon. Gentleman has assured us that the Scottish Office budget will not be raided in any way to meet the bills, but it is essential that guarantees be given that the help will be extended throughout the remainder of the quinquennium. It would be fraudulent to offer help in 1985-86 but leave those who receive it now to bear the full impact in subsequent years. That would confirm the feeling that the whole exercise was a squalid manoeuvre designed to defuse the explosion of rage at the Tory party conference.

It may be unfair to mention the somewhat unpleasant subject of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. However, we cannot ignore the Chancellor's harsh arrogance at Perth, when he is reported as having said:

"no more money is likely next year . . . he would not be in the same unaccountably open-handed and generous mood."

[Mr. Donald Dewar]

I hope that the Secretary of State accepts that will not do. During the passage of the Bill we will want to be given an undertaking that at least in principle—we will not hold him to exactly the same level—this help will continue to be available throughout the rest of the quinquennium.

If we are satisfied on those matters, we will of course help the Bill through. We want all the cash that we can get from the skinflint Treasury that landed us in this mess and ought to foot the bill for it.

The crisis is not over. The Secretary of State has not muddled through with this announcement. The root of the trouble has been not just revaluation but the constant and vindictive assault on local government finance for the past three or four years that has deprived local authorities in Scotland, on our calculations, of about £1,000 million since 1980-81. If the Secretary of State would reverse that policy, he would be doing the greatest favour to ratepayers in every sector and would give the system a breathing space that would allow us all to look for the considered and effective method of reform that the Opposition certainly want.

Mr. Younger: The last part of the statement of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) is wholly incorrect. If I did what he recommended at the end of his remarks, councils would merely spend even more and ratepayers would face even bigger rate increases. It was an extraordinarily ineffective smokescreen from an hon. Gentleman who has always supported the principle of five-year revaluations, who pressed for the revaluation to be this year and not postponed further, and who knows perfectly well that the level of the increases proposed are the job of the assessor, and not in any sense of anyone else. His criticisms of that are wholly without foundation, and he knows it.

As for the hon. Gentleman's suggestion of a retreat, this is the normal statutory process, which he fully supports. The Government have not merely produced assistance first for domestic ratepayers and now for commercial ratepayers, but produced assistance which is vastly greater than anything for which the hon. Gentleman asked and, indeed, than the maximum demanded—the Liberal party asked for the maximum, which was about £4 million to £5 million. We are providing £50 million, and that shows who in Scotland cares about helping ratepayers. The hon. Gentleman should recognise that.

Regarding the hon. Gentleman's question about the sum, the difference between £40 million, which I mentioned earlier, and £50 million, which I gave today, is accounted for by the fact that the latter includes domestic ratepayers. The previous figure referred only to commercial ratepayers, as the hon. Gentleman will now realise.

I have still to collect the fullest information about the limit. I have in mind a figure of the order of £10,000, up to which any one subject would benefit from the help. The hon. Gentleman must wait and see the terms of the Bill when it is published. The Bill will arrange for the principle of the matter and regulations will spell out the details in full, and they will obviously be debated.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I gave my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Scotland my warmest congratulations on what they achieved for domestic and commercial ratepayers. The assistance is more than was asked for by the Labour Opposition, the alliance and the National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses.

Now that my right hon. Friend has made that great achievement, will he put tremendous pressure on high-spending authorities, and will he give the money that he saves from them to prudent authorities, which need the resources for essential services?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate my hon. Friend's last point, and I shall bear it in mind. Regarding high spending, my hon. Friend knows, as I do, that of the average increases which ratepayers face, one third is caused by the rate support grant or inflation factor, and two-thirds by the overspending of irresponsible authorities. Ratepayers in Scotland will fully realise that truth, and will be interested to see that the Opposition's attitude to the package is not in support of ratepayers' interests.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): It is wonderful to hear the Secretary of State lecturing the House on how much money he has managed to find, when he has often told us how difficult it is to find money. Obviously, we welcome the fact that he has responded to pressure from all sides.

Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that a one-off settlement this year will not be enough? Does he recognise that, if all commercial ratepayers received relief this year, he would merely be delaying the execution of many small businesses? As he has found this sum to meet the rate crisis, cannot he now come forward with new money to meet the education crisis, or is that simply a sign of the rather warped priorities of a Government threatened with extinction in Scotland?

The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State have promised to reform, and indeed to abolish, the rating system. How many more times will they make that promise before they get round to doing it? Can we expect legislation in this Parliament to obviate the need for an emergency package simply to save the Secretary of State's skin rather than to deal with the underlying problem, which was caused by the Government's cuts in rate support grant and in funding to local authorities?

Mr. Younger: I admire the hon. Gentleman's courage in speaking on this issue when, for the past couple of months, he has purported to be campaigning for commercial ratepayers, but got all his figures hopelessly and completely wrong from the start. He was only £35 million out on what is needed to help commercial ratepayers in Scotland. Extra help for next year will be considered at the time of next year's general settlement.

As for the teachers, I do not know where the hon. Gentleman has been for the past few months, but since December there has been an offer on the table from me not only to consider a package from the teachers but to find more money from the Scottish block to help them. The only problem is that they have not taken up that offer.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton (Edinburgh, West): Will my right hon. Friend give top priority to the reform of the rating system within this Parliament? Does he accept that his statement will be greatly welcomed by many thousands of small business men, who will owe their survival in Scotland to his decision? Is not the figure that he announced much more realistic than the one tenth of that figure suggested in the House a few days ago by the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce)?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I can confirm that the ministerial committee, on which my hon. Friend the Minister responsible for home affairs and the environment sits, is considering local government finance with a view to producing proposals for change. As to helping commercial ratepayers, whereas many people have talked about it for months, the Government have acted, and commercial ratepayers will be grateful for that.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): While we obviously welcome this further attempt by the Secretary of State to extricate himself from a mess of his own making, may I tell him that, if he believes that it will resolve the rating crisis, he will soon be disabused of that notion? The extra £10 million for domestic ratepayers will reduce the average increase in their bills this year from 21 per cent. to about 20 per cent. If the right hon. Gentleman believes that that will satisfy domestic ratepayers, he could not be more out of touch with the feelings of ratepayers in Scotland on this matter. In any case, why does he not tell us the whole story? The crisis relates not only to revaluation but to successive cuts in rate support grant. Is it not utter hypocrisy to talk about the £50 million being new money when we know that, before the summer recess, the Secretary of State will impose penalties of £100 million on Scottish local authorities? He will be imposing penalties twice as great as the sum that he announced this afternoon. Is it not complete humbug to talk about this being new money?

Mr. Younger: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has done a U-turn. If he is with the rest of his party, he solidly supports revaluation, believes that it should take place every five years, and believed that it should take place this year. I hope that that is now clearly on the record. He cannot shelter behind the fact that it was someone else's decision; he supports it. The objective of the help for commercial and domestic ratepayers is to give 100 per cent. help, subject to a cut-off, to those with the biggest increases. It will do that, and they will be grateful for it. I admire the right hon. Gentleman's courage in mentioning cuts in the rate support grant. Only he ever cut it by 4 per cent. in one year.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): The ratepayers in my constituency will be relieved that the Secretary of State acted so quickly. The ratepayers in commercial premises in Angus will be especially relieved, because their rates would have exceeded greatly those in other areas. Does my right hon. Friend agree that this is another example of the Government acting quickly to reverse problems that were created by Labour legislation, and that that has been the record of the Government during this Parliament? The humbug is on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is perfectly right. He is particularly concerned about the ratepayers in Angus, about whom he has been in touch with me many times over the past few weeks. I am glad that he has confirmed that this measure will be a help to those ratepayers. I am also glad that my hon. Friend mentioned speed, because at every point in its process, which was supported by the Opposition parties, all of whom agreed that there should be revaluation now, as soon as the Government have seen the information about what the scale of the increase will be, we have responded with extra help, first for domestic and then for commercial ratepayers. It is only the Opposition parties, with their blinkered attitude to helping ratepayers, who have not welcomed this speedy, efficient help.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Is the Secretary of State aware that the scheme that he has announced today will still leave a substantial body of ratepayers paying 300 per cent. more than they have previously paid for rates? Does he think that he can project himself as a Santa Claus by coming with £50 million when the Government have just spent £450 million on an airfield in the Falklands? We have to keep the matter in that context. As the right hon. Gentleman accepts that there is a case for relief in this year, he cannot deny that this relief must be continued on an even wider scale until the Conservative Government relieve the ratepayers of the present system.

Mr. Younger: I explain again to the right hon. Gentleman, as it may not have been clear from what I said, that no ratepayer in Scotland, either commercial or domestic, will be facing an increase of 300 per cent. I have said that three times the rateable value will be the trigger for this help, which will mean that increases in what ratepayers have to pay will be paid at a much lower level than that. I am not responsible for airports in the Falklands, but only for airports in Ayrshire.

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the ratepayers in the city of Aberdeen and in Grampian region will not share the view of the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) that my right hon. Friend has a warped sense of priorities in bringing forward such a measure of relief but that they will thank him for it? It is good that smaller businesses will benefit from this, as a large number of commercial concerns in my constituency were suffering and will welcome this measure.

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and he is right to say that our principal objective for commercial ratepayers has been help for small businesses. Strong representations about the increases have been made to us by those people, and I am glad to be able to help. I could not more agree with my hon. Friend. It will be interesting to have on record that the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), and I presume the Liberal party, think that this is a wrong set of priorities.

Mr. Hugh Brown (Glasgow, Provan): Whatever the motivation of this statement, it is a significant one, as it changes the rates liability for a minority of ratepayers, both domestic and commercial. How many people does the Secretary of State expect will benefit? Is it the intention to have a discretion about the upper limit of relief? Will there be consultation with COSLA and the assessors association before the regulations come to the House?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making an important point. It is unusual, and I do not know whether this has ever been done before in Scotland following a revaluation. As to the numbers affected, I expect — it is difficult to be precise — that this will probably help about 50,000 commercial ratepayers and it might help as many as 250,000 domestic ratepayers. The regulations will spell out the methods by which this will happen, but the Bill will spell out the general principles of allowing help to be given to commercial ratepayers, which is not possible at the moment.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend on his success in obtaining fresh funds to help the hardest pressed Scottish ratepayers. His statement will be most warmly welcomed by the many family owned businesses, particularly in Strathkelvin and Bearsden, which are facing significant increases in their rates bill this year.

Further, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is a measure of the pathetic inability of alliance Members to calculate figures that two weeks ago they were seeking relief amounting to £4 million for commercial ratepayers as opposed to the £40 million of relief which my right hon. Friend has announced today?

Mr. Younger: I thank my hon. Friend for his welcome of this measure. I can only contrast it with the fact that the Opposition, including the Liberal party, appear to be highly unhappy about the fact that we are providing help which is not only generous but about 10 times the maximum level asked for by any of the Opposition parties. It is clear who is prepared to put their money where their mouth is for Scottish ratepayers.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Would the Secretary of State care to explain to the House exactly what he means by "new money"? Is this not recycled money? He has won back from the Chancellor money which the Chancellor had already taken. Will he explain to the House the position about revaluation and the rating system in Scotland? Would it not be better for him to say that he is interfering with revaluation and that we ought to postpone the whole exercise so that local government finance can be placed upon a reasonable footing?

Mr. Younger: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's first question is that "new money" means what it says. It will not lead to reductions in any other part of the Scottish Office programme. Therefore, it will come from the contingency fund. As for the hon. Gentleman's second point, he is absolutely right. This is interfering with the results of revaluation. Whether or not he has decided to change his mind, I would remind him that he, through his party, has solidly supported revaluation.

Mr. Douglas: I have not.

Mr. Younger: Yes — under the leadership of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and his predecessor, I was pressed to ensure that revaluation took place this year. So did the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. As for its interfering with the results of revaluation, of course it is, because we can see the hardship that it is causing to domestic and commercial ratepayers and we are prepared to do something about it.

Mr. Barry Henderson (Fife, North-East): I apologise to my right hon. Friend for having missed hearing him make his statement, which will be warmly welcomed by those in the commercial sector who are most affected. Is he aware that for the average ratepayer in Fife the real problem lies with the overspend by 8p in the pound of Fife regional council? In addition to helping those who have been hit by revaluation, can my right hon. Friend assure the House that he will shortly be announcing selective action against wildly overspending authorities such as Fife?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is absolutely right about the effect of overspending. As I said a few moments ago, two thirds of the increase that, on average, people are facing in Scotland is due to the overspending of councils. That is the main point and my hon. Friend is quite right to make it. As for the rest of his question, I agree that this matter will have to be carefully considered, but I am not yet in a position to make an announcement about possible selective action against any particular authority.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that the word "overspending" is a Government term plucked out of thin air, and that it is based on nothing else? Secondly, will he accept that this turmoil did not arise over previous revaluations, because the rate support grant settlements at that time anticipated events? Finally, will he discourage his hon. Friends from insulting local authorities which will have to deal with the changes that have been announced in this statement, because their good will is essential if they are to rescue their ratepayers from the muddle created by the Government?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman is failing to give the whole picture—unintentionally, I am sure—when he questions the level of overspending. The truth is that local authorities in Scotland are still planning to spend next year nearly 2 per cent. more in real terms than they were spending in 1979. That is a measure of the overspending of certain councils, bearing in mind that a large number of councils—about half of them—are not overspending but are spending within the guidelines. That puts the matter into perspective. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that, whether or not we wish it to be that way, all Governments have to exercise some control over local Government spending. The hon. Gentleman's own Government, when he was in COSLA, had to propose in 1976 the most stringent and severe reductions that were ever made. The hon. Gentleman should recognise that the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) did that.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does the Secretary of State forget that, long before revaluation, both parties of the alliance called for the relief of commercial ratepayers from the burdens of revaluation and from the system, which we called upon him to change? Does he remember, though he dismissed this appeal in the House at the time, that we pressed him to take commercial subjects into general taxation and out of rates altogether and to allow local authorities to recoup some finance by way of charging for their services? Therefore, his attack on the Liberal party is wholly misplaced. The Liberal party and the Social Democratic party have been urging radical reform. If the Secretary of State chooses to overlook this fact, commercial ratepayers in Scotland, like commercial ratepayers in England, will not, when given the opportunity.

Mr. Younger: If the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues have been campaigning for not having a revaluation, they have been doing it silently, which seems to be a very strange way of going about it. I have looked up the record. They did not object to revaluation or oppose it in any way. The hon. Gentleman may have been campaigning for the relief of commercial ratepayers, but I have not noticed him doing so. If he was, he was calling for a maximum sum. The biggest sum was about £5 million. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] That is the biggest sum asked for by anybody. Most of them were much smaller.

This Government have produced a great deal more money. From his neutral position in between the two parties, I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would be glad to congratulate the Government upon having done so.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Will the Secretary of State let us in on a wee secret about the priorities which were in his mind when he was compiling this interesting package? Was it, on the one hand, the resolution of the long-term problems of local government finance in Scotland, or was it, as some of us believe to be more likely, the short-term preservation of Conservative seats in Scotland?

Mr. Younger: The priority which I have had in mind, if the hon. Gentleman has not, has been the plight of those ratepayers who have suffered very large rates increases. I am prepared to do something about that. The hon. Gentleman, apparently, is not.

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): I welcome the statement that has been made by the Secretary of State for Scotland. It will give me the opportunity to tell the good people of Kilmarnock, hopefully on Radio West Sound tonight, that the representations and protests that I have made steadily over the past six months to the Secretary of State on their behalf have eventually borne fruit. If the £50 million which is to be paid back is added to the £38·5 million that was previously redistributed to ratepayers in Scotland, it totals almost £90 million. If this had been added to the cut in rate support grant in 1984, it would have brought the rate support grant back to the level at which it stood last year, a level which the Opposition have been arguing for the past nine months ought to have been retained. It will be a financial nightmare to try to work out this formula. We await with interest just how much pleasure or displeasure will be shown by some ratepayers over the pay-out system.

Mr. Younger: I am very encouraged to learn that the hon. Gentleman, who is a constituency neighbour of mine, has, apparently, second sight. I understand that he started campaigning for help six months ago. He was therefore in the position of supporting revaluation, but before he knew the results of revaluation he demanded that it should be modified by help for commercial ratepayers. That is very nice to know. I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's welcome of the proposals. May I reassure him that the calculations are relatively simple to make. If one's valuation has gone up by more than three times and one is either a commercial or a domestic ratepayer, one is entitled to help on this basis of 100 per cent. of the amount applicable to that, above three times, subject only to the £10,000 cut-off.

Mr. David Lambie (Cunninghame, South): The right hon. Gentleman is wrong in stating that in 1983 everybody in Scotland was in favour of the 1985 revaluation. May I remind him that some of us have been warning him not only about the effects of the 1985 revaluation but also about the effects of the 1978 revaluation, because revaluation in England has been halted since 1973. In 1978, I had the right hon. Gentleman's support against that revaluation, but at the time he was in opposition. When will the Government and all the other political parties in the House stop tinkering with the rating system in Scotland, abolish it and the assessors' departments and introduce a 100 per cent. Government grant? When will they get rid of all this and allow local authorities to spend their money in whatever way they want? That is the only solution; I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will allow that to be considered during the passage of his Bill.

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point. Perhaps I have done him an injustice. I always assume that, whatever the Labour party is in favour of, he will be against. I should have realised that earlier. I notice his wish, which I have known for a long time, to abolish the rating system altogether. That is one of the things that will be taken into account in the further review that is now under way.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that the real crisis in local government is that he has taken £1,000 million from local government since 1979 and that Fife region has suffered severely from that policy. If Conservative Members want to change the policies of Fife region, they should do so by the ballot box at local authority elections, not by Government diktat. Will the right hon. Gentleman now answer one question that he has so far omitted to answer? Will there be relief for domestic and commercial ratepayers next year—yes or no?

Mr. Younger: On the £1,000 million, the hon. Gentleman has made a calculation of what might have happened, but he has ignored the fact that local government spending has gone up in real terms since 1979. That puts his remarks entirely in perspective. At a time when many other parts of the public sector have had to cut back, local government has not yet succeeded in doing so.

I appreciate that Fife region would like to spend more money, but I note that it appeared to have no difficulty in finding £2 million to spend in support of striking miners, so it cannot have been that pushed for money.

I have already said that next year will fall to be considered in the normal way when next year's public expenditure is under consideration.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Why does the right hon. Gentleman keep insisting that he has acted on the basis of new facts, when the Government must have known the effect of revaluation six months ago? Is it not the case that the only facts that the right hon. Gentleman has taken into account over the past few weeks are the opinion polls in Scotland, local government election results and the letters that he has been receiving from thousands of his constituents and from his Back Benchers?

Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that the answer that he has just given about next year simply is not good enough? Will he make it clear that he repudiates the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer at Perth last weekend and that if he does not win the argument between himself and the Chancellor in the Cabinet he will resign as Secretary of State for Scotland?

Mr. Younger: On the question of new facts, the hon. Gentleman needs to study the timings of this revaluation a bit better. Nobody, not even the Secretary of State, can know the results of the assessors' calculations before the assessors have made them.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): The right hon. Gentleman was warned by the assessors as far back as November last year.

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman anticipates what I am about to say. The first information came in late

[Mr. Younger]

October. As soon as the first information was to hand I took action and raised the domestic rate relief from 1p to 5p. When the further refinement of the figures was available in February we went further and at the first moment increased the 5p to 8p. During the last few weeks we have been assessing the details of the assessors' views on the valuations for the commercial subjects. In the face of the fact that there is no legislative provision for helping them now, we have assessed the matter and have produced proposals and a larger sum of money than anyone asked for in order to help them. In all honesty anybody who is being at all objective would say that that is a pretty good response to a difficult problem.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Reference has been made to the contents of my ten-minute Bill and I want to take the opportunity to put the record straight. First, I welcome the proposal. I do not want to be niggardly about that. I think that my hon. Friends will also welcome it. Anyone who studies my introduction to the ten-minute Bill will see that I talked about £5 million being a start, but, there is an important second objective in the proposal that I was putting forward. It is that the Bill was designed to help those whose increases were in the same order of magnitude as the level of profits. My worry is that some of the £40 million will go to a lot of businesses in Scotland which do not need that to survive. That is why there is a difference in scale. It is a bit unfair for the Secretary of State to imply anything different about the scheme which was worked out by the National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses.

Mr. Younger: I have made no mention of the federation; I have been referring to that august body, the Liberal party, which has been posing as the supporter of the commercial ratepayer without the faintest idea how much money was being asked for or what it was for. With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, before he introduces another ten-minute Bill he had better get his figures right.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): A threefold increase in rateable value will be necessary before commercial or domestic ratepayers are eligible for this new form of relief. I know that the Scottish Office will reimburse the authorities' expenses, but how will the money be paid out by the rating authorities? The Secretary of State said that in the commercial sector the average effect of revaluation had been neutral. How many in the commercial sector fall between that neutrality and the threefold increase in rateable value that was referred to in the statement? How did the right hon. Gentleman work out that those eligible in the commercial and domestic sectors will roughly equate to £40 million and £10 million?

Finally, the Secretary of State says that it is not his job to do the work of the assessors. May we take it that in terms of administering the scheme he is really proposing that the cut-off point of the threefold increase should be entered into the valuation roll, or will it simply apply to the demand notices for 1985-86? With hindsight, does he not wish that he had looked a bit more closely at the provisional figures that he was receiving last November instead of creating all this chaos in the rating and valuation system?

Mr. Younger: On the hon. Gentleman's last point, however closely I looked at the figures given in November they showed the commercial sector as neutral. It was only when the detailed figures began to come through that we discovered, as did the hon. Gentleman that while the generality is neutral there are some with vast increases at the top end, and, of course, there are also some with vast reductions, but people keep quiet about that.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the method and the threefold threshold. That has to be seen against the background that the average increase in valuation for domestic ratepayers is 2·7 times. That is pretty generous in that it is pretty close to three. For commercial ratepayers the average increase in rateable value is 2·2 times and, again, we cannot be said to be ungenerous when we are going to start the extra help at three times. I think that most hon. Gentlemen will agree with that when they think about it.

As for the commercial sector being neutral, I cannot make the calculation at the moment as to how many are not affected by the assistance, still less the breakdown between those who are between the 2·2 times and the three times and those who are below 2·2 times and who will therefore receive reductions in their rates. It is difficult to give those figures, but, as I said earlier, about 50,000 of the worst affected commercial ratepayers will get this relief for which I am sure they will be grateful.

A ratepayer who feels that he comes within the scheme need do nothing immediately, but, if the Bill is enacted, he will apply to his local authority for relief which he will get in due course. On the method of doing that I shall have to consult COSLA and obtain its views.

Rent (Amendment)

4.19 pm

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make further provision as to the circumstances in which possession of a dwelling-house is recoverable under Case 11 in Schedule 15 to the Rent Act 1977 and Case 11 in Schedule 2 to the Rent (Scotland) Act 1984 and as to the parliamentary procedure applicable to an Order in Council under paragraph 1(1)(b) of Schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 1974 which states that it is made for corresponding purposes.

The Bill seeks to put right a flaw in two previous Rent Acts which has come to light only recently as a result of an Appeal Court decision.

It was the universally held view that case 11 of schedule 15 to the Rent Act 1977, which repeated the provisions of the Rent Act 1965, meant that an owner who let his or her home on a contractual tenancy while he or she was away could repossess that home once the contract had ended. The Appeal Court, however, in the recent case of Pocock v. Steele found that, because there had been a further letting during the absence of the owner, that provision did not apply. Therefore, my constituent, Mrs. Pocock, was unable to get back her home and her possessions inside it.

The result of that judgment is that many people who have let their homes in good faith for a short period while they are away overseas—perhaps on Crown service or on private business—may not now be able to repossess either their homes or their goods and chattels inside their homes.

The purpose of the Bill is, therefore, to restore the law to that which Parliament thought it was when it enacted those measures—first, the Labour Government in 1965, the Labour Government again in 1977 and the Conservative Government in the Housing Act 1980. We seek to restore the position to that which every Member of the House thought it was at the time when those measures were enacted.

It will not be news to the House that this sort of legislation cannot be enacted by a private Member without the consent of all the parties in the House. I am happy to say that this is one of the more civilised occasions in the House when all parties are agreed that the Bill should become law at the earliest possible moment.

I am grateful not only to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), but to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) who has written to me in generous terms:

"I write on behalf of the Official Opposition to confirm that we have no objection to your proposed Bill. Indeed we hope it reaches the Statute Book."

I am grateful also to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who speaks on housing matters on behalf of the Liberal party, and to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), who does the same on behalf of the Social Democratic party. The fact that I have not contacted hon. Members representing all the minor parties is a matter for which I apologise, but I have been unable to identify who speaks on this matter.

I therefore hope that I shall be given leave to bring in the Bill and that, with the help of all concerned, it will have a speedy passage through the House and become law, so that the law returns to that which we all thought it was until the Appeal Court, in its correct independence, informed us otherwise.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Michael Mates, Mr. John Cartwright, Sir Paul Hawkins, Mr. John Heddle, Mr. Simon Hughes, Mr. Allan Roberts and Mr. Neil Thorne.

RENT (AMENDMENT)

Mr. Michael Mates accordingly presented a Bill to make further provision as to the circumstances in which possession of a dwelling-house is recoverable under Case 11 in Schedule 15 to the Rent Act 1977 and Case 11 in Schedule 2 to the Rent (Scotland) Act 1984 and as to the parliamentary procedure applicable to an Order in Council under paragraph 1(1)(b) of Schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 1974 which states that it is made for corresponding purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 17 May and to be printed. [Bill 146.]

Orders of the Day

Oil and Pipelines Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

4.24 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The House is familiar with the background to the Bill. Over the last six months we have had two reports from the Select Committee on Energy and, as a result of the reports of that Committee, we have had two debates on the Supplementary Estimates which the Government have asked the House to approve for grants to cover trading losses of BNOC. On 13 March I announced the Government's conclusions regarding the future of BNOC. At this stage I should like to pay tribute to the work of the Select Committee on those two reports.

I appreciate that the conclusions to which the Government have come are not of course the conclusions of the Select Committee, but it is significant that the analysis that led up to those conclusions was very helpful to the Government in reaching their conclusions. Indeed, I think that there is not a great deal of difference between the Government's analysis of the background and the analysis of the Select Committee. I certainly pay tribute to the work of the Select Committee leading up to the Bill. I wholly accept that the Select Committee will not neccessarily agree with the Government's conclusions, and I make that point plain. The analysis was very helpful, as was the evidence taken by the Select Committee.

When I announced the Government's conclusions on the future of BNOC I mentioned—and I repeat today—that it is our belief that the balance has shifted decisively against the retention of BNOC in its present form. At the time of the announcement and in the brief debate on the report of the Select Committee, I made it clear that the Government believe that there are a number of functions currently performed by BNOC that should be retained. First, there is the function of the custody of participation agreements; secondly, there is the power to dispose of royalty in kind; and thirdly, the power to act as agent for the Government in the management and running of the Government's oil and pipeline system. The conclusion that I announced on 13 March was that it was appropriate to establish a small oil and pipelines agency to perform these functions. The Bill, if approved, will give effect to these conclusions.

I do not intend to go into all the details and the background of the reasons for the abolition because I outlined those in my statement, and the House considered them in the debate on the Supplementary Estimate initiated by the Select Committee.

The Bill seeks to preserve what we believe to be of continuing value with regard to BNOC's current institutional arrangements and to discard those parts of its arrangements which we believe have become outdated or in some cases a potential liability. The one item which we believe is outdated and has a potential to become a liability concerns the contractual arrangements under which BNOC acquired and sold participation oil. Although, as I freely acknowledged in earlier debates in the House and in my evidence to the Select Committee, that is a function which has been important in the past and one which BNOC has performed with distinction, I believe that for a number of reasons it has now ceased to provide a means to prevent instability. It was in the means to prevent instability that the main purpose of the exercise of this function lay. The reason, as I explained to the House previously, is that in recent years, and particularly in recent months, we have seen fresh developments in the market which I believe give these arrangements for contracting and trading in participation oil the potential to spark off a cycle of competitive undercutting which, far from being a force againt destabilisation, would run a serious risk of dragging down prices to an unsustainable level.

That was very much the basis of the evidence that I put before the Select Committee, and which we discussed during our debate on the Supplementary Estimate. Therefore, we have had a full debate on that matter. Basically, it stems from the growth, not only in the United Kingdom but worldwide, in the spot market and the decline in contract sales at a term price. As we do not envisage those forces changing in the foreseeable future, we believe that it is right to change the institutional arrangements to take account of the changes in the oil market over recent months and years.

I wish to make it clear that this is not a case—as the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) tries to make out—of trying to cut down some lame duck state corporation that has been losing money through inefficiency or failings. That is most certainly not the Government's view. What we are doing is no reflection on the corporation or its staff. The corporation maintained its prices after consultation with the Government and taking account of the national interest. It is our continuing belief that those decisions were correct in the national interest. However, because of those decisions it was necessary to come to the House for a Supplementary Estimate to cover the losses. Our proposals today are a reflection not on the staff or the operation of the corporation, but simply on the development in the structure of oil markets that we have discussed at length on previous occasions.

Although we are discarding the major function and purpose of BNOC, it has other functions and purposes. One of those, to which the Select Committee attached importance, is security of our supplies. That is central to the whole matter. On its other functions, while there were contract sales at term prices BNOC served a useful purpose in providing transparent evidence of arm's length prices for North sea oil. That was helpful to the oil taxation office for transfers of oil within integrated oil companies. However, that must be considered apart from the structure and organisation of BNOC, because the virtual disappearance of term prices for oil destroys the value of the diminishing evidence available to the oil taxation office. Therefore, although it served a useful purpose in the past, it is not appropriate in the changed market circumstances.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): Even if we accept what the Minister says—which we do not—what steps are the Government taking, through the oil taxation office or by any other means, to deal with changing circumstances to ensure that the taxpayer is not ripped off by fancy transfer prices or various devices to reduce the tax burden?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The right hon. Gentleman has a direct interest in these matters, so I am surprised that he does not agree with my analysis of the background. He knows that one of the problems that the Government have had to face—I am sure that he has read the evidence before the Select Committee — is that the loss of contract sales — with sales taking place at different values, sometimes at spot price — has thrown considerable doubt on the use of the prices established by BNOC for taxation purposes. Under the legislation, what is required is actual evidence of the price at which the oil passes from one affiliate to the other. The oil taxation office is in discussion with the oil companies about that —as it would have had to have been regardless of what we are doing in the Bill. It is an important issue, but one that would have arisen anyway.

Another useful purpose of BNOC has been as a marketing agency for smaller licensees. I know that many of the smaller companies have found it convenient and helpful to market through the corporation. However, I do not believe that it is in any way an essential purpose of the corporation. There are other possibilities, such as disposal to larger producers or—and discussions are taking place on this now — the possibility of setting up either independent agencies or co-operative agencies. Therefore, although that purpose was useful in the past, it is not one that necessarily requires or demands the need for intervention by a state corporation.

On the issue of security of supplies——

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): On the marketing of oil by the smaller companies, has my right hon. Friend sought any assurances, and can he confirm reports in the press, that the larger multinationals have reached an accommodation with the smaller companies, or are in the process of doing so?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Obviously, any arrangements are commercially confidential to those making them. I have certainly received indications that discussions are taking place. If the arrangements are not actually made, they are in the course of being made. There is also a certain amount of talk about other initiatives, such as the setting up of independent or co-operative agencies. I have not seen any evidence that shows that the normal commercial organisations will not be able to cope.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Of course they can cope.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The hon. Gentleman underlines his political motivation in wishing to keep in being a state corporation when there are perfectly adequate organisations available in the commercial sector.

I know that security of supply has concerned the House, and I made considerable reference to that during my speech on the Supplementary Estimate. It is important to look not only at the role that BNOC has performed in carrying out the contracts in participation oil, but to examine the background to the security of supply and the existing arrangements.

If, for example, there was an interruption of supply from the Gulf, we could turn to the international agreements—which have been refined and developed over the years and especially since BNOC was established —through the International Energy Agency and the EC to make arrangements to take care of any severe disruption. I use the words "severe disruption" advisedly because the international arrangements under the IEA can be triggered only where the shortfall is of the scale of 7 per cent. or more of OECD country supplies. Therefore, the IEA arrangements exist where there has been a severe disruption. Where there is a less severe disruption there are informal arrangements.

Where there is severe disruption the arrangements through the IEA guarantee to the United Kingdom an appropriate share of the remaining production in the free world, irrespective of the companies, corporations or agencies that may be handling the production. Where the shortfall is big enough to trigger the international obligations, access to North sea oil is not as important as it may have seemed at one time. In any case, as a fallback under the Energy Act 1976 the Government have power in a crisis to control oil production on the United Kingdom continental shelf, whoever produces it and whatever the contracts may be.

On security of supply the real concern must relate to minor interruptions up to the 7 per cent. trigger point which comes under the IEA agreement. Again we must remind ourselves that in that case it is not an interruption of access to crude oil that matters, as has been shown in the past, but rather access to the oil products that are needed by industry, transport and so on. The real burden of the responsibility to meet a crisis of a smaller nature would fall on the private refining and marketing companies which supply those products and not on the state itself or on any agency of the state.

The Government have obtained from the refining and marketing companies assurances that we believe would meet that kind of crisis. Most important, they are concentrated on products where the demand and the need would be. To put it in a form that is easier to understand, a shortfall of 7 per cent. is equivalent to 25 or 26 days of actual supply. Since, currently in the United Kingdom, subject to the informal arrangements that we have, stocks of products stand at 92 days' supply, obviously the arrangements we have with the refining and marketing companies are adequate to fill the gap and would give time to reactivate participation if it was felt to be necessary, and which the agency could do with the consent of the Secretary of State. Given the arrangements that I have taken some trouble to describe to the House, I do not believe that the abolition of BNOC should in any way diminish the country's security of supply of oil or of its products, which are most important.

Mr. Rowlands: I have searched high and low to find the character and nature of the assurances upon which the Minister rests so much of his case. Are they published? Are they available? Will they be made available to the House or to the Committee on the Bill so that hon. Members can judge for themselves how real the assurances are?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: These are informal assurances that the Government have from the oil companies. That is the basis on which they have been for some years. The Government and I are confident that they would be carried out in the kind of crisis I have described. The details are confidential. I shall see whether I can give more information to the hon. Gentleman and to members of the Committee. As there is still a fallback in a time of real crisis to exercise the participation rights, I believe the arrangements I have described are adequate. I emphasise that in the Bill we are not abolishing the power to exercise rights of participation.

In regard to some of the other functions of BNOC which we are continuing under the smaller agency, we have the Government pipelines and storage system which covers 1,000 miles of oil pipeline and 41 oil storage facilities. Over the period that it has operated the system BNOC has built up an effective team. We intend to retain that function.

Another function that we intend to retain is the power to operate in royalty in kind. Of course, the Government remain entitled to royalty in kind. Therefore, I wish to retain in the new agency the mechanism to obtain the best possible price for the realisation of the royalty in kind.

I have mentioned specifically four main functions—the exercise of participation rights, which the new agency will not operate but which it will have the power to operate, subject to the agreement of the Secretary of State, should it be thought necessary to activate that power; security of supply; the operation of the pipelines and storage system; and the power to operate the royalty in kind.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister talked about the role the agency will play in marketing the Government's royalty oil in kind. That figure is theoretically 280,000 barrels a day. In the past there have been sale-back arrangements. If they were continued or conceded by the Government they would leave the agency with only about 100,000 barrels a day to trade. Can the Minister tell us the intention of the Government in relation to the royalty oil in kind?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The arrangements made between BNOC and companies will be taken over by the agency. The power to operate the royalty in kind will be in the legislation. The functions may be changed in the future while royalties in kind continue to exist. As the hon. Gentleman knows, they will eventually be self-extinguishing. The agency will be empowered to trade in that oil. I shall explain that more fully when I deal with the clauses in the Bill.

The Government think it important to get the new organisation moving as quickly as possible. Because of market sensitivity it was necessary to announce the decision as we did. I understand the uncertainty that the announcement caused immediately. It is important for the future that the organisation of the new agency becomes clear as quickly as possible.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already announced the appointment of the chief executive designate who will become the chief executive subject to the passage of the legislation. Mr. Kenneth Vaughan joined BNOC in 1978. He is, therefore, already a member of BNOC's staff. Prior to that, he was for 20 years with BP, and he spent 11 years with the Kuwait National Petroleum Company. For the last three years his responsibilities in BNOC have related to the piplines and storage system and to LPG trading. We are fortunate to have the services of someone with his wide experience and, in particular, with his experience of BNOC.

My right hon. Friend hopes to make an announcement as soon as possible about the appointment of the chairman designate. The appointment of the chief executive designate will help the future management to decide on the staff necessary for the manning of the agency, and I know that Mr. Vaughan is pressing ahead with that. I do not want there to be any unnecessary uncertainty, and, as the organisational arrangements go ahead, the details will be made known in the appropriate way.

I will explain the main provisions of the Bill. Clause 1 provides for the establishment of the agency and lays down its board structure. That is a straightforward provision, particularly bearing in mind the background that I have described.

Clause 2 sets out the functions of the agency, with its responsibility for the disposal of royalty in kind, for managing the Government pipeline and storage system and for maintaining the participation regime which I have explained.

The agency will also have power to trade in petroleum on its own account, but such trading will be subject to the Secretary of State's consent. That consent will be given only for limited purposes. The first purpose is to enable it to maximise the proceeds from the disposal of royalty in kind because, in the course of trading, it may be desirable to do that. The existence of this provision will, I hope, make it clear that the agency need not be hindered for legal reasons from maximising the proceeds.

The second purpose is to ensure that the agency will be able to trade effectively in participation agreements, were they ever to be reactivated. But, as I pointed out, the agency will not be empowered to act as agent for disposing of anyone else's oil.

Mr. Rost: Will the agency be empowered to subcontract out the sale of royalty oil if it thought it economically desirable to do that?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The agency will have responsibility in that respect, but obviously it will have to exercise that responsibility from the point of view of proper commercial accountability.

There has been some discussion about the role that BNOC has so far performed in trading in liquefied petroleum gases. The Government do not see any reason for the public sector to remain involved in the LPG market. At present, BNOC handles less than 30 per cent. of the UK continential shelf production of LPG and under 20 per cent. of the total UK output, including that from refineries. The agency could retain sufficient volume of LPG to trade effectively only if it continued to exercise options to purchase LPG under participation agreements. That could not be justified with participation trading in crude oil—this is one of the main purposes of the Bill—being wound up. In any case, since January 1982 BNOC has been precluded from exercising new options to take LPG.

Clause 2 enables the agency to enter into new participation agreements, as determined by the Secretary of State, and to give effect to those and to existing agreements. However, it may not, without the Secretary of State's consent, elect to take petroleum under a participation agreement. It is the Government's intention that as new oilfields reach the development stage the licensees should continue to conclude agreements which enable the agency to participate in the oil produced.

It is the Secretary of State's intention to consent to the exercise of an option to take petroleum under such agreements only if such an exercise was finally justified by an existing or imminent threat to the security of the nation's oil supplies.

Clause 3 allows all the property, rights and liabilities of BNOC to be vested in the agency on a day appointed by the Secretary of State. Statutory vesting provisions have been a common feature of legislation introduced by all Governments in recent years and it is our intention, in relation to the agency, to establish it and to use the powers under the clause as soon as the Bill has been enacted, so enabling an orderly transfer to take place to it from BNOC.

BNOC will have to be retained in existence for some time—although in the latter stage very much as a shell—to enable it to draw up final accounts and effect the transfer of property, assets and liabilities. Clause 3(5) requires BNOC to be dissolved formally as soon as those tasks have been completed.

Schedule 2(2) makes provision for the contracts of employment of BNOC staff to be transferred in their entirety to the agency, so that the employees' terms and conditions are not adversely affected by the transfer. It also makes appropriate provision for pension rights.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Apart from altering participation agreements and BNOC's role in obtaining oil, selling it back and otherwise operating in the market, the Government could have reached the conclusion that BNOC should remain in place but should not, for the foreseeable future, set a price.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: It is sad that the hon. Gentleman did not attend the meetings of, or hear my remarks before, the Select Committee. I said that it would have been perfectly possible to have done what he suggested — there is here a straight political divide between myself and the hon. Gentleman—but that we saw no point in keeping it in being if its function was simply to trade in oil at the market price, a function which others were perfectly able to do.

I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman is devoted to state organisation and interference in trading in this and other matters. However, so long as BNOC is not performing the function that it had before in relation to avoiding destabilising the market, and is simply trading at the market price, that purpose is, in our view, outdated. I am sorry to have to repeat that, and I do so for the hon. Gentleman's benefit.

Clauses 4 and 5 and schedule 3 make the financial provisions to enable the agency to perform the responsibilities that I have described.

I have paid tribute to the effective way in which the staff of BNOC have worked in the past. The board of BNOC is paying particular attention to the question of assisting the staff, the majority of whom will have to move from the corporation, although, as I have pointed out, some staff will be needed for the new agency.

The board has already told its staff the terms of the compensation arrangements for those who become redundant. That is a matter for the board, but I understand that the terms are in line with benefits paid by oil companies generally when staff are made redundant.

During April, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met Mr. Roy Grantham, the general secretary of the Association of Professional, Executive, Clerical and Computer Staff, and discussed the genuine anxieties felt by the staff. The corporation is providing special counselling services to help those who will become redundant. I am sure that the board will do all that it can to ease the transition and to solve the genuine problems faced by those whose careers will be disrupted as a result of the Government's decision.

The Bill is a direct consequence of changes in the oil market. Given those changes, although BNOC served an extremely useful purpose in the past and, as I have acknowledged, served it well, I do not believe that there is any longer a need to maintain a public body to carry out the activities that I have described, many of which can be equally well carried out in the private sector. The new small agency will be better geared to the limited functions that we are retaining. I therefore commend the Bill to the House.

5.1 pm

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): The Minister and I are playing unusual roles today. We normally reply to debates. I believe that it is the first time that we have opened a debate, and I welcome that opportunity. The Minister's introduction of the Bill begs as many questions as it answers. It also skated over a number of issues which have been thrown up as a result of the decision to abolish BNOC. My hon. Friends and myself will underline some of the dilemmas and issues and some of our fundamental disagreements with the decision to abolish BNOC.

Like the Minister, I wish to pay a tribute to the Select Committee for its work over the past months which led to two debates. The Minister managed conveniently to forget his contribution on 18 December which was a coherent and comprehensive defence of BNOC's fundamental role. I shall come later to one or two of his observations.

I want also to pay tribute to BNOC's staff. The trading arm was severed and the exploration and production side was hived off by the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982. Veterans of that Act—I can see one on the Conservative Benches—will recall the lengthy debates that we had about the problems that could arise with the remit given to the corporation and the position into which it was placed. Some of our worst fears were not realised, chiefly as a result of the skill and competence of members of BNOC's trading staff and the way in which they conducted BNOC's functions after the passing of the 1982 Act. I should like to add my tribute to that by the Minister. It is deeply regrettable and distasteful that the staff is receiving this kick in the teeth, especially as there are ways in which we could have solved the problems that the corporation faced this year if it were not for the Government being so ideologically committed to abolishing it.

We should put the Bill into its historical context. It is the second stage in the dismantling and proposed destruction of a successful, profitable, competent and professional corporation. Before the passing of the 1982 Act, the corporation had earned considerable respect, grudging initially, from the oil industry. It served an important and valuable national function. It was the only organisation in the North sea which was 100 per cent. loyal to the nation and, through the Secretary of State, to the House. It was the ears, eyes and nose of the Government and the nation in the North sea.

The organisation was broken up by the 1982 Act. It led to one of the most remarkable flotation debacles — Britoil. The Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982 was supposed to herald a new era. I remember the debates and so will Conservative Members. A new, independent, thrusting and enterprising British oil company was supposed to spring up as a result of that Act and of the removal of BNOC from exploration and production.

We all know what a terrible flop the Act has been. Last week, the Secretary of State performed the funeral rites over the gas part of the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982. He tacitly admitted that there was little or no future for gas enterprises in the North sea. He intends to create a private monopoly in place of the multitude of private gas enterprises which were supposed to result from the 1982 legislation.

Enterprise Oil has not been a thrusting company. It was supposed to be a young, independent company but the Rio Tinto-Zinc Corporation gobbled up 29 per cent. of its shares within 48 hours of their coming onto the market. The Secretary of State was helpless to intervene. We are now witnessing a process of gobbling up in the North sea. Commercial and economic pressures, I admit, but also Government policies are leading to the gradual disappearance of a number of our independent British oil companies. They have been merged or will be taken over. I mention that because it is relevant to the Bill. One of the sad subsidiary contributions to that process will be made by the Bill. It will contribute to the continuing disappearance of the small independent oil companies.

The Minister did not pay as much attention as the small independent oil companies might to the role that BNOC played on their behalf. BNOC offered a commercial service to the small independent oil companies who had small amounts of oil—about 8,000 or 10,000 barrels a day—and who believed that they would receive a more secure and better deal by taking it to a national oil corporation than they would by trading at the mercy of the bigger boys.

The right hon. Gentleman was sanguine about the impact that the Bill would have on the trading activities of small oil companies and the way that they would have to come to new arrangements with the oil majors. The evidence that they gave to the Select Committee was not sanguine. I know that the right hon. Gentleman has read the report as carefully as I have, but I draw his attention to appendix 5 of the Select Committee on Energy report published on 8 March 1985. That appendix contains a letter from Westar Oil UK. It states:

"For a small producer such as Westar, with no affiliated downstream operations or in-house marketing expertise, the presence of a strong, knowledgeable trading organization like BNOC is a considerable benefit. Without BNOC we would have to try to sell our product to the major refining and marketing companies who have traditionally preferred to handle their own production."

The gentleman who wrote the letter goes on to state, plainly from his personal experience:

"The writer recalls vividly the extreme difficulty that small producers had some 20 years ago in marketing their oil. Downstream operations were then (as, largely, now) controlled by the Majors, and they simply refused to purchase crude from independent producers."

That is an unsolicited testimony to the useful and rather more important role—admittedly a subsidiary role—that the national oil corporation played as a trading corporation in assisting the commercial dealings of the small independent North sea oil producers. Every day we read in the newspapers of potential mergers and of huge conglomerates gobbling each other up—for example, the Tricentrol and Britoil activities. Given those tremendous pressures and the Government's professed wish to have bright, new, enterprising oil companies in the North sea, the Bill will make life harder and more difficult for the small independent oil companies.

I hope that the Minister of State will reflect between now and the Committee stage on what the agency, which will trade in royalty oil and will, I assume, have traders in its membership and on its staff, will say to the small independent companies—for example, Westar, Premier and GOAL. Those companies will ask, "Will you take our 8,000 barrels a day? As you are marketing your royalty oil in kind, will you market our oil as well?"

It does not matter where we stand on the fundamental issues, we must consider this question: what is especially devastating, apart from the ideological obsession with the concept of a trading corporation, about the corporation's fulfilling a useful function? I ask the Minister of State to respond pragmatically to that question.

Clause 2(1)(d) refers to the agency's power

"to buy, sell or otherwise deal in petroleum on its own account."

Through that provision, it will be possible for the agency to fulfil a useful function, one which was properly carried out by the corporation.

A remarkable decision was made in the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982—to retain the trading side of BNOC. That was the only positive measure. The decision was made not by Socialist nationalisers or people passionately in love with state corporations, but by the then Secretary of State for Energy, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is probably the ultimate freebooter in the Cabinet. One of the most astonishing and specious reasons given by the Government for abolishing the corporation concerns the stabilisation of prices. I shall deal later with that point, because I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House found the Minister's remarks confusing, to say the least, and ambivalent.

Why did the then Secretary of State choose not to abolish the trading side of the corporation when he was undertaking other acts of privatisation? I have searched high and low through the Second Reading and Committee debates on the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Bill—I should be grateful if the Minister of State can assist me—for an argument by the Secretary of State that BNOC would be retained to fix prices. It would have been a profanity for him to say that. He must be the one person who would never admit, at least in public, an intention to fix, prop up or stabilise prices. I cannot find a single reference to the idea that the corporation's premier role was to be involved in stabilising prices, but, apparently, its abolition has been based entirely on the fact that it can no longer stabilise prices. Stabilising prices was never the corporation's primary function, although it later played that role.

In the middle of an act of privatisation, the Conservative Government said, "We want to retain the trading side of BNOC because we think that it is the most sensible instrument to control the security of our oil supplies." That is what the then Secretary of State and other Ministers said when taking the Bill through the House. They subsequently upheld that statement. They believed that trading in participation oil was a useful and sensible function of the corporation in controlling oil supplies.

Those are not my views, although I think that they are excellent ideas. Those were the views of the present Chancellor a mere two years ago when he was Secretary of State for Energy. They were the views also of the Secretary of State for Energy in 1979. The right hon Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) will recall—he is the man who was in the hot spot during the oil crisis—his statements in the summer of 1979. He said:

"I can take powers under the Energy Act 1976 to control movements in conditions of limited shortage, but BNOC's direct access to participation oil, together with royalty oil, strengthens our position."

This Bill is concerned with the abolition of a corporation that trades in participation oil. That trade strengthened our position in 1979 in a crisis; this abolition will weaken our position in any future oil crisis. I vividly remember question after question and statement after statement in the House on the problems during the summer of 1979, and I am sure that those days are ingrained in the memory of the right hon. Member for Guildford.

The Minister of State has made exactly the same points as the Chancellor and the right hon. Member for Guildford. The speech of 18 December 1984, which the Minister forgot to mention, made strong recommendations. I do not think that I am letting out any trade secrets when I say that he and I co-operated in presenting the most comprehensive and coherent case for the retention of BNOC. In column 230 of the Official Report of 18 December 1984, the Minister made the basic case for retaining BNOC as a body trading in participation oil and exercising its rights to that oil. Long lead times are involved in this trade. The right hon. Gentleman said that we needed long-term arrangements because they would provide us with secure supplies of oil. I do not believe that the oil market changed between December and May in relation to the basic argument about the security of supply. Prices have certainly changed. What the right hon. Gentleman said in column 230 of the Official Report was valid then, and it is valid now. If the right hon. Gentleman wants to stand on his head—an unseemly posture—he should not expect the rest of us to do so as well. The right hon. Gentleman stood some of the arguments on their head today. We have every right to remind him of them and to reject his arguments, too.

The truth is that BNOC had, and has, in my view, a basic and fundamental role in securing our oil supplies. The alternatives that the Minister of State described have been around for some time. The Energy Act has been around since 1976 but, as the former Secretary of State the right hon. Member for Guildford knows, it is an enormous power, but it is a bit of a power of last resort. The House has to declare a national emergency before aspects of it can be used. The power is meant to be used not for handling a shortage problem but for a massive crisis in our oil markets. It is perfectly reasonable and justifiable legislation but it is a last resort, and so inappropriate for dealing with shortages and crises that fall short of the 7 per cent. figure.

Likewise, the International Energy Agency and EEC arrangements assume a dramatic position. There has to be a dramatic crisis before the arrangements are triggered off. The Minister argued that the participation rights will be in place. He also said that he has the paper assurances from the oil companies. What sort of assurances are they? Are they in the form of letters? Do they have the force of law? If they were challenged in a time of crisis, would they stand up? If any of the oil companies reneged on them, would the Government have the power in law to force them to abide by those assurances? Suddenly the assurances have become informal. We do not know in what form they are. Are they just letters, saying, "Dear Secretary of State Peter . . . Yours sincerely . . . " and so on? Are the assurances meaningful? Do they have a legal presentation? Do they have the binding effect of a contract? We need to know.

The Minister of State made a strong case that we need not have a national oil corporation with all the participation rights and so on because we have those assurances. My fear, and the fear of many hon. Members, is that those assurances would be worth only the paper that they were written on when the crunch came. One should talk to those who faced the crisis in 1973-74 to discover whether oil companies deliver such assurances when the time comes. They plead other obligations and other contractual arrangements. I could list the qualifications and conditions that could be attached. However, I am willing to look at those assurances if the Minister will present them to the House so that we may decide how effective they are.

We should not rest the case of the security of our oil supplies on paper assurances from the oil companies. However, we should rest the case on the right to participation oil—not only the right but access to and trading in that participation oil. Today the right hon. Gentleman did not mention — and in December he argued otherwise—how he and his agency will trigger off those paper participation rights. I should like the Minister to clarify that. The paper participation rights that can be activated in times of shortage and crisis can be served with six months' notice in half the cases and 12 months' notice in the other half. How much of an assurance is that? I hope that people will hang around and wait and not create too much of a crisis while the Secretary of State and his agency trigger off the participation rights, with the six months' and 12 months' notice.

That is why we have a national oil trading corporation. It is real participation oil, not paper participation oil. Net after sale-back, BNOC trades in about 800,000 barrels a day. It serves on the technical and operating committees on the North sea. It is involved in the detailed decisions of lifting and transporting our oil. That is the real thing. That is what I call a real form of safeguard and assurance.

Will the agency inherit any of those responsibilities? Will it have the right to serve on the operating and technical committees as BNOC does now? That is vital. That is how one knows what is going on, on a day-to-day basis. That is how one finds out how the oil is being lifted and transported. Those are genuine, basic, reasonable and effective ways in which one can know about our North sea oil. If the agency does not do that and does not trade in at least some participation oil, what we have been offered as an alternative to a national oil corporation is a pathetic, stripped-down substitute — yet another new quango serving a limited purpose.

The Minister did not give the figures, so I shall offer mine to the House and see whether he disagrees. These are the 1984 figures. Net after sale-back BNOC trades in about 800,000 barrels a day. I hope that the Minister will correct me if I have got the figures wrong. I had to do my own research, and I want to make sure that I am giving the factual statistics. BNOC trades in about 430,000 barrels a day of participation oil and about 260,000 barrels a day of royalty oil. It trades in about 175,000 barrels on a commercial basis, in voluntary commercial deals, often with the small independent oil companies and some quite large companies. That is about 850,000 barrels altogether.

[Mr. Ted Rowlands]

How many barrels will the Oil and Pipelines Agency trade in? The hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) also raised this matter. I understand that the agency will trade in royalty oil. Is that correct?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith indicated assent.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister nods in agreement.

Will the agency trade in 260,000 barrels a day of royalty oil? That was the point of my intervention, which was not minor or clever, but fundamental. Until about a year ago, quite a few of the large major oil companies had arrangements on sale-back of quite a large percentage of royalty oil in kind. Of the 260,000 barrels, about 160,000 barrels or so a day were sold back to the major oil companies, but they dumped it on the national corporation recently. They did not ask for the royalty in kind, so the royalty figure is now 260,000 barrels a day at its maximum. That is nearly a quarter of what BNOC trades in. The volume for security of supply is important. If the agency did not trade in 260,000 to 280,000 barrels a day, it would be worthless. It would be scarcely worth setting up. It would be an incredibly pale shadow if it were trading in a net figure of 100,000 barrels a day of royalty oil. One need not bother to do that. One would not get the people who felt any sense of commitment if they were to trade in such minimal amounts of oil. There would be no security of supply if the figure were down to 100,000 barrels a day.

When he winds up, perhaps the Minister will give us a clear undertaking and assurance that the agency will be a form of insurance policy, an organisation with a right to trade in oil, which will endeavour to give security of our supply, and trade in all royalty in kind. However, in itself that will not be much good because, as the Minister said, it is self-extinguishing. After two years royalty oil will drop rapidly and dramatically because we passed the Petroleum Royalties (Relief) Act 1983 to remove our royalty in the new fields. In six of the older fields, the Government did not elect to take royalty oil in kind anyway. After two years, the agency will dwindle as the royalty oil dwindles. How secure will our oil be then? An agency trading in royalty oil is supposed to be a new factor in ensuring our security of supply, but in three years' time it will be far less important.

The Minister also said that he would not allow the agency to trade in liquid petroleum gas. I find that statement astonishing. The Government are abolishing BNOC because of changes in the market and the movement from contract to spot price, but the curious feature of the LPG market is that it has not done that. It is still substantially a contract term price market. It also happens to be one of BNOC's most profitable businesses. Why should the agency be forced to turn its back on good profitable business which has helped to stabilise the market and has not manifested itself, like the crude market, by going dramatically from term and contract price to spot? Why should the agency not be allowed to trade commercially and profitably on BNOC's LPG contracts? The Minister said that the trade was not large, but 500,000 tonnes could be a profitable sideline. We shall return to that matter in Committee.

I do not think that the way in which the Government are establishing the agency will attract top people. The staff of BNOC deserve an assurance that nobody will be forced to transfer from BNOC to the Government's Oil and Pipelines Agency, or GOPA. It sounds about as good as it looks — cacophonous. Will proper redundancy and severance terms be negotiated with the staff? There should be no forced transfers from a good trading organisation which was respected and attracted first-class people to an agency which, unless we can beef it up in Committee, will be unable to attract anybody who is not second or third-rate because it will not have a meaningful function.

The only oil that the new agency will trade in will dwindle away, as will control of our oil, when North sea oil production begins to fall. Irrespective of the tremendous efforts that have been made with discovery and development, we now know that our oil supply will grow much tighter in the 1990s and that we shall be lucky to hold to self-sufficiency — and we shall have less practical control as a result of the Bill. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will join me in Committee in trying to give the Bill more substance and realism, especially with participation oil. Without an agency such as BNOC we shall have far less control over our oil supplies.

The Minister said that BNOC performed several other important functions. I shall not say much about the management of the pipeline as we shall be able to discuss that in Committee, but he mentioned other matters on which I have the right to ask for clarification. When asked about BNOC's role as a tax reference point and helping the oil tax office to tax oil companies, the Minister gave an astonishing reply. It was utterly unclear and contradicted a fundamental statement that he made on 18 December when he said:

"We must also ensure that there are some arms length sales at transparent prices."—[Official Report, 18 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 230.]

He then discussed other options. He must have been asked about the American posted price system, as he said that our market could not be compared to the American one and that we need something like BNOC to act as a tax reference point. We are now told that the oil tax office has been in conversation with the oil companies. How many oil traders has the oil taxation office got? How many people who really know the ins and the outs of the North sea oil regime, who know the score — the fiddles, arrangements, fixes and intricacies — of North sea production and development has it got?

As the Minister said so eloquently on 18 December, BNOC's value was that it relieved the oil taxation office of this sort of operational function. The Bill will lead—I choose my words carefully; those of the Minister were wholly inadequate — to loopholes and certainly tax avoidance.

The oil taxation office will depend heavily on the oil companies' information and published information. After all, I suspect that the authoritative Financial Times oil price statements depend on companies such as BP for their information. This Bill, in seeking to abolish BNOC and thus its role as a tax reference point through its pricing mechanism, will lead to considerable loopholes and tax avoidance, if not abuse.

The basic reason for abolishing BNOC concerns its price fixing and price stabilising role. Apparently, BNOC has failed to prop up prices. That is the ultimate sin in the Government's eyes and the only case that the Minister has made—the other arguments and issues are not affected by price. The Minister validated that in December. The Government's only case is that market conditions between December and March showed them that BNOC was unnecessary and irrelevant because it was unable to fix and stabilise oil prices any longer. I challenge the Minister to find that that was BNOC's primary function. It never was. BNOC played a role, but fixing and stabilising oil prices was never its primary function. I find it distasteful that BNOC should be abolished because of its failure to prop up prices at the Government's behest.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have never said that BNOC was used or that one of its purposes was to prop up prices. I said it had a role in a rising or falling market to try to avoid destabilisation. That is very different from the gloss which the hon. Member is trying to put on it.

Mr. Rowlands: We all heard the Minister and the modest disbelief on the faces of his right hon. and hon. Friends says it all. "Stabilising" is a euphuistic word; the Minister meant propping up the price. Indeed, he claimed it as a virtue that, although £65 million was spent in subsidies and grants to BNOC, one can discount most of that because, as a result of the propping up of the price, the Chancellor of the Exchequer collected more tax. I do not think that I have given an offensive or inaccurate description of what the Government are doing. In more ways than one, they actually stated it. The Minister claimed that the subsidy was not in effect very large because, as the price was kept up, the Chancellor collected more taxation and, overall, not much money was lost. Any reasonable person would say that the Government were propping up the price.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Indeed, it was stated in the debate in December that 75 per cent. of what was paid in Supplementary Estimates to keep the prices up was paid back directly through taxation.

Mr. Rowlands: That point was also made in the Select Committee. We can only conclude that the Government were in the business, last summer and again in January and February this year, of attempting to hold up the price—to stabilise it at a fairly high level.

In January and February this year, BNOC attempted to carry out that function not on its own judgment but at the direct behest of the Government. However, because it cannot now carry out that function, it is to be abolished. It is being abolished, the Government say, because, as a result of the apparent oil glut, there is a major shift towards the spot market and away from term contracts. Incidentally, one of the reasons for the flight out of term contracts with BNOC was that the Government would not let BNOC adjust its price in order to keep the contracts.

How permanent will the shift towards the spot market be? Even the Minister, when he made his abolishing statement on 13 March, dared not forecast with any confidence the permanent nature of the market change, even though it is the reason that the Government give for abolishing BNOC. I shall quote the Minister's words without interpretation or gloss. He said:

"This trend . . . is unlikely to be reversed in the near future."—[Official Report, 13 March 1985, Vol. 75, c. 305.]

BNOC is being abolished on the strength of the unlikelihood of another change in a trend in the near future. How spurious and shortsighted can an argument be? Can that be the sole basis and justification for abolishing an oil trading corporation?

No one would deny that there has been a shift in the market, or that it is necessary to adapt to change in market situations. Did BNOC not wish to do just that in January and February? Did not Mr. Goskirk and his team put to the Government specific proposals to relate the price to the market, and possibly even sensibly to reduce the percentage of participation oil that BNOC was taking? Those were sensible and pragmatic proposals to adjust to the changing market. BNOC wished to adapt to the market, but the Government prevented it from doing so. Scared of OPEC, and afraid of the fiscal consequences of lower prices, the Government asked BNOC to intervene and hold the price for longer than BNOC would have wished to do. BNOC could have adjusted both to price and participation volumes in a sensible and moderate way without destroying its other primary functions. The Government have made an appalling case for abolishing a major national corporation that until last summer had made a profit and to which, even though it was given subsidies and grants, the net payment was minimal.

I hope that the Minister will make a statement about the existing state of BNOC's finances. That was an astonishing omission from his speech. Has the £65 million done the trick? What was the net cost of the Government's intervention in BNOC last autumn and in the first three months of this year?

The Minister says that the Government are abolishing BNOC because it cannot affect the price or act in a stabilising role when the spot market is of such importance. He says that we must not risk a major destabilisation of prices. How will he now stop the price going through the floor? He believes that stabilisation was of vital importance, but now we have no way of combating the growing destabilisation of the market.

The Government enjoyed a good press on the day after their announcement on 13 March. OPEC did not respond. There was no immediate collapse of the price. A cosy glow surrounded the announcement. Last Sunday, and today, the situation did not and does not look quite so cosy. There is great potential for destabilisation of oil prices. The imbalance between capacity, production and demand is so great that destabilisation is quite likely. Nevertheless, the Minister does not have even a fig leaf now. He has made his case for stabilising the price. Whither now that policy? Whither now the price of oil? Whither now the Government's cherished goal of stabilising the prices?

There was no case for rejecting BNOC's modified proposals earlier this year. There is no case for abolishing BNOC on the basis of a trend in the market. It might be abolished for ideological reasons, but not for the spurious and specious reasons given by the Minister. The characteristic of the Government's approach to our oil industry is shortsightedness. The Minister's charm conceals considerable complacency. The Government are complacent and shortsighted about our oil and gas reserves. They are dangerously complacent about the security of our oil supplies. The Bill illustrates that complacency. It destroys our most sensible and practical instrument for ensuring sensible control over the destination of our own oil. The Opposition will vote against it tonight.

5.47 pm

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): I strongly welcome the Government's decision to wind up BNOC and to get out of oil trading on a substantial basis and out of what, for want of a better word, we may call price stabilisation. BNOC was never an effective organisation for stabilising prices. For better or worse, it may have fallen into a role in which it was believed to be able to make a contribution to price stability, but in due course, as my right hon. Friend has rightly argued, such effect on prices as it had began to tend towards instability.

Conditions in the oil market have changed totally and fundamentally, not just in connection with the move from scarcity to glut but in a structural way, since the early 1980s and late 1970s. We must construct a new policy to deal with those changed conditions. As my right hon. Friend knows—if I may strike one querulous note—I believe that we should have made this decision earlier. Conditions began to change in 1983, and were consolidated by the end of that year and the beginning of 1984. We might have saved ourselves some pain and grief by moving earlier. We could have saved ourselves some difficulties and some public money.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) covered the scene with knowledge and experience. He has followed these matters in great detail for a long time. I fully echo the hon. Gentleman's tribute to Mr. Goskirk and his team, who have done a very good job in increasingly difficult and ultimately virtually impossible circumstances. They deserve our congratulations and our full recognition of all that they have achieved.

Looking at the broad picture, I have no doubt that we are right to extricate ourselves from an oil price world scene that is admittedly ugly and will probably get uglier. In the past we were sucked into those difficulties, but now we may be able to stand a little aside from them. Nevertheless, we are bound to be affected because we are part of the world oil market.

My only question about the Bill is why, having taken the decision to disentangle us from the activities of BNOC as a major oil trader and having gone so to speak three quarters of the hog, has my right hon. Friend not gone the whole hog and ended the role of the successor organisation as a substantial oil trader or, at least, as an oil trader on a routine basis? The successor organisation will continue to trade royalty oil. I do not know whether the figure will be 250,000 barrels a day or less because of refunding arrangements. However, it remains an extremely large trading operation by oil trading standards.

The world oil conditions that we face today are completely new and wholly unrelated to anything that we faced six years ago, and I query whether we need to maintain a state oil trading operation of this size. I shall deal with the problem of security of supply about which the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney spoke at length shortly. It is quite separate from the question of trading.

To take royalty oil in kind has nothing to do with security of supply. It is perfectly true that in 1979 or early 1980 I decided that we should take royalty from the oil companies, not in cash, which was the previous arrangement, but in kind. At that time we were living in a world of major crises. Indeed, many oil-dry and oil-thirsty countries were in what can only be described as a state of panic. The far eastern buyers from Korea and Japan were ready to enter into contracts at almost any price named by the middle eastern producers under any conditions to secure access to oil. At that time the OPEC countries were producing about one third of the free world's oil needs. Now they produce much less than half of that. In that crisis atmosphere the decision was taken to take royalty oil in kind.

Those conditions do not prevail today. Of course, it is possible to paint a scene in which the world turns upside down and crises return, and we should prepare to meet that, if it comes. However, I do not see the need to continue with the royalty in kind arrangement. I think that my right hon. Friend the Minister said that that responsibility was to be exercised by the new agency. However, it is the Secretary of State who can decide whether to take the royalty oil in cash or kind. If it is to be taken in kind, we would be left with a small residual body, which could be activated if we ever needed to use the participation agreements again, but which would not be involved in the sizeable trading that is now proposed. I hope that my right hon. Friend or one of his colleagues will tell us why we are leaving the state in the oil trading business in these new conditions.

It is clear that in 1979 the threat of the participation agreements, rather than their practical use, helped to maintain conditions in the United Kingdom oil market, where we could get reasonable security of supply. However, as was said in a previous debate, there were problems. In the late 1970s, in less critical times, the fact that BNOC had entered into agreements overseas to supply oil which it had procured through participation later created rigidities and difficulties at the moment of crisis when we had to unscramble them. The hon. Gentleman's case that we should keep BNOC, not for price stability —I agree with him that stability of price was a function that grew on to BNOC later — but to keep the participation agreements active, with oil flowing in every direction, needs to be considered carefully in the light of our experience of 1979-80. We found that during quieter times too much of that hamstrung the United Kingdom Government and the needs of the United Kingdom market for oil.

Mr. Rowlands: Did not the right hon. Gentleman institute changes to create greater flexibility in BNOC's trading as a result of finding those rigidities and inflexibilities? Does he agree that it is important to have a volume of oil in order to redirect or divert a percentage of it? The smaller the volume of oil, the less chance one has of redirecting or rediverting a percentage of it back to one's own market.

Mr. Howell: I do not see it that way. Under present conditions one does not need to be involved in a large volume of oil trading to influence security of supply. The participation agreements remain on the books, the Energy Act 1976 is on the statute book, and in 1979 and 1980 we spent many days and nights developing the International Energy Agency and European Community trigger agreements. The European Community countries are far better equipped now to cope with the problems of a sudden interruption in oil supplies than they were then. In these conditions we are right to keep the participation agreements, but on the back burner.

It is particularly timely that the United Kingdom should withdraw from involvement in international arrangements to maintain high oil prices because the oil market is in an unhealthy state. Continued dabbling through BNOC and price stabilisation added to that. Although that has now stopped, it does not mean that everything will stabilise. On the contrary, we shall either see a steady and continuing decline in the international oil industry combined with sagging and soft prices, or a sudden collapse in prices. The latter is less likely than the former. There is about a one in four chance that that could happen.

That position is extremely dangerous. We are in that dangerous position for the simplest of economic reasons: the attempt to keep prices politically and artificially high has, as always, vastly stimulated additional production. Despite OPEC's attempts to keep to its quota, huge new non-OPEC oil supplies have come on stream and vast exploration has been stimulated throughout the world.

On the demand side, those high prices have produced massive incentives to cut demand. All the demand forecasts of the oil industry and of OPEC, even the recent ones of a year ago, have proved wholly wrong. This summer demand increased less than 1 per cent. on last summer, and that was after a year of colossal growth in the American economy. In 1973 the oil industry's forecast for the amount of oil that the world would use in 1985 was 100 per cent. wrong. For every two barrels that the industry forecast we would use in 1985, we are using one. Therefore, demand has fallen dramatically, alternatives have been dramatically developed, and OPEC has continued to produce at a fairly high rate. Although that rate is officially constrained, I have no doubt that a great deal of cheating and leakage goes on, so that all sorts of oil supplies are now swamping and surging into the Mediterranean market and creating a vast production overhang.

The latest developments on the Soviet side have not helped because it is now recycling much more oil into Western markets. Meanwhile we are beginning to realise that if we liberate the natural gas market in northern Europe, there will be a vast upsurge in the use of natural gas. That will undercut falsely priced oil even further. If we follow my right hon. Friend's plans to privatise the British Gas Corporation, as I hope we shall, the corporation, which will remain a large integrated organisation, will pursue vigorously its market strategy and vastly expand demand for its product. We shall see in Britain and throughout northern Europe a far greater incursion of natural gas into the oil market.

All those matters will inevitably create conditions in which the supply and demand of world oil will be in hopeless disequilibrium. As I said earlier, the only question is whether there will be a steady but awkward decline, with the international oil industry fighting to maintain its domination and, paradoxically, by its fighting, losing it, or whether the position will slide out of control completely and cause a major collapse in world oil prices.

In those conditions, we must think carefully, as a substantial oil producer, of how we would cope with a one in four chance of a collapse. We must think realistically about how we will manage our economy in the next 10 years, given that we are moving down from a peak of oil production—although much more gradually than people realise—and that there is an almost continual softening in the price. It is beginning even now. Each month, OPEC makes hopeful statements that oil prices will firm or that real prices will increase. Each month that passes, the opposite happens, and the oil price in spot markets is beginning to slide away to about $25 for Arab light. It will be $23 before long.

The price will probably not collapse, because many international and institutional forces have an interest in trying to prevent a collapse, but the alternative will be a steady downward drift. The projections from the oil companies of ever-increasing real oil prices are completely unrealistic in the new conditions. The domination which OPEC hoped to achieve has slipped out of its grasp, and its contribution to free world oil supplies has fallen from nearly 40 per cent. to less than 20 per cent.

In all those circumstances, it is entirely right that the North sea should stand apart from those developments, although Britain, as a producer and as a nation that relies on substantial oil exports, should prepare itself for the difficulties to come. As long as we were involved, we were blamed. Even now, I notice that as OPEC prepares for the inevitable, which is the next slide in oil prices of a dollar or more in a few weeks or months' time, it is working up the blame machine again. Although when my right hon. Friend announced the demise of BNOC there was remarkably little comment from OPEC, we are beginning to see some cross remarks in the newspapers to the effect that Britain is over-producing, has removed BNOC and is generally undermining the position. That is nonsense. We are not undermining the position; it has inherent undermining qualities built into it, which will remain until and unless OPEC and, to some extent, the international oil industry recognise the need to respond to market forces and allow oil to settle down again as a relatively low-cost source of energy in the world economic system. They damage themselves vastly by talking about how oil will be incredibly scarce, and the dangers and costs of production. The more they talk about scarcity, the more everyone designs oil needs out of their equipment — in everything from screwdrivers to skyscrapers. Therefore, the need for oil is gradually being designed out of the economic and industrial system.

That is the pattern, and I believe that we should stay well clear of it. My only sorrow is that our example has not been followed by the wiser minds in the middle east and other oil-producing countries, especially those in OPEC, which have not allowed market forces to enter the scene.

Conditions now are completely different from what they were in 1979. The pattern of oil production has changed radically, as has the pattern of demand. In those new conditions, we are right to adjust our policy, and I welcome what the Minister of State has done. Finally, I repeat that my only query concerns why we must remain in the oil trading business on a large scale at all.

6.4 pm

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): I will not follow the forecasts of the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) of what is likely to happen in the longer term to world production of and demand for oil, but I think that he is being remarkably complacent if he assumes that there will be no supply crisis in the future. I do not believe that that is the view of the Government, who are much more cautious in this matter, and who claim that the safeguards still available to them for security of supply are adequate. They do not argue that we need no safeguards. It would be an incautious and unwise Government who did not operate on the basis that we need safeguards, but I shall return to the security of supply later.

If the price of oil drops in real terms in the next five or 10 years, and even more so if it collapses, it would have serious implications for the United Kingdom economy. In 1985-86, apart from all the other considerations, such as the balance of payments and employment, the Government are assuming £13·5 billion in terms of tax receipts from North sea oil. Since 1979, the Government have been fortunate in the vast revenues that have come in from North sea oil. The great tragedy is that that revenue has been largely squandered. The right hon. Gentleman will agree with me on that. Our manufacturing industry has been debilitated since 1979. The Government constantly assure us that the economy is moving forward at a satisfactory rate, yet we have appalling unemployment, which is getting worse rather than better.

All this has happened in a period when we have had the uncovenanted advantage of North sea oil. The Bill is another example of the Government withdrawing from the oil business and abandoning any attempt to ensure that the industry is managed, developed and controlled in the national interest. The only interest of the Government—this is not irrelevant to what the Minister said—is to get production up to the maximum as quickly as possible for short-term financial advantage to the Exchequer. The Government do not have a depletion policy. In terms of security of supplies and the long-term future of the economy, the potential of North sea oil is being wasted.

The Bill is an example of withdrawing from the oil business, handing it over to private enterprise and assuming that, somehow or other, the national interest will be safeguarded. We can be sure that the national interest will not be safeguarded, because the oil companies, even in a crisis, are torn between their loyalty to the Government and their commercial interests. Experience has shown that commercial interests dominate their activities in a period of crisis.

My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) made an excellent and comprehensive speech. The case that he put is unanswerable. The arguments of the Minister of State were not convincing, especially when so many of them contradicted his arguments in the debate in December and in his evidence to the Select Committee on Energy in March. They changed the day the Government announced the abolition of BNOC.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney said, the Government's only case for the abandonment of BNOC is the changed circumstances of pricing. But that was never the primary purpose of BNOC. I hope that the Minister will attempt to answer the points that my hon. Friend made—although I believe those points to be unanswerable.

I am glad that the Minister said that the paper losses of BNOC over the past few months were no reflection on the competence and excellence of the BNOC staff. It is extraordinary that we are winding up an organisation that is constantly receiving these encomiums from the Government and everybody else for the excellent job it does.

On pricing, BNOC was operating under Government direction, as the Minister eventually, and reluctantly, agreed. If there were paper losses, they did not arise from the inefficiency of BNOC or policy decisions taken by it in the national interest. In fact, they arose from decisions taken by Ministers in what they considered to be the national interest — I do not seriously dispute their attitude to that.

I am not a member of the Select Committee, but I have read the report and it is difficult to understand what the Government were up to in that period. Was it an attempt to maintain the stability of prices for stability's sake, or were they concerned with the fiscal implications of a drop in oil prices? I suspect that the second consideration was rather more important to the Government than the first.

Included in the report of the Select Committee on Energy is a memorandum from the Department of Energy. It is speaking about the second half of 1984 when, despite the so-called losses, there was a net gain to the Exchequer from the way in which BNOC was operating under Government direction. The Department of Energy said in February:

> "In the particular circumstances in which BNOC's losses were made last year, they were more than offset by a higher level of tax revenue than would otherwise have been the case. That is because > (i) suppliers of oil to BNOC at the term price pay tax on that price. The average marginal rate of taxation is over 75 per cent. In circumstances where BNOC is able to sell more than approximately 25 per cent. of its oil at term prices, therefore, its losses on its remaining sales at lower spot prices will be less than the benefit to the Exchequer of suppliers to BNOC paying tax based on the higher term price. Those circumstances obtained throughout the second half of last year."

There was some financial sense in what the Government were doing in their directions to BNOC to prop up the price, which is what they were doing, despite all the talk about stability.

Labour Members accept that BNOC cannot prop up prices in this artificial way indefinitely, and perhaps should not do so at all. It was never the function of BNOC to operate in this way. Though I find it difficult to accept the proposition that this country, the fifth largest producer of oil in the world, has no influence on world prices. That would be an abandonment of responsibility. Again, the Government have not come clean on this.

It is difficult to understand exactly what the relationships are with OPEC and what discussions the Government had with OPEC and other countries. One of the major oil companies, Shell, in the memorandum that it presented to the Select Committee on Energy, took the view that BNOC could influence the world price of oil, although obviously this is one of many influences. I should not for one moment argue that BNOC's influence could be anything like the influence of the decisions, or non-decisions, of OPEC on either price or production.

Even if the circumstances of pricing had changed, that is not a case for the abolition of BNOC. There is no reason why BNOC could not operate on the basis on which it was operating before the Government asked it to prop up prices artificially when it did respond to market conditions.

It is extremely foolish and dangerous to say that, because circumstances have changed and present conditions are as they are, that will continue for ever, so there is no need for this organisation, even for pricing. However, the argument is not basically about pricing, although that is an important consideration. Security of supplies is bound to be the main consideration. Until recently not only was that not disputed by the Government, but they argued strongly, as my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney said, for the necessity to maintain BNOC for the sake of security of supplies in possibly dangerous situations.

We know that, under the Energy Act 1976, certain arrangements can be made only in a dire emergency. We are talking about a state of emergency being declared before the British Government, under the Energy Act, can take certain measures. Other measures can be taken under EEC arrangements and International Energy Agency arrangements, about which the Minister has spoken today.

The Minister's case was ludicrous. First of all, he spoke about reactivation of participation agreements. Perhaps the Minister will answer the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney about the requirement of six months' or 12 months' notice to reactivate the participation agreements. Are we assuming that we shall get notice of a crisis six or 12 months in advance? That has never happened before in this sector or any other sector of political and economic activity. Reactivation is not a satisfactory safeguard compared with the present arrangements under which BNOC is trading in participation oil on a massive scale. Our position is bound to be weakened if a crisis short of a declaration of a state of emergency should arise.

As to informal assurances from oil, product or marketing companies, I am sorry, but I doubt very much whether they are worth the paper on which they are written —if indeed they are written at all. Even that was not clear from what the Minister said. If they are not legally binding but are rather more than general expressions of good will, no doubt we shall get further information in the winding-up speech or in Committee. However, it is not sensible, on a matter of such importance, to rely on informal assurances from product or marketing companies in the oil sector.

It is a dereliction of duty on the part of Government to rely simply on such informal assurances. I had a limited experience at one time of the difficulties of oil supplies. Although my interest was marginal compared with that of my right hon. Friends, I did not as a Minister find the oil companies particularly helpful or accommodating. I have no reason to believe that they would be any better in the future than they were in the past.

Similar questions arise about taxation. We are talking about massive sums of money. If things go wrong, there will be a considerable loss to the Inland Revenue. The Minister acknowledged that it had been useful to have BNOC as a reference point in determining the appropriate prices for taxation arrangements when one was dealing not with arm's-length arrangements but with arrangements in which artificial pricing is commonplace. Artificial pricing is arranged in a way that benefits not the Inland Revenue but the potential taxpayer.

The fact that BNOC is involved in trading on a massive scale is bound to be of considerable benefit from the point of view of the oil taxation office. It contains a wealth of knowledge and day-to-day experience which will be lost if and when the Bill is enacted. BNOC is trading in many different brands of crudes, so the office has a yardstick by which to judge the market price. The price at which BNOC sells and, in certain circumstances, buys is the going rate. The major oil producers are also refiners. Therefore, they have an interest in depressing, for taxation purposes, the price of crude oil. It is on the crude price that the marginal rate of tax bites very heavily.

All the major oil companies have oil taxation departments staffed by highly skilled, professional people, many of whom are accountants. They are very well qualified to look after the interests of the oil companies. I do not criticise the oil taxation office when I say that, unless it is provided with information from inside, it cannot compete with that level of expertise. It can obtain that information now from BNOC, but in future it will be unable to obtain information on anything like the same scale, and after the royalty oil has run out it will be unable to obtain any information.

We are referring to considerable sums of money. If the price of oil is reduced by 1 per cent., the Exchequer will lose revenue amounting to £150 million. A 1 per cent. fiddling around with transfer pricing or a 1 per cent. difference between the reference price that the oil taxation office, properly informed, applies now and what will be applied in the new circumstances involves a considerable sum of money.

The Minister of State said that this matter will be taken care of because the Government will talk to the oil companies about it. How naive can one be? The oil companies are on the other side. They are, as they are perfectly entitled to do, looking after their own interests. Nice chats with the oil companies will not solve this problem. As recently as December 1984 the Minister acknowledged in a debate the worth of the BNOC.

Mr. Rowlands: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for allowing me to intervene. I wish only to underline his point that in 1984-85 petroleum revenue tax yielded an estimated or provisional £7·2 billion, while corporation tax yielded another £2·4 billion. Therefore, the odd loophole or slip-up in taxation could mean the loss of tens of millions of pounds, not just a few million pounds.

Mr. Millan: Yes. In that context we are dealing with the abandonment of an organisation which now employs 120 people. When the Bill is enacted it will employ only 40 people. These people are involved in a great many activities, all of which were profitable until the Government interfered with the pricing mechanism. Even that, from the overall national point of view, benefited the Exchequer. We are dealing with a small organisation that is operating in an area of activity where, if things go wrong, the Government can be taken to the cleaners for very large sums of money. It is astonishing that we should be debating the abolition of BNOC, for the reasons given about price changes, when all these other activities are of such immense advantage and importance to the country and the Exchequer.

I am a member of the trade union which is principally concerned with the staffing of BNOC—the Association of Professional, Executive, Clerical and Computer Staff. I was glad that the Minister of State referred to the fact that there had been a meeting with the general secretary of APEX, Mr. Grantham, at which I know certain assurances were given. However, the announcement came as a bolt from the blue.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith indicated assent.

Mr. Millan: The Minister of State is acknowledging that fact. There was no reason for the staff to believe that BNOC would be abolished. BNOC was recruiting up to the day of the announcement. Some of the staff have not been with BNOC for very long. They were recruited to work for what they believed to be a developing organisation with a long-term future. Therefore we must make sure that the staff are dealt with very generously.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney has already said, members of staff must be given freedom to decide whether they wish to be transferred to this much truncated and mutilated agency. It will have considerable difficulty, for obvious reasons, in attracting the highest quality staff. Its functions are to be severely reduced. Its oil trading functions will disappear completely, unless participation agreements should be reactivated. If such agreements they ever were, it is probable that nobody in the new agency would know how to trade in oil. I do not wish to deal in detail with the provisions relating to pensions, but those Opposition Members who will consider the Bill in Committee will wish to ensure that staff are dealt with fairly and generously, particularly bearing in mind the unexpected nature of the announcement about the winding up of the BNOC.

In conclusion, I repeat what I said a few moments ago. In the light of the various statements made by the Minister almost up to the date of the announcement, it is astonishing and extraordinary that the Government should be about to abolish the BNOC. It is a tragedy that an organisation which has done an extremely worthwhile job for the country is to be abolished. The national interest will be put at a considerable disadvantage.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): In his speech the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) beat his breast, called for pragmatism and then went on to deliver a speech which demonstrated a total ideological commitment to the continuation of another state interventionist body. I do not criticise him for that; he has always stuck to that approach. The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) implied that the only way in which some degree of control can be maintained over the oil industry—he did not use the words "the wicked oil industry", but that was the phrase used in years gone by — is through some form of British National Oil Corporation. The Department of Energy, through the powers that it wields by means of the licensing rounds, exerts a very much greater degree of control and discipline. The threat that participation agreements might be reintroduced would bring to heel any oil company that was thinking of trying to get round any form of taxation. Therefore, the right hon. Member's arguments are irrelevant in the context of this Second Reading debate.

When the House last debated the role of BNOC on 14 March 1985, the only Opposition Front Bench spokesman who was present was the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney. This is surprising, in view of the outraged indignation of the Opposition the previous day when my right hon. Friend the Minister of State announced the abolition of the BNOC. Someone referred to it being a fight involving tooth and nail. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman would class himself as the tooth or the nail.

The fact is, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) has made clear, the Government are now right to call an end to the expensive game of playing with world oil prices. I am one of those who have in the past given qualified support to the role of BNOC as a price stabilising force and a means of ensuring a degree of security of supply to Britain in the event of a crisis. In my speech in the debate on 18 December I referred to the ever-present possibility of such a crisis of supply and I mentioned in particular the Iraq-Iran war as a potential threat. I also mentioned the coal dispute and our dependence on the much higher oil-burn in our power stations. It was the security of oil supply rather than the trading influence of BNOC which attracted my guarded support, and all the evidence of recent months points to the irrelevance of that trading role.

When spot oil prices were rising in the period up to spring 1983, BNOC was able to establish a good reputation as a shrewd trader in the volatile spot market following the Iran revolution. But when prices began to fall dramatically it became obvious that the role of BNOC in trying to set marker prices for oil had become impossible and large losses developed. The effect on oil prices of BNOC's intervention became less obvious. In my speech on 18 December I said:

> "I do not believe that BNOC or the Government have any illusions about their power to determine or influence oil prices in other than the most limited or marginal way."—[Official Report, 18 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 221.]

I said that the BNOC price card could be used only occasionally and with diminishing effect as we moved from contracted sales to a large spot market. It is interesting, looking at the figures, to see that the spot market has increased from 500,000 barrels a day in 1979 to over 6 million barrels a day in 1984.

Therefore, I do not mourn the passing of BNOC's increasingly ineffective role. Indeed, looking at recent events, where we see a continuing shift from contract oil sales to the spot market as a sign of things to come in what everyone would agree is an oil surplus world market, I can foresee the continuation of those particular pricing problems. I welcome the Government's decision although I pay tribute to the work of the BNOC's staff during a difficult trading time.

It is with security of supply that I want to deal tonight. When I served on the Committee dealing with the original Petroleum and Submarine Pipe-lines Bill in 1975 with my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford, the argument deployed by Conservative Members, who were then in opposition, was that we did not need the extensive BNOC interventionist role in the North sea. We argued for the combination of a proper tax regime and some kind of mechanism for ensuring security of supply in the event of an emergency. We did not support the creation of a vast BNOC organisation.

That is where we finish up again now. I fully accept the assurances of my right hon. Friend the Minister that security is and will be maintained through agreements with the refining and marketing companies because they are the companies which supply the British customer. I also agree with the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney that it would be extremely useful for us to have more detail of those assurances because that would satisfy the House.

I welcome the assurances of my right hon. Friend the Minister and also his explanation of the powers contained in the Energy Act 1976. It ensures that over two years stocks of oil will be maintained if an oil supply shortage of some 7 per cent. develops. I understand that that has never happened and is unlikely to happen, but it is a precaution which can be triggered in the event of a world crisis.

As I understand it, the agency will still handle royalty oil of some 250,000 barrels a day and will retain the right to buy up to 51 per cent. of all North sea production, but only, as it says in the Bill, if there is some threat to the security of our United Kingdom oil supplies.

I would be grateful for more information on the definition of that threat to United Kingdom oil supplies. Who will decide what triggers off that threat? The International Energy Agency deals with world situations which became patent and easy to determine. What happens when there is a threat to the United Kingdom, not of the magnitude of a world crisis but which necessitates some action being taken to put into effect the assurances which my right hon. Friend the Minister has proclaimed we shall have from the oil trading companies and refineries? We need to know who will decide the nature of that crisis if we are concerned about security of supplies. Will it be a Cabinet decision based on advice from the Department of Energy or through consultation with a specific oil industry committee or association?

With regard to royalty oil, the agency has, I understand, the power to sell the 250,000 barrels a day or to contract out the selling. Under what circumstances would it choose between those two roles? How and what would influence its decision?

On 14 March my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) expressed reservations about the retention of that royalty oil. My right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford also mentioned that. I, too, would like a little more explanation as to exactly why that power is being retained for the agency, and also about the continuation of participation agreements. As has been pointed out, they take a long time to spark off. In the event of a crisis, the mechanisms would take some time to take effect. I would concede that more direct means of securing oil supplies for Britain would be used. In fact, we have seen that done by other European nations. In the 1979 crisis we seem to have produced longer queues and greater shortages than anywhere on the Continent where more direct methods were used. I suspect that that will happen again unless we are clear how to ensure supplies to the British consumer.

The fact that we had BNOC in 1979 does not convince me that BNOC is the answer to security of supply. The Continental countries used their own more direct methods of ensuring that they got supplies to the consumer. However, I am not over concerned about the retention of those powers in the Bill. If they help to secure all-party support for the Bill, that is fine.

We live in an uncertain world with regard to energy and oil supplies. As has been pointed out, prices are on the slide again and, with OPEC increasingly unable to control its members' production levels, the short-term points to slack demand and a glut of oil. That should mean lower world energy prices and a falling dollar, both liable to benefit world trade and to create jobs. However, that will not necessarily help the oil-producing countries. We already see strains developing in OPEC with wild accusations being leveled at countries such as ourselves and Norway for maximising our production.

If we look a little further into the crystal ball—a dangerous thing to do in relation to energy—we see both Russian and American oil production beginning to turn down. The United States has produced some recent estimates of recoverable reserves which show a steep downward trend. In fact, the estimates of offshore oil reserves are now 55 per cent. lower than the 1981 estimate of offshore oil in the United States. The Alaskan reserve estimates have now dropped even more dramatically and are 73 per cent. lower than in 1971 following a succession of unsuccessful exploration wells.

At some time in the future, probably still a long way ahead, we may be heading back to the inevitable dependence once again on middle east oil and all that that entails. Those considerations must be borne in mind when planning Britain's future. The world will still be dependent to a large extent on oil, but the limited duration of the levels of consumption that we are used to will become more obvious. In that context, I believe that we need to maintain this agency with its limited security of supply powers. I believe that we are right to take the steps that we have to remove once and for all the farce of the oil trading pricing which has caused such losses to the British taxpayer.

I fully support the Bill, and I hope that the House will give it a Second Reading.

6.40 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): In one sense the announcement of the Bill was a surprise, but in another sense it was not. I have been looking back to what I said on 18 December 1984 about the confusion that reigned then within BNOC:

> "I suspect that people working at the British National Oil Corporation have even less idea what the Government's policy is and are being left in confusion about what is being expected of them."—[Official Report, 18 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 209.]

I suppose the only good thing that they can say about the Bill is that at least they are no longer in confusion, but unfortunately some of them are left looking for alternative employment.

It is logical that, having emasculated the integrated state oil corporation and attempted to use BNOC in a way that, as hon. Members on both sides of the House have acknowledged, it was never intended to be used in the first place, the Government have decided to get rid of the embarrassment of BNOC finally and for all and simply replace it with an agency. In the context of other things that the Government are doing, I find that slightly ironic. The Government most of the time seem to be trying to suggest that Government agencies should be transferred to public corporations, whereas in this case, for obvious reasons, they are having to do the reverse.

Once the Bill goes through, either a vacuum or an opportunity will be created. I suggest to the Minister that it is time the Department of Energy took advantage of an opportunity rather than continued with the present state of drift. I do not think that I am the only person in the House or outside who remains puzzled as to exactly what Government policy is in the context of further development of the North sea and, indeed, North sea oil production and pricing.

Let us first consider oil pricing. The general contention in the debate is that we have a glut, a soft market, and that the price of oil is falling. It is down to about $25 and, depending on how optimistic or pessimistic one is, it could well drop below $25. The Government's response to that apparently is: "That is the way things happen, it is nothing to do with us, we will just have to live with it," even though a few months ago they were clearly using BNOC at least to try to offset some of that effect.

It is a little naive for a country that produces 2·8 million barrels of oil a day to suggest that we have no influence on the market price. I freely accept that we are not the major influence, but it is absurd to continue to suggest, as the Government do, that there is no influence that the Government or the United Kingdom can have on the market price.

It is interesting to note in the context of OPEC that it has long been recognised that helping to determine prices cannot be separated from production. It would be nice to hear from the Government some coherent idea of what in their view North sea oil production is, could be or should be.

Perhaps I should remind the House that there was an agreement some years ago, when we were building up the production of the North sea, that we should aim for self-sufficiency. It was not a particularly scientific objective or one that was worked out on the basis of a great debate, yet a sort of consensus emerged that we might just as well go for something like self-sufficiency.

We are now producing 2·8 million barrels a day, something like 30 per cent. more than our domestic consumption. This is way past the original objective. We have gone through this figure without any reassessment of what we are doing or why we are doing it, and it appears that we are continuing to do so.

Mr. Michael Portillo (Enfield, Southgate): Is the hon. Gentleman advocating that we should now cut our oil production? Is that official Liberal party policy?

Mr. Bruce: I certainly think that we should be considering whether 2·8 million barrels a day of maximised oil production is in the best long-term interest of the nation. I freely admit that the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party are discussing whether some constraint on production would be sensible in the national interest. That is not a definitive statement of policy—it is not determined—but we think that it is an important question, and one to which the Department of Energy should address itself but has so far refused to do so.

The third item which has been much discussed is security of supply. The argument appears to be that we have a surplus of production, that supply is not a major problem and that therefore there is no need for any special measures. I accept the point of the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) that, in an emergency, legislation may be necessary rather than a long participation agreement. However, the Government cannot simply argue that, because the existing set-up does not provide adequate protection, they will get rid of it with no clear alternative. What we heard from the Minister of State was less than satisfactory. Some of his assurances were less than specific, and may or may not be valuable when the crisis comes.

It is not inappropriate, in suggesting that it is time for the Department of Energy to grasp some of the opportunities, to recognise that we have gone for a level of production in the North sea and that we have achieved that level. No hon. Member would wish to decry the considerable achievement by all those who have been involved in getting that far, but it is accepted that the investment in the industry in the next 15 years will exceed the total investment to date in the North sea since the first well was drilled. One wonders, observing the attendance in the Chamber and in the Strangers' Gallery, whether the nation is aware of the opportunities that still exist and whether the Government are failing in their duty to point out the scale of those opportunities and, indeed, to try to ensure a greater British involvement.

It is a matter of deep and continued disappointment to me that major companies such as ICI and GEC fail to have a significant stake in the technological development of the North sea and the opportunities that that brings. I should like to think that companies with substantial cash mountains might use them to increase our involvement in the technology in the industry.

Once the Government have swept away all the things that they have inherited from the Labour Government, which I understand they dislike for ideological reasons and want to see the back of, they should recognise that they have created a situation which is unlikely to be in the best interests of the United Kingdom market or, indeed, of the United Kingdom consumer. They have created a vacuum into which it is time they made a positive input. The accumulation of what the Government have done in the last five years suggests that they have a policy not to have a policy. Effectively, they are drifting about aimlessly without coming up with a constructive idea on how to ensure that, in the next 15 years, Britain's interest in pricing and production of our energy resources is maximised, with the maximisation of the industrial opportunities that arise therefrom, in a way that regrettably has not occurred in the last 15 years. [Interruption.]

I hear groans from a Conservative free marketeer, off stage, as it were. Nevertheless, I suggest that the Government should recognise that producing at the rate that we are doing, without taking account of the need to assess our national interest, is not a very responsible thing to do. Many people would recognise that it is not the Department of Energy that is running our energy policy; it is the Treasury. Indeed, there is a short-term objective to maximise oil production in order to get revenues to meet the short-term needs of the Government's public sector borrowing requirement and, indeed, perhaps their taxation measures.

If that is the case—I think that many hon. Members believe that it is—it might be more honest to admit it. I do not believe that that is the best long-term objective for the country. We need further sensible development. It is a balance, and I freely accept that we want to ensure that the market operates as effectively as it can. But we are not so naive as to ignore the effects of OPEC or of our production and our ability to influence price, and nor are we so naive as to fail to recognise that the Government could and should be doing considerably more to ensure that there is a reasonable policy.

The Government are sweeping away the last vestiges of what they inherited, but they have offered no alternative policy other than the free operation of the market—something that many people recognise is not, on its own, sufficient to ensure the best interests of North sea oil.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Government's policy can be likened to that of a farmer with a barn full of corn, who, instead of planting some of the seeds for next year's crop, decides to sell the lot?

Mr. Bruce: I appreciate the point of the hon. Gentleman's intervention. Indeed, I was about to make the link to substantiate my point about Treasury domination of the Department's supposed strategy or lack of policy. The Department announced last week that it would sell British Gas at a yield of about £6 billion to £9 billion. For a Government dominated by someone who gives us homilies about good housekeeping, to do that simply to sustain current expenditure is not responsible.

The Government's objective is to maximise production from the North sea, not because it is the best policy in the long term, not because the price is right to get the best return, and not because it will provide the maximum opportunity for British industry to become involved—reasons that might be defensible—but simply to produce revenue to sustain the Government's economic strategy. It has nothing to do with good energy policy or good management of resources.

We should reconsider the production level and look to the next 20 years. We should take the opportunity to ensure that production is paced at a level that gives the maximum long-term benefit to the United Kingdom economy and the maximum long-term opportunity to British industry. There is no evidence that the Government propose to do that. While we can understand the purpose behind the Bill, the Minister should recognise that, if he does nothing but produce it, he will create a vacuum. He should take advantage of the opportunity provided.

My hon. Friends and I feel that this tidying-up operation might as well be completed, but only because of the way the Government have gone about it. The Labour party is, to some extent, defending something that it created, but which has outlived its full usefulness——

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Why?

Mr. Bruce: Because of the steps that the Government have taken and because BNOC's record in recent months has shown that it cannot fulfil a considerable function, given the Government's constraints.

If the Government think that they can get away with abolishing BNOC and carrying on with their policy of not having a policy, the people of this country will recognise that they have squandered the only asset that stands between us and bankruptcy and have failed to take advantage of the long-term opportunity that it should and could present both for the economy and for industrial opportunity.

I urge the Minister to look beyond the Bill and give us some indication of how he sees the way forward to ensure a sensible, positive energy policy—something which, I regret, he and his colleagues have never attempted to bring before the House.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): Having listened to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), I confess that I am more confused than ever about Liberal party policy. His speech criticised the Government for not having an energy policy, and I pricked up my ears and hoped that he would offer us an alternative policy—but nothing materialised. He offered only some rather vague views about the need to limit oil production in the interests of the British economy. He gave no specific reasons why that should be done and how best to do it.

I spent last weekend yet again offshore—this time looking at some of Britoil's operations in the Moray Firth and the Beatrice field—and saw some of the enormous economic benefits that have spread throughout Scotland, both onshore and offshore, as a result of the enormous investment that continues to take place. I should be surprised if there were many citizens north of the border who would welcome any artificial Government intervention to curtail development or, even worse, to cut production of existing fields.

To suggest that displays an extraordinary lack of knowledge of the economics of the oil industry. Long lead times are involved in developing a field, and once the investment has been made it is necessary to get back that money quickly if the company is to stay alive and if it is to build up the cash required to make preparations for the next investment. The country cannot afford a policy of depletion that would delay development of the smaller marginal fields, which are primarily the reserves still to be exploited. We cannot afford any hold-up or disincentive that would prevent investment in fields that will be marginal in reserves and profitability.

If that is what the Liberal party is suggesting, it will not only be extremely damaging for the offshore supply industry and all the employment and economic wealth that that creates, it will not only be extremely damaging for the oil industry itself, it will be disastrous for the economy and for the revenue from oil at a time when we must survive a major structural reorganisation in our society. We are faced with huge unemployment that has resulted from our not making ourselves more competitive and thereby not competing effectively with a world that has already developed the high technology industries that we are still trying to develop.

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman is suggesting that there should be no depletion policy until we begin to run down production. He is implying that the maximum production objective of the oil companies is automatically in accord with the national interest. He must acknowledge that many of the fields have had the full capital return, so most fields could handle a small cut in production. However, I agree that the new fields must be encouraged.

Mr. Rost: I am not prepared to argue that there is not some case for what the hon. Gentleman calls a depletion policy. However, the Select Committee considered that a year ago and did not reach that conclusion. It decided that we do not know whether we need a depletion policy because we do not know the extent of the reserves. The first objective must be to explore more thoroughly the extent of the reserves before we decide whether we need a depletion policy.

It is all very well to say that we must conserve oil because we might need it in 20 or 30 years—which would be a valid argument if we had only 20 or 30 years of reserves—but we do not know the extent of our reserves. We have licensed only about 10 per cent. of the acreage. There are large areas of potential oil-bearing acreage, some of which is coming out in the ninth round, but a great deal of which is being hoarded by the Department for future licensing. Until we have a clear assessment of reserves, and until the annual books on reserves begin to take a more comprehensive view as a result of more thorough explorations, we just do not know our reserves. Even with modern technology, we cannot know until we have drilled exploratory wells. There must be a great deal more drilling before we have the answer.

[Mr. Rost]

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that, at that stage, if we find that there is nothing much left there may be some justification for a depletion policy. If I pursue this theme, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will no doubt rule me out of order.

The purpose of my contribution was to welcome the Bill and to express perhaps a little disappointment that Opposition Members have made rather spurious arguments about security of supply their main objection to the Bill. I want to deal with some of the laboured and unconvincing points put forward by Opposition Members, particularly the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands). He made heavy going of the argument about security of supply, if I may say so without disrespect to him because I admire his depth of knowledge and his contributions on these matters. I have learnt a great deal from him in my humble efforts to gain an understanding of this difficult subject.

Reference has already been made to the power that the Government have under the Energy Act 1976. Therefore, it seems strange to suggest that there is any risk to security of supply in an international emergency when, so far as I am aware — I have considered many offshore installations and platforms—the pipelines come to the United Kingdom and do not go anywhere else. Therefore, it seems absurd to try to argue that we would be in danger of losing supplies in an international emergency when the stuff has to be landed in the United Kingdom.

Of course, we export oil but it comes to the United Kingdom bases first. Some of it is moved direct from the oil platforms into tankers, but very little. Most of it comes by pipeline to bases such as Sullom Voe and it is from those bases that it is shipped abroad. The logistics make the Opposition argument ridiculous. If we were faced with an international crisis with a potential shortage of oil, I cannot see that we would be in danger of losing the supply because it has to be landed here anyway.

Even if the oil companies were not prepared to be co-operative—a ludicrous argument in itself—the logistics are such that the Government could easily use whatever force was required to insist that the oil landed here stayed here, even if there was not time for legislation.

Mr. Barron: In regard to the landing of offshore energy assets, does the hon. Member think that we should not alter the position whereby all energy has to be landed in this country before it can be exported?

Mr. Rost: I do not follow the point that the hon. Member is making. If he is suggesting that all energy should be landed in this country before it is subsequently exported, I cannot see the relevance of that argument.

Mr. Barron: To be more specific, does the hon. Member think that gas and oil from the United Kingdom continental shelf should be landed in this country before they can be exported?

Mr. Rost: That is the hon. Gentleman's argument. It is his party that says that we need security of supply. I do not accept the argument that all reserves from the United Kingdom shelf should be landed in this country first because I do not regard it as essential to do that to secure adequate supplies, as we have a surplus. In any case, most of it is landed here; it has to be landed here simply because it is marketed in this country.

Mr. Rowlands: Can the hon. Member tell us what piece of legislation, other than the Energy Act 1976 which includes the last-resort power of declaring a national emergency, allows a Government to ban the export of oil? So far as I know, the United States has a law forbidding the export of oil, but we do not. If the hon. Member is saying that the best way to secure oil supplies is to land them here and have legislation which allows the Government to stop them being exported, we can discuss that, but we do not have such a law, as the hon. Member knows.

Mr. Rost: If the hon. Member had allowed me to develop my argument, his intervention might have been irrelevant. To give him an immediate response, I am not sure what sort of catastrophe he visualises, but he has been here much longer than I have and surely he knows that in an emergency the nation unites and even opposite parties unite in Parliament. It would not take many minutes or hours for the necessary legislation to be passed as emergency legislation. It has been done before. There would be a consensus on such an issue. In that extremely hypothetical case, if it were felt that the oil companies could no longer be trusted to keep the oil in this country, emergency legislation could be introduced quickly.

The hon. Member's heavy-going argument about security of supply was also nonsensical because surely he knows that we import a high proportion of the oil that we consume. We import heavy crude, mostly from the middle east, because it is more suitable for burning in power stations and for some of our oil refineries. We export the bulk of our high quality North sea oil. There is an enormous two-way trade. Therefore, it is nonsensical to argue that we need our own oil for security of supply when basically we depend upon continued imports from the middle east. If those imports were to be shut off, it would be undesirable for us to export our own oil, but in the meantime our supplies depend upon the two-way trade. That point should be borne in mind.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney made a valid point that I support——

Mr. Rowlands: I am surprised if that is the sum total of the great demolition job that the hon. Member wanted to do on our arguments. If we do not need BNOC to ensure security of supplies, why does a vehement privateer and free marketeer such as the Chancellor of the Exchequer accept that argument? He accepted it when supporting the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982. As well as being my view, it was the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Rost: The hon. Member has again jumped the gun. I was just about to support his argument in his speech this afternoon, even at the risk of embarrassing my own Front Bench. I was about to say that, while the hon. Member did not have a strong argument for saying that we need BNOC in its old form to ensure security of supply, he had a powerful argument when he reminded the House that Ministers, particularly my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, who opened on behalf of the Government, as late as last December were arguing that we need BNOC to maintain security of supplies. I do not want to embarrass my right hon. Friend by quoting evidence that he gave to me and several others on the Select Committee on Energy as recently as last December.

However, I will quote him, not to embarrass him but because I wish to develop the point. I asked my right hon. Friend:

"Do you believe BNOC has an on-going role to maintain security of supply?"

He replied:

"Yes, I do."

Later, in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), my right hon. Friend said:

"BNOC has a very important role in relation to participation agreements and in relation to security of supply. Therefore, I believe that there are important and continuing functions of BNOC."

I appreciate why my right hon. Friend's view has changed since December. Perhaps he has not convinced Opposition Members in the way that he should of the need for that change of view. He might tell them, for example, that circumstances have changed considerably since December. If he wishes to persuade Opposition Members of his need to change his view about the future role and usefulness of BNOC, he need only give more credit to the Select Committee than he gave today. Although my right hon. Friend was generous about the two Select Committee reports on BNOC, he might have said that the Select Committee had been instrumental in allowing him to see more clearly that BNOC had become irrelevant. I am sure that hon. Members in all parts of the House would then readily acknowledge that only outstanding Ministers have clarity of vision.

It would be an ideal opportunity for my right hon. Friend to get out of what some might suggest could be an embarrassing spot, bearing in mind the quotations that could be thrown at him from as recently as last December, when he was doing his best to justify the continued existence of BNOC — that is, until March, when he announced that it would be scrapped.

It is honourable and respectful for Ministers to do little U-turns when they realise that a change is justified. Indeed, if Governments and civil servants admitted the error of their ways more readily, we would have better government. That is preferable to going to the barricades in defence of a position which the Government held previously, just because they held it previously, even if the circumstances have dramatically changed. The situation has changed dramatically and BNOC is now an irrelevance, even if there was some doubt about it six months ago.

Mr. Rowlands: Why is it an irrelevance?

Mr. Rost: The main reason for its being an irrelevance came to light as a result of the recent instability in the price of oil. Last autumn it was obvious that BNOC, far from helping to stabilise the oil price, was an embarrassing contribution to its instability.

Mr. Barron: How?

Mr. Rost: BNOC's enormous volume of oil, which it had to sell because of its obligation to sell it, contributed to the collapse in the Rotterdam spot price. That has not been contradicted by anybody, even if it cannot categorically be proved. The logic of the situation supports that argument.

The spot market is extremely volatile and those who deal in it expect sharp fluctuations. The volume of trading on that spot market has increased, and a good proportion of that increase has been due to BNOC's forced sales. The Government realised, as a result of that experience, that BNOC, despite its capable and conscientious management, was not the best equipped organisation to deal with such a volatile market situation.

In saying that, I do not in any way criticise the management of BNOC. I have the highest respect for those concerned. But BNOC was not set up with the facilities to trade in a difficult, volatile market situation. Trading on long-term contracts at fixed prices was a process in which BNOC did a good job. Trading in a minute-by-minute fluctuating market, such as the Rotterdam market, was an exercise for which BNOC was not equipped.

Compared with oil companies, BNOC did not have the cash resources to do other than sell the oil almost the moment it received it. It did not have the storage facilities that oil companies have. Not only do the oil companies have enormous pipelines but, through their organisation upstream and downstream, they can absorb large quantities of oil by way of their refineries, and they do not have to sell oil on any one day unless it suits them. They can use their storage facilities to adjust to market conditions.

BNOC, with a volume of 800,000 barrels a day, was incapable of doing that. It was, therefore, a forced seller. It was under pressure to deal in the spot market, even when that market was moving in a way unreceptive to forced sales. The Government realised that, and certainly the taxpayers realised it because they were faced with the inevitable losses of that operation.

If my right hon. Friend applies that argument in defence of the Government's change of policy between December and March, he will be adopting a respectable stance, and I am sure that the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney would accept that argument. The Select Committee report simply emphasised the nonsensical situation in which we found ourselves in the changed market circumstances. BNOC was not able to adjust to that change and became a costly irrelevance.

Mr. Rowlands: The change of policy took place within a shorter period than December to 13 March. When the Minister gave evidence on 6 March he sung the same song that he had sung in December. In other words, the conversion was within seven days, from 6 to 13 March.

Mr. Rost: The hon. Gentleman is being even more unkind than I was to my right hon. Friend. I deliberately did not quote the Select Committee's proceedings of March. I thought that December was bad enough. What happened in December, it might be said, set in motion the Government's change of policy. Although by March the Government had accepted that BNOC's structure would have to be changed, until that announcement had been made publicly it would have been difficult for the Minister to have pronounced on the matter to the Select Committee. It was made clear in March that the position was under review, and we know the result of that review.

My main arguments are that the Government are right to pursue this legislation; that even if we were not in a position to say so publicly last December or a little later, we realised that the situation for BNOC had changed; that security of supply is no longer a valid argument — it never really was — and should not be pursued against this legislation; and, above all, that BNOC, far from contributing to price stability, has contributed to price instability.

Under the new agency arrangement, there is a genuine prospect of more orderly oil marketing. It will not just benefit the oil companies; it will benefit the tax that we collect from them and the nation. It is rather stupid to suggest that the oil companies do not have the maximum incentive and motivation to find the best market and to sell their oil at the highest possible prices. Of course they do, and they will achieve that because they are better equipped to do so than BNOC. Even the smaller companies operating in the North sea should obtain a good deal from this proposal. A variety of markets will be available to them. A co-operative agency may be established. Some of the larger companies which have marketing organisations and refineries may be happy to co-operate with the smaller companies. There do not seem to be any problems there. There is no justification for retaining the BNOC's marketing operation.

I welcome the clause that provides for an annual report on the operation of the agency to be presented to the Minister and to Parliament. That is an important monitoring system. I am sure that we shall all study the annual report with great interest.

I welcome the fair redundancy terms that have been offered to the management and the staff. It would be unjust if they were to be penalised for an inevitable and sensible change in policy which came at short notice. I, and I am sure the House, hope that undue hardship will not be caused to the staff and that many people will change to the new agency or find alternative employment for their undoubted skills elsewhere in the industry.

A large volume of royalty oil will be retained and marketed by the new agency. We should not lose sight of the fact that we are talking about a large quantity of oil —about 250,000 barrels a day, which is about one third of what BNOC handles daily at present. That is the equivalent to the full production of four or five medium-sized North sea oilfields.

The House will want an assurance, if not tonight then in Committee, as to how the new agency will handle that amount of oil and the criteria that will be used to ensure that it sells oil in the most commercial way. Will it contract out to expert marketing companies in the oil industry or will it try to market the oil itself as BNOC has done? What monitoring will there be, apart from the annual report, to ensure that the marketing is being done in the most cost-effective way? That is an important point, which has not yet been covered in the debate.

I welcome the legislation. Last December, when the taxpayer was asked for a substantial subsidy to pay for some of BNOC's losses, the Financial Times described BNOC as a "busted flush", and said it was time that it was finally capped. That was more a reflection of the comments that the oil industry was making about BNOC than an editorial comment. That might be unkind to BNOC, but at least the Government have faced up to the realities of the changed circumstances in the oil world and in the economics of the marketing and pricing and the supply and demand of oil. The Government having accepted that, the House would be ungracious not to support them.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): I listened attentively to what the hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) said. One or two of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) in an intervention related to the Minister's non-conversion. On 6 March 1985, in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), the Minister said:

> "I think one has to look back at the basic purposes of BNOC and whilst it is true that one of the objectives of BNOC is of course to trade profitably, there are also a number of other functions which make it different from a company in the private sector. It has, and this has been spelt out at different times, responsibility for example towards security of supplies; it has responsibility for maximising the benefit to the United Kingdom economy, and given those different roles that it has—another one is that it does provide evidence of arm's length prices so far as taxation is concerned, and this was made clear in the Treasury evidence to the Committee—I do not think it is possible to make a direct comparison between the role of BNOC and the role of the private sector company. Where the role of BNOC is particularly different is when it takes account of the wider public interest, and that is why, before proposals are made on BNOC prices, there is this recognised procedure of consultation between BNOC and the Government, because it is the Government that provides this wider national interest before final decisions are taken."

Amen to that. The Minister was giving evidence to the Select Committee of which the hon. Gentleman is a member. The hon. Gentleman must have heard or read that evidence.

The Minister has argued today that BNOC must be abolished because it has no role to play. We are told that BNOC will cease to be a trader. Will it? The right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), a former Secretary of State for Energy, said that the agency will not cease to be an oil trader because it will still have royalty oil. What price, if any, is it proposed to set for that? The agency will have anything between 5 million and 7 million tonnes of royalty oil a year. I know that the figure is diminishing, but by any standards that is a substantial quantity of oil to have at one's disposal. I am not tempting the Minister to help me avoid reselection, but I should not cavil at being told that I would have a substantial amount of oil at my disposal.

We are in a unique position because, if we take the Brown Book's figures, we have reached the peak years of North sea production, according to the Government's estimates. I do not argue with that. We shall produce anything between 120 million and 135 million tonnes of oil a year. We expect production to decline. We are also told, if we believe the press—I do not know whether the Minister can enlighten us on this—that this year this nation is producing the equivalent of Saudi production. Saudi Arabia has, of course, huge reserves.

Conservative Members say, "What would the Labour party do about depletion policy?" As the Irishman said, "How would you get to Ballymena?" The answer is, "Not by starting here." I do not believe that a Labour Government would have been so greedy for oil revenues that they reached this level of production. This Government have had a profligate policy towards exploiting our North sea resources.

I shall go back a little to show how inadequate Conservative policy has been. Before 1973, the Conservative Government did not have a proper tax regime in place. They said that they would introduce such a regime, but they never did. They left the matter to the oil companies, saying, "The oil companies know best." I have never considered that to be a correct view of the national interest. The Public Accounts Committee pushed the Conservative Government into making decisions with regard to a tax regime. A Labour Government introduced a proper regime for the taxation of North sea oil.

Mr. Portillo: Can the hon. Gentleman remind us how much oil had been produced before the tax regime was put in place?

Mr. Douglas: That is not the point. I recognise the argument that a fairly loose regime was needed to entice companies into what was loosely called an unproven province. The Government would have received revenue from the North sea and companies would have received substantial advantages from capital development. The argument that not much oil was flowing was not one to which the Public Accounts Committee paid attention.

Mr. Portillo rose——

Mr. Douglas: I shall not give way, because I should develop my arguments.

The Tory philosophy in opposition was to create a regulatory agency. The present Secretary of State for the Environment—the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin)—went to the United States and was captivated by the Texas Railroad Commission. He thought that it would be a great idea to create an agency along similar lines. The Texas Railroad Commission is, however, a regulatory agency, which regulates output. Then a Labour Government came into power and published their proposals. They created the British National Oil Corporation. That body was originally anathema to the oil companies, but they came to respect its expertise and competence. Participation agreements were signed giving the nation a direct interest in the development of North sea reserves.

I recognise that, for doctrinaire reasons, the Conservative party wanted to undermine those arrangements and the creation of BNOC as an integrated company. One of the members of the Standing Committee on the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Bill argued — we supported the idea — that BNOC should remain an integrated company. We pointed out the dangers and difficulties involved in splitting off the trading arm from other aspects of BNOC, part of which became Britoil. We argued that it should be kept as an integrated concern.

Britain produces well in excess of its oil requirements. OPEC has not been a failure, although it has had some difficulties. New sources of supply have emerged — Alaska, Mexico and the North sea supplies have had a substantial impact on international supplies. Without exception, those developments are high-cost initiatives and the countries concerned therefore have a more than reasonable interest in maintaining price stability.

The former Secretary of State for Energy—the right hon. Member for Guildford — referred to the rapid changes in the oil market. Who is to say that there will not be critical shortages again? Who is to say that the Saudis will not get fed up with us and open the valves? If someone had told us 18 months or two years ago that Saudi production would fall from 11 million or 12 million barrels a day to 3 million or 4 million barrels a day, few experts would have believed it. They would have said that that would not happen. We know that the Saudis are capable, if it suits them, of opening the valves and producing more than 12 million barrels a day. What would happen to the oil price then? What would happen to the investments in the North sea which have been made against a background of oil prices of $26, $27 or $30 a barrel? What would happen to the security of jobs to which the right hon. Member for Guildford referred? We should be in great difficulty.

We have a vested interest in the short, medium and long term in maintaining price stability, and so have the oil companies. They do not make investments lasting 15 or 25 years or calculate their cash flow with a short-term view of oil prices. They take a fairly long-term view. From time to time, the oil companies fall out with one another, but they also fall in with each other. A famous agreement was made in the Highlands of Scotland. Back in 1982 the oil companies came together at Achnacarry and cooked up the price.

What is likely to happen in the North sea? The Brown Book shows that 16 oil companies participate in the licence on the Claymore field and 24 oil companies participate on the Forties field. We can see that we do not need to have secret meetings in the Highlands. The oil companies can have discussions in multifarious ways on how to regulate prices. That is what they will do, and I do not blame them for that. The Minister of State argues that that is the way oil companies operate but that the Government should not try to do so within the agency of BNOC. In saying that, the right hon. Gentleman is throwing away an expertise that has been built up over the years by Mr. Goskirk and others. It will be difficult to replace that essential expertise and to retain the competence needed in an organsation trading in royalty oil. It is difficult to understand the Minister's reasons.

During the proceedings of the Energy Committee in 1984, BNOC admitted that price adjustments could be made. On page 13 of the Energy Committee's report of 6 December 1984—House of Commons Paper No. 126—in question 60, the Chairman asked:

"May the Committee take it on the basis of that reasonably confident assertion that BNOC will not be expecting to come back to the Secretary of State in the foreseeable future and ask Parliament for a further subvention?"

Mr. Goskirk said:

"I doubt whether we could give a categorical assurance to that effect, but we see no reason to believe we cannot put our price arrangement on a basis that would enable us to avoid coming back."

Therefore, in his wisdom, Mr. Goskirk said clearly that adjustments could have been made to the uptake of participation oil and to the form of contracts that were being undertaken. However, that is being swept away. Why is the Minister denying BNOC that function? In a sense, the only thing that is being swept away is BNOC's capability to trade in participation oil. No reasonable argument has been put forward.

I emphasise to the Government that that is a foolish policy. A few weeks ago we saw a film on television called, "Here Comes Mr. Jordan". In the film, a boxer dies too early, and Mr. Jordan has a terrible job bringing him back to life again. There is an analogy in this matter. Ministers will be in the same difficulty. For reasons that are difficult to understand, they are denying the House and the nation BNOC's expertise. They should consider carefully what they are doing.

September this year marks the 25th anniversary of the creation of OPEC. OPEC will change, but it will not go away. We need an organisation that is part of governmental policy and gives us greater access to information than at present. That was a major argument for BNOC. We wanted more direct information about the operation of the oil companies, reserves, profitability, tax and capital investment. At a time when other nations are building up their expertise, the Government, for reasons that are difficult to understand but which are certainly not in the national interest, are withdrawing from active concern in oil and gas. Those are doctrinaire reasons that are not in our real national interest.

I believe that the Opposition are right to oppose the Bill. We are right to say clearly that we shall reinforce the Government interest in that area. The Labour party has looked carefully at the operation of the golden share. The Government say that they do not want to interfere in any way, but they now have a variety of golden shares, for example in Amersham International, Britoil and Cable and Wireless—all ostensibly performing different roles. In circumstances that the Secretary of State will determine, he says that the Government will outvote everybody else. Yet the Government say that they will not intervene. The Labour party believes that we should consider the matter carefully and, when in government after the next election, perhaps implement a one-clause industry Bill, saying that in appropriate companies we shall take out the golden share. Then we shall see the Tories in opposition oppose that.

Mr. Michael Portillo (Enfield, Southgate): I listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas), and I shall refer to some of the points that he made. I was particularly interested in the scenario that he painted, from his great knowledge of the international scene, of the possibility of OPEC forcing up production and forcing down the price. However, the argument that I shall develop is that I cannot see any way in which either the British National Oil Corporation or the agency that is to replace it could influence the prices in a situation as drastic as that.

To some extent, today's debate has been a re-run of the arguments that were put forward on 14 March. I should like to begin by repeating two things that I said on that occasion. First, I congratulate the Select Committee. It produced an excellent report. Today we have had some fun discussing over what period the Government's conversion to the abolition of BNOC occurred. If it was over six or seven days, the Select Committee deserves credit. Secondly, I repeat the tribute that is due to the staff of BNOC, who have performed their duties excellently. The fact that BNOC is being wound up is not a reflection on the way in which they perform their duties.

When we held the debate on 14 March I gave a loud cheer to the news of the abolition of BNOC because it was welcome. On the other hand, on that occasion I entered some reservations about the role of the agency that was being brought in to replace it because I thought that the Government should make a cleaner sweep and take themselves more distinctly out of the oil trading market. Having considered the matter in the two months since that debate, and having had the opportunity of reading the Bill, I am more convinced than ever that it is right to abolish BNOC. However, my reservations about the agency that is to replace it are even more pronounced.

There are two basic reasons why BNOC should go. First, it has not been able to do what many of us hoped it might be able to do—protect our security of oil supply. Secondly, it has made it appear to the outside world—this is a very important point—that the Government were trying to control, or did control, the price of oil. That has led us into all sorts of diplomatic problems.

What I have said is no reflection on BNOC, as it was not set up in a way that could possibly guarantee our security of supply or even help in securing it. In that respect, I am taking an easier road than some of my hon. Friends because I am not trying to justify a change. I do not think that there was a magic date on which BNOC ceased to be useful. It is my contention that from the moment it was set up, and because of the manner in which it was set up, it had no chance of helping with our security of supply.

My main reason for saying that is that the participation agreements gave BNOC access to 51 per cent. of crude oil. But what good is that? The industries in our country do not run on crude oil. Our cars run on petrol and our industries run on the products of oil. It is those products that are the vital ingredients in the whole scene. Control of about half the nation's crude oil does not guarantee us against interruptions of supply. Even small interruptions in the supply of products can lead to severe dislocation and problems, as happened in 1979.

BNOC also entered into long-term contracts for the disposal of the oil that it took. As some hon. Members said today, that led to a lack of flexibility. BNOC was unable to turn around on a sixpence and shed those commitments quickly. It could not respond to events when they were moving quickly. That is not a matter of theory, but a matter of fact. My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) referred to what happened in 1979. With BNOC in existence this country was, if anything, worse placed to defend itself against interruptions in supply than many countries that did not have such an organisation.

There has been a great deal of discussion about the nature of the assurances and the informal arrangements that are made between the Government and the oil companies. Hon. Members may have their suspicions as to whether those assurances are watertight and whether the agreements, with all their informality, are sufficient. It seems that those informal arrangements go to the heart of the matter, which is the control and supply of products of oil, and not crude oil. That is a very important distinction. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) said that BNOC was a company on which one could rely to defend the national interest. Its heart might have been in the right place but its oil was normally not in the right place as it was normally committed. That is one of the reasons why it failed.

I am therefore surprised that the Government want to maintain the participation agreements. I was surprised when my right hon. Friend the Minister of State told us in our previous debate on this subject that, if the Government feel that they will need such oil in the medium term, they can activate the participation agreements. He has reiterated that sentiment today. As several hon. Members said, the medium term in this context means at least six months. Any right hon. or hon. Member who could predict whether there will be an oil crisis next week would be a rich man. To predict that we shall need additional supplies of oil next winter assumes supernatural foresight. The Government can choose between exercising the participation options all of the time—which they clearly will not do or we should not be discussing the Bill—or they will never exercise the participation options. When I say "never", I refer to the present Government. A Government of a different colour might take a different attitude.

I should like now to consider the problem of the Government appearing to fix or to control the price of oil. The Government should not attempt to fix the price of oil for two reasons. First, they will never succeed, as we are not powerful enough in the world oil market to have such an impact. Secondly, in the long term, lower oil prices are in our interests. I understand the desire for some stabilising, but the Government never seriously believe that they could control prices in the long term. In that sense, I accept assurances that Ministers have given that that was not the business with which they were involved.

Because BNOC was a price setter and a Government body, it is natural that OPEC Ministers assumed that the British Government were attempting or were able to control prices. Time and again, Britain has needlessly given offence to OPEC countries. Each time the North sea oil price has moved, it has looked to the outside world as though the United Kingdom was leading the way on oil prices. Indeed, it looked as though we were leading the price up to get rich or down to sell our oil without having to cut production like OPEC countries. I believe that Lord Wilson of Rievaulx used to joke about Britain becoming a member of OPEC. It has looked recently as though Britain is trying to reap all the benefits of being a country member of OPEC without being willing to pay the club fees.

The Government's response to all of this is curious. The problem arises because a Government body trades 1 million barrels of oil a day and is a price setter. That is what produces the diplomatic problem for Britain. The answer to that problem is for the Government to get out of oil trading. However, they are now proposing to replace BNOC with another Government body which will trade 250,000 barrels a day. I do not see how the agency can avoid being a price setter. Several hon. Members have said that 250,000 barrels is a substantial amount of oil. It appears that the Government have realised that they are in the international firing line and, having recognised that that problem has come about because they have their head and shoulders above the parapet, their response is to put only their head above the parapet, keeping their shoulders well hidden. That is a curious response.

I should like the Government to give up the participation agreements because I think that they are useless, and I should like them to give up royalty in kind. I understand that the main argument for having royalty in kind—it is not a sufficient quantity to affect security of supply—is the cash flow argument. I understand that the Government receive their money earlier from royalty taken in the form of oil than in the form of cash. If that is so, we should change the rules so that the royalty in cash can be taken earlier, so that the cash flow disadvantage can be overcome. That would be much better than the Government continuing to expose themselves by being involved in the oil market.

I am as worried as any hon. Member about security of supply, but I disagree with several hon. Members about the role of the Energy Act 1976 in securing our supplies. I have sometimes felt this afternoon as though I have read a different Act. I believe that it is much more comprehensive than some hon. Members have given it credit for. It is a good piece of Socialist legislation. It contains sweeping powers, which can be activated in circumstances that fall short of those which Opposition Members have mentioned. For example, the use of oil can be controlled at any time when it seems desirable to the Secretary of State to conserve energy. The full powers can be exercised when there is an international energy emergency and when it seems to the Government that an emergency is looming or is threatened. I do not wish to put ideas into the minds of Opposition Members, but this is a wide-ranging and draconian Act. It is extraordinary to argue that it is insufficient for securing supplies.

I have no doubt that the Government are doing the best thing in abolishing BNOC, but it worries me that they have not given the best reasons for doing so. The best reason is that BNOC never did its job. It is not that it ceased to do its job, as it never could secure supplies. The Government have put all of the emphasis on the recent change in market conditions, especially the change towards the spot market. If they take that line of argument, they are open to the accusation that this is a temporary phenomenon. They are, therefore, arguing for a long-term change—the abolition of BNOC—by giving a short-term reason.

Because the Government have given only half the reason, they are proposing only half of what I believe is the appropriate change. That surprises me as the Government do not have a reputation for doings things by halves. In this, however, they have done things by halves as, first, they cut BNOC in half to create Britoil and today we are discussing a Bill that cuts BNOC in half again to create an agency. I wonder whether the Government will come back with another Bill to cut the agency in half. I am reminded of the old mathematical problem: if a flea starts in the middle of a table and takes a jump followed by a jump of half the remaining distance, and keeps jumping half the remaining distance, when will it reach the end of the table? If I remember correctly, by that method it never reaches the end of the table. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State is not in the least like a flea, but I should like him to steel himself and, with one great bound, get himself free of the table.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I do not know whether I should congratulate the Government and Conservative Members who have spoken today on their use of the Energy Select Committee's report in support of giving the Bill a Second Reading. I am a member of that Select Committee and have felt it necessary to remind myself of what we decided and what evidence we took. Neither my memory nor my reading has led me to any reference to the abolition of BNOC.

The Select Committee's fifth report might have been critical of BNOC's pricing, but it was more critical of the Government's unwillingness to come clean on what BNOC was doing about pricing arrangements. At paragraph 37 the report said:

> "Various suggestions have been made in the Report about how BNOC's mode of operation could alter in the future especially in order to make it a more market-related pricing instrument, and the Committee will await with interest any announcement of any review conducted by the Prime Minister's policy advisory group. It hopes that Ministers will candidly discuss the options for the future with the House."

Nowhere there, or in other recommendations, is it suggested that we should have a Bill such as this. Indeed, the Committee hoped > "that Ministers will candidly discuss the options for the future with the House."

[Mr. Kevin Barron]

That was on 8 March. On 13 March the Minister made the statement that was the basis of the Bill. I cannot see how hon. Gentlemen who are members of the Select Committee can say that the Committee was moving towards the abolition of BNOC as it exists at present.

Mr. Rost: I am sure that my colleague on the Select Committee would not wish to deceive the House. The Select Committee did not come to the conclusion that BNOC should be abolished, because that conclusion would not have been within its terms of reference. However, our report must have raised serious doubts as to whether there was a useful role for BNOC to continue to play, and so would have influenced any thinking and enlightened Government into doing the obvious.

Mr. Barron: The hon. Gentleman is tempting me. If that had been our view, it would have appeared in our recommendations. I remind the hon. Gentleman of what he said earlier in the debate. His general theme was that the Committee felt that BNOC was a costly irrelevance. That was never said by the Committee, to my recollection. Had the Committee wished to express strong views to the Government about BNOC, it would have done so in the report. The hon. Gentleman is speaking now as if the report had made such suggestions.

I suggest to the Government that they should submit such proposed changes to national corporations to a Select Committee so that they could be considered in detail before a hotchpotch of a Bill is presented to the House for debate.

Some important questions are posed in the Bill, and I hope that the Minister will be prepared to answer them in Committee, if not when he replies to the debate. It is likely that there will be lengthy debate in Committee, and much opposition, if the questions are not answered.

Reference has been made to the question of the small companies that were looked after by BNOC, and the possibility of setting up smaller or co-operative agencies. We have also heard that there have been discussions between the small companies and the larger offshore companies. Many of the small companies do exploration work on the United Kingdom continental shelf. The Minister should tell us whether there is likely to be any effect on exploration in the North sea and the discoveries of oil and gas. Is the establishment of the agency that is to replace BNOC likely to affect exploration by small companies?

When the Minister gave evidence to the Select Committee on 6 March, two days before the report appeared, I asked him whether BNOC should be used as a buffer, using taxpayers' money to deal with short-term fluctuations in North sea oil prices. The Minister said that one of BNOC's roles was to provide evidence of arm's-length pricing, as far as taxation was concerned, in the offshore companies.

What are the implications of that now that BNOC is to be wound up? How will such evidence be collected now, and what are the implications for the Treasury and the public purse if the role played by BNOC for some considerable time in connection with taxation is given away or abolished?

I appreciate the guarantee given in schedule 2 about the pension rights of people who work for BNOC. If staff are transferred to the new agency, their pensions rights will be transferred too. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), who is a member of the trade union involved, on that point. I am pleased that the Government have seen fit to accept that that provision should be made.

However, I received a letter today from my constituent Mr. MacDonald of Main street, Ulley, near Sheffield. I passed a previous letter from Mr. MacDonald to a Minister last month. Mr. MacDonald can get no similar guarantee from the Government in the case of the deregulation or privatisation of buses and the National Bus Company's pension scheme. The Government seem to take a different attitude on different Bills.

There is also the question of counselling for redundancy. BNOC's employees are working in a high-technology industry and are highly skilled. Are the Government using the counselling service to advise people, for instance, on how to set up agencies? If so, is it possible that there will be more than just one agency —that there will be some smaller entities that will look after the small companies?

Clause 4 of the Bill refers to the disposal of surplus property owned by BNOC. The proceeds of sale will be given back to the Secretary of State. The clause states that it shall be the duty of the agency to get for such property. I do not know what properties the agency will wish to dispose of, or what their value is. However, I hope that the Minister will show diligence in this area. When public assets have been sold off in the recent past, it has become clear within a few short weeks of their disposal on the open market that the British taxpayer, through the Consolidated Fund and the Treasury, has not received full value for them. It would be interesting to know exactly how public accountability will be imposed in the case of the disposal of properties by the agencies.

"the best terms reasonably obtainable"

Clause 2 poses a number of questions. The Minister has told us that, although under subsection (2)(d) the agency will have power

"to buy, sell or otherwise deal in petroleum on its own account", it will not be allowed to buy liquid petroleum gas. My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney asked why that was so. BNOC is not heavily involved in LPG at present, but it makes some profit by buying it. Why will the agency not be permitted to deal in LPG? Who is likely to buy the gas that is currently bought by BNOC, and to make the profit that the agency will lose?

The major question is about participation agreements. We have some security of supply through the participation agreements. The Minister said that we had assurances from oil companies that if the Government had to enact the participation agreements to bring 51 per cent. of our offshore oil into Britain, they could do it. That begs many questions. When BNOC is not buying and selling, even to the same company as it does now, and if we do not take up the participation agreement immediately, it is likely that oil companies will look for markets for their oil throughout the world, and rightly so. If they enter into long-term contracts to supply oil elsewhere, and if for some reason we lose the benefit of heavy duty, and North sea oil could be used in this country, what would happen? What would happen if there were a conflict between those companies' contracts throughout the world and the participation agreements, which provide assurance for us? Are those agreements legally binding? Can we physically force companies to bring oil into the country? We need further assurances from oil companies. Their assurances are more to shareholders than in the interests of the country. Shareholders watch what oil companies do, but they are not in a position to look after our national interests.

The hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) said that, because all the pipelines come on to mainland Britain and the oil is landed here before it is exported elsewhere, we have some security of supply. The Minister said exactly that on 6 March in answer to a question of mine during an evidence session in the Select Committee. He believed that the security of supply was a major reason why BNOC was in existence. His answer is on page 64, and I am sure that he has read it again and again. However, only a few days after, on 13 March, the Minister made a statement to the House abolishing BNOC.

In his evidence the Minister said that BNOC was responsible for maximising the benefit to the United Kingdom economy. That was exactly what the Select Committee's report was about and what hon. Members were interested in. We were interested to know whether we were maximising the benefits to the United Kingdom by using Supplementary Estimates. The Minister gave us assurances, although they were not concrete ones. He did not say exactly how much we got back through BNOC's pricing arrangements.

On 6 March the Minister recognised that BNOC had a definite role to play in three major areas. Why is the Minister now prepared to come to the Dispatch Box and say that he no longer sees such a role for BNOC? What is our national interest in offshore oil now that BNOC is to be abolished and an agency set up? All hon. Members should look after the national interests, and not the interests of either oil companies or fellow hon. Members.

Mr. Lewis Stevens (Nuneaton): I welcome the Bill. It was not wrong to set up BNOC in 1976 because BNOC could play a sensible controlling role. We knew little about what the markets or the output quantities would be. There were many estimates and ideas but, as we know, many of the estimates for oil have floated up and down considerably over the years.

In 1977 we produced about one tenth of the output that we produce today of North sea oil. The position has changed and there is a different role to play. During those nine years we have seen considerable changes in oil production throughout the world. The markets have fluctuated. Sometimes they have seemed to be in the control of OPEC, and sometimes in no one's control. Sometimes the United Kingdom appeared to have a strong effect through BNOC on world prices, and at other times we have had comparatively little effect.

The big difference is that today BNOC's function of trying to avoid the destabilisation of prices is no longer relevant. That is the major factor. A Labour Member said that in future the Opposition would try to resurrect a similar body. That would not be the right thing to do. BNOC has played a part for nine years, but it would be pointless to resurrect a similar body in wholly different circumstances, and hon. Members on both sides of the House have admitted that future circumstances are rather uncertain.

We must now change our view of what type of organisation and sort of control the Government should have, and of how the oil industry should be allowed to progress with its North sea interests. It has been suggested that BNOC is half its previous size. I welcome that. If I had been present in 1982, I might have pushed harder to reduce BNOC even below half its size.

We still retain royalties in the form of oil in the Bill. I query that. I would be happier if I knew that we would accept payment not in oil, but in cash. However, in the Bill we have the opportunity to contract it out. I hope that the matter will be considered seriously, and that involvement in the market and trading will be phased out.

I have never thought that the ability of Government enterprises to enter trading is a good idea. Nevertheless, I pay tribute to the work done by the employees of BNOC. However, I question whether it is right to have Government involvement in oil trade. I would be happier if we could reduce the trading concept of the new agency, for royalties too.

The Opposition have shown considerable pessimism about the part that the private sector and oil companies will play. That is not surprising because we have heard many criticisms of the private sector from the Opposition on many previous occasions. It is pessimistic to look at the matter and to say that the job cannot be done. The private sector has carried out explorations and development in both the North sea and technology. It is essential to develop new technology, and during the past few years it has developed to a remarkable extent. There was more exploration and more wells were drilled last year than previously — a total of 182. There were 10 oil discoveries, one oil and gas discovery, eight gas discoveries, one condensate discovery and three gas and condensate discoveries in 1984.

Development in the North sea is not completely uncontrolled. Any general energy policy must include some controls. However, the Opposition suggest that there should be much closer control and that the Government should tie the industry so tightly that they will always know what is happening, and that they can make things happen. But such control, which means that Governments must interfere in those organisations, is rarely successful. The Bill will remove direct interference in the industry by the Government, which would not be a bad thing.

I doubt whether BNOC has managed, as some have suggested, to control prices. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) said, prices changed because the world market changed. He suggested that prices would decrease; indeed, it is possible that they will collapse. Only the oil companies are in a position to decide whether that will happen.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Wood Mackenzie report of 19 December 1984, when reviewing BNOC and what use it may have, said in simple terms that the effect of BNOC was not that it controlled or organised prices, but that it slowed price changes? Did not that independent report show the value of BNOC in world oil markets?

Mr. Stevens: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point, but I doubt whether BNOC would have continued to be effective.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) said that, through BNOC, the Government always knew what was happening in the industry. That is a good point, and I hope that the Minister will consider it. Perhaps the change that the Bill will introduce will enable the Government to be as well informed as they were in the past, but I should like confirmation of the fact. I hope that the Government will always know what is happening as they formulate their energy policy.

There will be other problems with world oil production. Many hon. Members have asked whether OPEC production will increase, or whether we can live with the reduced output of Saudi Arabia and other countries and the undoubted back-door selling that happens at present. The removal of BNOC will not play a great part in that. There will be little difference between the proposed arrangement and the retention of trading by BNOC. We can create changes in the world market through our total output, not through a trading organisation that has been set up by the Government.

Some hon. Members asked whether the participation agreements will be honoured. I am confident that our arrangements for security of supply will be as successful, should the need arise, under the new policy as they were before. In an emergency, we have the power to obtain oil supplies without much difficulty. We should have to invoke the legislation to do it, but it could be done. However, most of the threatened developments will not happen overnight. There will be opportunity in the weeks or months ahead to see the effect on our supplies, and we shall have adequate time to talk to the oil companies and to ensure our internal supplies. In any case, North sea oil comes to Britain anyway. We consume a great deal of what we produce, and I believe that the agreements with the oil companies will secure our supplies in the future.

It has been suggested that the development of production in the North sea will be inhibited because of the change in the structure, but there is no reason why, with the oil companies doing most of the trading, there should be the slightest inhibition on the development of technology or of the industry in general.

The Bill forms the basis of a more sensible outlook. If anything, I should have preferred it to go a little further and to have abolished trading by a Government organisation. However, it is a move in the right direction. I hope that in Committee some of the details can be examined so that we can be confident that our general approach to the industry will be the best possible, and that our security of supply is maintained.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I begin by declaring a semi-interest, in that I, too, am a member of a trade union to which many of those who work for BNOC belong. It is in our joint trade union interests that I begin by saying that it says little for a Government who have been party to a performance whereby at 3.15 pm one day the managers are told and at 3.30 pm the staff are told that their jobs have gone when until that day there had been an active recruiting programme. All right hon. and hon. Members would say that that was bad industrial practice. It cannot be argued that it was justified because the removal of BNOC and its replacement by an agency had to be kept secret. The future of BNOC was the subject of discussion for some time before that. There is no justification for those 120 people losing their jobs on what appears to be an ideological or political whim.

Looking back through the history of the British National Oil Corporation, one sees the sale of Britoil. I do not propose to criticise the method by which that sale was started, except to say that it is one more national asset that has been squandered during the Government's tenure of office. Now they wish to sell off the gas industry and to squander that asset, too. Many of our national assets will be thrown into the hands of private owners, not always from the United Kingdom. Indeed, our national assets are being steadily stripped away. However, I shall try not to trespass too far from the main debate, which is the Second Reading of the Bill.

This squalid little Bill will break up BNOC and waste all the expertise that has been accumulated there, although half of the personnel will go to the agency. At the end of this squalid affair, I hope that those who have given loyal and effective service to BNOC will not suffer financially. We all know that there are 4 million-plus people out of work, and it appears that at least 80 of the 120 are destined to join that queue. Jobs are not easy to come by, and people sacrificed jobs in other careers to transfer to BNOC, which up to 13 March appeared to be expanding its operations.

Anybody who changed his job because he thought that there was a future with BNOC, and was given a job by the management of BNOC in good faith, should not suffer materially as a result of this change. The Minister and I may politically disagree about everything in sight but I hope that he will agree that justice must be done to employees of BNOC, particularly to those who will not be taken on by the agency. I wait with some interest the Minister's winding up speech, and I hope that he will give us some assurance. I know that certain terms are being discussed and it would not be right to go into the details, but I hope that they will be both generous and reflect the way in which BNOC met its untimely death.

I sought to intervene in the speech of the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), but he seemed not to see me. Perhaps that was as well for him, because I may have asked him a question that he would not have liked. However, I intervened in the speech of the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and made a simple comment about the farmer and his corn stock.

It is all very well instantly to react to the events of the day. However, all of us who have been involved in the market—I have been to no great extent, merely as a professional observer or participater on occasions—have watched the oil market wobble around with its ebbs and flows of plenty and shortage over the past 20 years. All of us can remember the early 1970s and the sudden panic of the world oil crisis and the feeling that there was not enough oil to go around. Everybody panicked into measures to do this and that.

We have watched the North sea oilfields develop from nothing in the 1970s to self-sufficiency for Britain in the 1980s and apparently into the 1990s. We have watched the OPEC countries either fall out with each other or fall in with each other, but that did not affect the oil supply. We have watched the development of the South American oilfields and seen the North American oilfields begin to peter out in some areas and develop in others. New techniques and new concepts have been developed. All the time, the nature of the market has changed, but there has always been a relationship between world economic growth and development and the availability of oil.

At the moment, the world is in recession. It is beginning to pull itself out of recession, and the Americans are certainly coming out of recession, although we hear many worrying comments and much speculation about the large American deficit and whether this will cause a crash in American finances.

Leaving political differences aside, it is to be hoped that we too will turn the corner and come out of recession. As we do so, we shall notice a rather strange feature, which the right hon. Member for Guildford and many other Conservative Members ignored. We shall need oil. It is used when countries are working and the greater the consumption of oil—the resources exist—the greater is the take-up in the slack in the world oil markets. Companies begin to place long-term contracts. We move away from the predominance of the spot market into the predominance of the long-term contract market. That is the nature of the oil industry.

To react, as the Government have done, by killing off BNOC simply because the spot market appears to have begun to predominate over the long and short-term contract placing markets is to react to the instant without seeing tomorrow. That is the Government's sin. Instead, they should have looked at the problem in its entirety, taking a long-term view and asking the simple question of what BNOC can and cannot do and what its great value has been.

I have a copy of the Wood MacKenzie report, dated 19 December 1984. We live in the days when it is said that to change the law of the land is a long and slow process, but on 14 May, barely six months after the report was published, we are pushing through a Bill that will change all our marketing concepts. The Wood MacKenzie report analyses BNOC, discusses whether it has a future and looks at various aspects of it that seem to be of use. It says that price stability is one of BNOC's attributes.

It says:

"BNOC played an important role during the price difficulties in the late 1970s and early 1980s and without doubt helped to stabilise the situation. The role of BNOC has been one of slowing rather than changing the direction of the market."

I intervened in the speech of the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens) and put that point to him, but he seemed not to follow it. The great advantage of BNOC is its stabilising effect. It stabilises because it slows the market. If one has a daily placement of 800,000 barrels, one has an influential part to play in the market. However, to ask BNOC to try to control prices, even with such an interest, is to ask the impossible, particularly when one asks a producer at a time when the spot market rather than the term contract market predominates.

I should have thought that even a student in a first year class of economics at any university would have been able to tell the Government that. However, that is looking at things realistically, standing back and taking a long-term rather than a reactive view, a considered view rather than a political or dogmatic view.

The argument that I, too, take a political view may be thrown back in my face. However, I can be objective enough on occasions to go to experts, ask their advice, stand back and make an objective judgment. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that most such experts are not natural supporters of my party. They are experts who have looked at the problem, considered the options and the facts and on 19 December last year made a comment.

The report also says that the advantage lies in the security of supply. The arguments for that have been well canvassed this evening, and I do not propose to raise them again. On logistics, the report says that,

"in fulfilling a central co-ordinating role, BNOC can help to maintain a regime of orderly offtake and liftings. It has also been a ready buyer from the very small participants such as companies owning the Forties units."

It is all very well saying that the little companies can go in future to the big companies and the big companies will peg their market accordingly. However, anybody who believes that companies act as charitable independent bodies lives in cloud-cuckoo-land. All of us know that Marks and Spencer dominates its suppliers because it demands quality, fixes the price and has almost a monopoly hold. Once such a company is buying 80 or 90 per cent. of one's product, one has to obey it or lose 80 or 90 per cent. of one's production. There is no alternative market. There is only a handful of major companies for the little companies to go to. The little companies will not have the same security, the same outlet and the same pricing practice as they had in the days of BNOC.

One keeps coming back to a simple question—why get rid of BNOC? Why did the Minister come before a Select Committee in December 1984 to defend BNOC and then announce its destruction in March 1985? What has led to this absolute change of mind? It cannot possibly be—I should be absolutely horrified if it were—that, because the spot market had dominated for three months and there had been fluctations in it, it was justifiable to turn the Government's policy on its head. Or could it be, as my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) suggested, that clause 4, which has been cobbled together to carry out this despicable act, holds the secret? Clause 4(3) states:

"Any sums received by the Agency under subsection (1) above, other than such sums as may be determined by the Secretary of State with the approval of the Treasury to be sums required to be retained by the Agency for meeting expenditure incurred by it under that subsection, shall be paid to the Secretary of State; and any sums received by the Secretary of State under this subsection shall be paid into the Consolidated Fund."

The agency will have a limited function. BNOC assets will be sold off, and again the dear old Treasury will collect the loot.

As I said in my intervention during the speech of the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), this can be compared to the farmer with his barn of corn. When this Government came to power their barn of corn contained many interesting assets. It contained the gas industry. That is about to be sold off. It contained British Aerospace, computers, shipyards, oil. It contained a wealth of assets, all of which belonged, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to you, to me and to every other citizen of the United Kingdom. We have had six years of this Conservative Government. They are even talking about selling off the water boards. Soon nothing will be left and the barn will be empty.

One does not to have to be more than a first-year economist to know that if one has an income-producing asset it provides an automatic income and that if one sells the asset there will be no income. If one sells off one's assets, including selling some of those assets for next to nothing, as happened over British Telecom, Amersham International and several other assets, and then squanders the proceeds, at the end of the day nothing will be left. Just as the farmer who squanders his corn has no corn left to plant for next year, so this nation at the end of the tenure of this Government will have lost its major assets, its seed corn and its ability to invest. It will therefore be that much poorer.

I regret having to call this Bill a squalid little Bill, but that is what it is. Clause 4 contains the secret of it all. BNOC was a viable, profitable national asset. In 1982 the Government took out the upstream element and sold it. If one looks at the value of what they sold, it has gone up and up. Who has benefited from that sale? It is certainly not the people in my constituency, or the ordinary chap who pays his taxes and goes to work, if he is lucky enough to have a job. The institutional investor has benefited, the top 5 per cent. of our population and those who are living abroad.

On 14 May 1985 the Government intend to dismantle what is left of BNOC. Is it not interesting—perhaps the Minister of State can answer this question if no other—that nowhere is reference made to liquid gas products. What will happen to them? Or is that another part of our seed corn which will also be squandered?

8.44 pm

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I have no hesitation in supporting this excellent piece of legislation, because BNOC is an anachronism. It seeks to interfere in an essentially free market. I bring to the debate the experience of an hon. Member who represents two of the country's greatest oil refineries on the south bank of the River Humber, the Conoco oil refinery and the Lindsey oil refinery. Those refineries, and the companies which have invested so much in them, have been anxious about the destabilising influence of BNOC not only during the last few months but over a period of several years. Whether one is refining or extracting oil, the oil market is essentially a naturally free market. The establishment of BNOC in 1976 was an act of deliberate Government policy. They made no secret about it. Their deliberate policy was to intervene in the free market.

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman says that the oil industry is a free market, but does he seriously suggest that the price we are paying for North sea oil is determined by a free market? Is it not following the lead of OPEC, which is a cartel and which intervenes in the market?

Mr. Brown: If what the hon. Gentleman says is true, there is no doubt that, because of the existence of BNOC, the market is not as free as it ought to be. I take his point about the role of OPEC. I represent constituency interests which compete against cartels and price rings and I recognise that problems are caused for a free market by any cartel or price ring, which OPEC might be said to be. However, if they can influence a market, when they have control over such assets as BNOC, in order to establish a freer market, it is right and proper for a Government in whose philosophy I believe to introduce legislation of this kind.

The market for oil in terms of the world economy is a free market. Attempts, even by OPEC, to control the freedom of that market have resulted in trouble for OPEC during the last few years. We have to recognise the fundamentally natural nature of the worldwide oil industry. It naturally responds, far more than do many other industries, to the stimulus of demand and supply. In spite of the BNOCs of this country and the OPECs of this world, whatever controls Government or international organisations try to bring to bear to establish stability in the market, one eventually finds that there is trouble. That has been the case not only during the last few months, owing to difficulties with the spot price, but generally with regard to the oil market as a whole. BNOC has sought to do as good a job as possible, but during the last few months or years, however well run, there was no way in which they could bring any helpful influence to bear.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) referred to the beneficial effect of BNOC trying to control the spot price, and in his earlier intervention he suggested that the great virtue of BNOC was that it managed to slow down the movement of prices. However, there was a fundamental pricing dilemma, and BNOC's policy which he suggested had been of advantage to the oil market did not, I suggest, result in such a benefit.

If one goes back to early 1983, the hon. Member for St. Helens, South might be able to claim that on two occasions BNOC steadied the market by delaying pricing moves. That was the burden of the hon. Gentleman's intervention and part of his speech. However, that weapon can be used on only one or two occasions. In the end, the existence of a semi-official term price becomes a force which creates the destabilisation that the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues who are opposing the Bill are seeking to avoid.

Any change would and did risk attracting changes in other official prices and market reductions which anticipated such changes. There was a great danger of setting off a downward spiral in prices, thereby causing the very destabilisation that the hon. Gentleman felt BNOC's operation in 1983 might have avoided. Any move that BNOC made towards a market-related pricing system would inevitably have been a sure recipe for changing what was even then a weak market into a disastrous one. After every month in which spot prices change and go below the BNOC price, inevitably BNOC would feel that it had to go beneath the spot price. That weakening of the market would have been a disaster.

The Government or BNOC could not have had the increased powers which would have been necessary to intervene in the market, for the simple reason that large-scale storage for the substantial additional reserves that would be sloshing around all over Britain could not have been funded. It was shown clearly in 1983 that the argument chosen by the Opposition and by the hon. Member for St. Helens, South would have been a route to even weaker prices and an even more destabilising influence on the oil market.

A Conservative Government committed to free enterprise, to ensuring that the ingenuity, skill and market response which can only come when the private sector can operate, can only take this course. That is why I welcome the Bill. The Bill is philosophically based. I make no secret of the fact that I would have welcomed it earlier. There is some merit in the charge that we should have had the Bill in 1982 along with the other piece of legislation, of which this is an inevitable and natural consequence. I class myself as one of those who might carp at the margin but I am delighted that the Government have seen fit to do what is natural for a Conservative Government.

Earlier this year I had the privilege of attending the Institute of Petroleum's annual dinner, the major occasion when all the oil companies bring together Members of Parliament and those involved in politics on both sides of the House together with all the industries. That dinner was addressed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. She drew attention to the contribution which the private sector of the oil industry, both in refining and extraction, has made to our economy. That is a contribution which the withdrawal of BNOC will assist by ensuring that Britain's oil market becomes even more attractive for investors.

Let us not forget that oil exploration in the far-off early days was undertaken by the private sector. Let us not forget that, before it was recognised by either Labour or Conservative Governments that oil extraction from the North sea would be a lucrative fund raiser for the Treasury, there was no Government funding which would be anywhere near that of the oil companies as they engaged in what was a risky enterprise. In those far-off days in the late 1960s and early 1970s, it was the entrepreneurial spirit of the oil companies which made it possible for successive Governments to benefit from the revenue which was raised and which made it possible for the Socialist Government in the mid-1970s to impose its political philosophy on what appeared to be a success story.

Would there have been a BNOC in 1966 when we did not know whether there was any oil in the North sea? The fact is that in the late 1960s when a Labour Government were in power and when there might have been some cause for Government assistance in the market place to encourage the oil companies to explore a natural resource that had not hitherto been discovered, there was no such move. It was only once the reserve had been discovered, when there was known to be profit in the North sea, that action was taken. There was profit in the North sea, there is profit in the North sea and there must continue to be profit in the North sea.

I see the North sea from a constituency point of view. It has brought investment to south Humberside. It has brought a massive new Conoco works, which this year is engaging in a £100 million expansion scheme. That will result in every fabrication yard in south Humberside being full of contracts. Only about six weeks ago I had the privilege of opening a new design centre because the oil companies have so much new design work that they cannot undertake it themselves. About 50 people are employed in a design centre, contracting to the Conoco oil refinery in my constituency, to cope with that massive expansion plan which is founded upon the investment and profit that has come from the North sea in the past few years.

The Conoco oil refinery welcomes the Bill. It is the provider of much wealth in terms of jobs in my constituency and it will provide many more jobs during the coming months as its expansion programme takes off. I am glad that the Government have seen fit to bring the Bill forward for a Second Reading today. I regret that we have had to wait a year or two longer than I might have wished, but nevertheless I welcome it.

8.57 pm

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): In the short time that I have at my disposal I want to come pretty quickly to the brass tacks of what I have to say. The Bill is more a matter of political ideology than of rational conviction. If one thing has become clear from the Bill it is that Britain has only a hazy energy policy, if we have one at all. We still have not decided on the best possible machinery and apparatus to do what we aim to do. The great assumption that underlies the Bill is that what multinational oil companies decide and what they do will always coincide with the national interest. That is the basic philosophical assumption underlying the Bill, and it is simply untrue. The British National Oil Corporation was set up initially to safeguard Britain's interest in a world of multinational oil companies. As they ever did, multinational oil companies always act in their own interests, particularly at a time of crisis.

The essence of the Bill as I undertstand it is that the corporation is to be replaced by a Government oil and pipelines agency. The agency will be responsible for handling Government royalty oil, regulating Government pipelines and activity concerned with participation contracts. It is my view that, whatever else an oil policy has to have, security of oil supplies for the country must be in the forefront. Of that I am absolutely convinced.

It is Government policy to embark on privatisation and a policy of free market economics. The assumption, as I have already said, is that this free market economics pursued by multinational oil companies will always coincide with the national interest—their interest is the nation's interest. That is a fallacious assumption. Nevertheless, it underlies the Bill.

I put it to the House that security implications now for oil supplies are a good deal more complicated than they were. When we were in government eight years ago, I went to a dinner and I sat next to a very powerful oil man. They are always plain-speaking people. I asked him, "What do you think of the British National Oil Corporation?". He chose his words carefully, and he said, "The British National Oil Corporation is a confounded nuisance." Therefore, it did not take long for me to realise that, if ever we had a free enterprise Government that could be influenced by multinational oil companies, the British National Oil Corporation was doomed and, indeed, it was. It has already been split up, and what we are discussing here is the rump. Large scale big business always wanted the corporation out of the way, and now it has gone.

I believe that security of our oil supplies always was a sound argument for the corporation. One will always have a better chance—and I will put this in terms of general principle only, because I do not have time to argue the case in detail from practical experience—of safeguarding the nation's oil supplies with a state oil company than with mulitnational oil companies. I think that it is a simple matter of principle, and at this stage I will go no further than that.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) cast some doubt on the validity of participation agreements which can be reactivated—I think that is the word. I think that his doubts were well founded, and that these agreements are in no way a substitute for what is being lost.

My second main point concerns what my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) said regarding small oil companies with no trading departments of their own. The best way that I can put it to the House is to quote a short passage from the Financial Times of Friday 15 March which asks the question:

> "Who, in the absence of BNOC, will trade oil for smaller oil companies which have no trading departments of their own?".

The same article answered the question one column later:

> "New trading mechanisms will also have to evolve as BNOC winds down. Smaller companies will probably have little alternative to marketing their oil through larger companies, a point which was the source of some bitterness yesterday.".

[Mr. Ken Weetch]

As far as I can ascertain from the main course of the debate, that point has in no way been resolved. I have listened to much of the debate, I have listened to the experts, I have listened to hon. Members who serve on the Energy Select Committee and I have listened closely for certain basic questions to be answered. Not being a specialist in this area, and being a simple man anyway in the economics of energy, I want a number of simple questions answered. Is it in the nation's interest to have a high price for oil or a low price for oil? I have heard no hon. Member answer that yet. I have heard two opinions. The first was that it is better to have a high price for oil because we are an oil exporting country. Two minutes later I heard that it is better to have a low price for oil because that lowers costs. A couple of minutes after that, I heard an hon. Member say that if we have a low price for oil that means that there is a low price for oil for the Japanese economy as well, which will compete with our own. Oil economics is a confusing world. The Government must prove their case, and they have not shed a great deal of light on a number of fundamental questions.

Will the new arrangement have very much effect on the spot market? I understand that we are moving towards free enterprise. If that is so, surely the market will fluctuate rather more than when we had the constructive management—or at least an attempt at that—of BNOC.

In the limited time that I have had to carry out research, I have been given to understand that, as a marketing organisation, the rump of the corporation has had a constructive influence on prices and marketing at certain critical periods — it has certainly had a constructive influence on price stability. In the late 1970s and early 1980s — difficult times — BNOC helped to stabilise a critical position. It earned its spurs. Even supporters of the corporation would not argue that, at the end of the day, it can alter the long-term fundamental supply and demand in the oil market. But over short periods it has altered people's perceptions and produced a stabilising effect.

The Bill does not give us very much. It is being introduced for political reasons. The Government have policies of free enterprise and privatisation. I suspect that, in trying to have a constructive price influence in the world market, the Government have attracted international political opposition. However, even put together those do not make a policy, so I oppose the Bill.

9.7 pm

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weech), not least because of the experience that we shared last night in the debate about Felixstowe, when we heard Conservative Member after Conservative Member demanding not merely that the harbour be developed but that vast public investment should be put into infrastructure—that roads should be built and services provided so that private profits could be made. It is interesting that Conservative Members are taking the same approach in this debate.

I hope that I am not taking matters out of turn in saying that it was entirely appropriate that my hon. Friend should follow the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown). Enthusiasm is always attractive — it is a commendable quality in many cases. But for an hon. Member to fail to recognise that our offshore resources are finite and to want to see an even more excitable oil industry rushing to develop our offshore reserves is inappropriate to the current position. If the hon. Gentleman has his way, there would be more wells than water off the British coast.

It has been an interesting debate. Obviously, there have been considerable differences in approach on both sides of the House. My hon. Friends have always perceived the need to maintain security of supplies while Conservative Members have been remarkably complacent in their assumption that oil supply will be all right on the night. The truth is that it will not. Of course, there were differences. The hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) took a more extreme view than his hon. Friends. He did not mind whether we had any crude oil guarantees because, so far as he could see, crude oil did not matter. He should recognise that existing arrangements provide for a sufficient degree of buy-back to guarantee an adequate supply to our refineries.

I apologise to the Minister of State for not starting with some comments on his speech in opening the debate. He tried to be fair but he left many questions unanswered. Some of them may be left to the Committee stage but I ask the Under-Secretary of State to answer quite a few tonight.

My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) presented a thorough analysis of the Bill. It might have been helpful if the Minister's approach had been as scrupulously detailed. My hon. Friend pointed out the effect that the measure might have and demonstrated how the dismantling of BNOC might weaken our national capacity to influence decision-making offshore and perhaps reduce our capacity to secure proper development of the oil market. He showed how the Bill could be seriously disadvantageous to the security of supply—a point which my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) pursued when he pointed out that the oil reserves that have been bequeathed to us are like seed corn which is being used improperly.

Several of my hon. Friends referred to the debate on 18 December when the House considered those sections of the 1984-85 Supplementary Estimates concerning the Energy Department. Much of that debate related to the position and role of BNOC. My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney showed in that debate how it was assumed at the time of its shearing, when the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982 was being considered, that BNOC would be left with an important role which would ensure that the national interest was served.

Reference has already been made to the contribution of the Minister of State on 18 December. I trust that the Under-Secretary of State will offer an adequate comment on that contribution. It is interesting to note that only five months ago, in that debate, the Minister of State recognised that "the United Kingdom continental shelf and the price that Britain secures for oil in international markets is not"— and, in my view, most not remain—

"entirely under the control of international integrated companies. We must also ensure that there are some arm's length sales at transparent prices." — [Official Report, 18 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 230.]

We have seen a tremendous change since then. The hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) seemed to adopt his customary posture of running very rapidly to be able to say, "Me, too" to the Government when they make any change in energy policy, but he must have run with enormous speed in this case because the Minister's conversion has taken place in a much shorter period than the five months that have elapsed since that debate. I trust that the Under-Secretary of State will provide a further explanation of the speed of conversion that the House has witnessed.

To be fair, several Conservative Members have sought to ensure that the destruction is humane. In addition to that humanity, my hon. Friends are deeply concerned, perhaps because some of them belong to the same trade union as the staff of BNOC, that the treatment of the staff shall be generous. It has been suggested that fair arrangements will be made. The Under-Secretary of State may prefer to wait until the Committee stage before he provides detailed information about that. The distinguished and often extremely important and valuable service that BNOC staff have provided over the years should be properly recognised. Will any of them be retained in the agency? May we have an assurance that those who feel sickened by the Government's sudden conversion and who do not wish to serve in the new agency will not be under any compulsion to remain?

Perhaps the Government will provide, through their various job creation schemes or educational arrangements, an opportunity for them to set up in consultative capacities so that they may become gamekeepers turned poachers, or the other way round. It will be a pity if the Government's behaviour has so disturbed the diligent and devoted staff of BNOC that they feel unable to remain in the public service. Over the years they have developed not only experience and knowledge but a commitment to their organisation, and that should not be so sweepingly eradicated.

The debate has not ranged as widely as I had suspected it might, and I am anxious to comment on the various speeches that have been made. For example, I thought that attention might have been paid earlier to a speech that the Minister made in Texas on 7 May last. His remarks were relevant to national energy policy, and our feelings about his speech on that occasion illustrate the difference that exists between the two sides of the House on this issue.

Speaking in Texas, the Minister boasted about our capital investment in the oil industry and the record levels of exploration and appraisal drilling. He said that 182 wells had been started in 1984—a considerable number, though perhaps not enough to please the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes. The Minister thought that the number of wells drilled this year might be even greater than last year's total. He was pleased about there having been an increase in the amount of oil being discovered. That is not surprising, with more wells being drilled.

In that speech, the Minister failed to perceive that the oil companies—no matter how closely attached to them some Conservative Members may be and no matter how cordial relations with them may be, so that the Minister can talk about informal agreements which might help us in our hour of need—are devoted to profits.

Mr. Hannam: What about the trade unions?

Mr. Hardy: The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam)—who made a complacent speech to which I shall come—is right to refer to trade unions, which, naturally, seek to improve conditions for their members. They would be misguided if they did not.

Likewise, the first obligation of the companies is to make profits—one might say, to perform the role of the vulture, and the vulture goes where the pickings are easy — and it is inevitable that they will look after themselves. [Interruption.] Conservative Members should not be surprised that we have a grasp of capitalist economics. The oil companies go for profits, and because at present the profits are attractive, they are rushing into the North sea.

The Minister boasted in Texas that the United Kingdom was the fifth largest producer of oil. That is true, but it is not the most prudent oil-producing country. It does not have the fifth largest reserves of oil. There are 20 or 25 countries—there may be more—that have larger oil reserves than we do. They are not boasting that they are in a good position.

While a number of Conservative Members — the speech of the former Secretary of State for Energy, the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) was notable for its complacency—may believe that oil prices in the rest of the 1980s may be less than they were in real terms in 1983, the fact remains that oil is a diminishing resource. The Government cannot expect that the British oil requirement will be met in full for much longer from our reserves. By the middle of the 1990s—I should be delighted if the Under-Secretary would comment on this —we shall be dependent once again. It is a pity that such a short-sighted view exists.

I do not know whether Conservative Members have studied the effect that that will have on a rundown economy which is already in dire difficulty. During the past five years we have seen industrial devastation to an unparalleled extent. That which properly harvested, planned, and depleted could have maintained Britain in some semblance of prosperity has been eagerly rushed at and exploited on the grounds that low prices will continue indefinitely. Even with a further deterioration in the Gulf, with an escalation of the conflict between Iran and Iraq, we are told that we need not worry unduly. That is gambling with the national interest in a way which is utterly reprehensible.

A number of my hon. Friends and one or two Conservative Members asked some questions. I want the Under-Secretary to respond to some of the detailed ones. To assist him, I shall emphasise some of the more significant questions. We are entitled to ask the Under-Secretary to estimate the volume of royalty oil which will accrue in the next year or two. We are entitled to ask him —despite the fact that some of the points will have to be dealt with in Committee—to offer a guarantee about the forced transfer of staff. We are entitled to expect him to say whether he will allow the independent oil companies, in particular the smaller ones, to sell to the agency.

Minnows must still swim. We cannot allow the offshore waters to be feeding grounds merely for the larger, major companies. The minnows must survive. They must have, if they wish, the capacity to trade. The agency must therefore be able to take oil from the smaller independents. If the Government are not prepared to make such a concessionary arrangement, that will once again demonstrate their interest in business, but it is big business that dominates their priorities.

Will the Under-Secretary refer to participation agreements? There has been some confusion about them. I should like to know how many participation agreements will be on a six-month and how many on a 12-month basis. The relevant information about those agreements should be given.

It was reprehensible of the Minister of State not to deal adequately with BNOC's financial basis. Several of my hon. Friends——

Mr. Rowlands: Unprecedented.

Mr. Hardy: My hon. Friend uses the word unprecedented. I suppose that it is inevitable that if the Minister's advisers are not fully informed about the matter he may wish to leave it until the Bill is in Committee.

The Bill is peculiar in its structure in that certain provisions are made in schedules that I should have thought—I am no lawyer and have no pretensions about having a draftsman's ability — should be in clauses. Since those provisions deal with financial matters, we are entitled to a more credible presentation.

What was BNOC's financial position during the last financial year? Will the Under-Secretary of State say something about the fees which have accrued to BNOC and which may have some relevance to the Department? We wish to know about BNOC's financial structure and the financial structure of the new agency. If the Under-Secretary of State cares to offer an explanation or an apology as to the nature and character of the Bill, which will be in Committee next week, that will be well received, at least by the Opposition.

The House is aware that one of BNOC's important functions is its involvement in committees that consider the technical requirements and problems posed by North sea development. By BNOC's presence on those committees, it acquires information and experience that is available for the public interest. If BNOC were dismantled, a real risk would be faced. Unless the Secretary of State positively instructs the agency to be involved in these committees, his Department and the public interest will be deprived of information and experience which will be sadly missed.

I must end in a few moments because I should hate the Under-Secretary of State not to have sufficient time to answer the questions posed by my hon. Friends. It will be a matter of considerable regret and will make it more difficult for the Government to fulfil their timetable if they cannot provide that information this evening. If they cannot, I trust that the Committee stage will not be far advanced before we receive an explanation of the points that concern us.

BNOC has been criticised for its losses of between £40 million and £50 million. I accept the fact that the Minister of State did not offer that criticism, but other hon. Members have talked about the accumulated losses. Will the Under-Secretary of State confirm that had BNOC—perhaps acting on a ministerial suggestion—not engaged in that activity the losses to the nation would have been scores of times higher than the minimal loss incurred by BNOC's intervention in the market? Any accusation of incompetence or loss making by BNOC needs to be qualified.

I shall make one further reference to the speech made by the Minister of State in Houston which received little attention. I make this point because my constituency is a long way from the sea but is deeply affected by the industrial devastation that has been experienced in so many parts of Britain since 1979. Because of the need to regenerate our industry, I was delighted to see that the Minister had realised that orders must accrue to British industry and commerce. The right hon. Gentleman needs to be careful, because I do not think that two heretics would be allowed in one Department at the present time. By his perception of the need to promote industrial orders as a result of offshore activity, the right hon. Gentleman departed from the traditional pattern of responsibility in the Department.

When the Labour Government were elected in 1974, they found that only about 20 per cent. of the value of offshore orders was benefiting British commerce and industry. By the time the Labour Government left office in 1979, that share had been built up to almost 80 per cent. It has never touched that level since the present Government took office in 1979. In some areas — pipelines, drilling tools and equipment—over one third of the orders are going to industries in other nations. The Government have always taken the view that they have an obligation to share the benefit of our offshore inheritance with our European partners. Our European partners would not take quite the same attitude if the legacy was theirs.

It is delightful that the Minister now recognises that orders should accrue to Britain. It is a pity that he did not perceive it before or that people such as the right hon. Member for Guildford, who inflicted a great deal of complacency on the House today, did not perceive it earlier. [Interruption.] I am sorry if the right hon. Gentleman feels that I am being unfair, but the share of offshore orders accruing to British industry during his tenure of office fell abysmally, which was sad, and perhaps helped to generate in a small way the enormous growth of unemployment that has so affected us all.

Mr. David Howell: I do not know what figures the hon. Gentleman is quoting, but if he looks at the facts he will see that, although our share of offshore orders is never enough—we would like more for our industry—it rose steadily in the early 1980s, and has achieved some substantial levels. My noble Friend Lord Gray of Contin, who was Minister of State at that time, was able to tell the House of some encouraging figures. Therefore, I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has got his facts right.

Mr. Hardy: I have got my facts absolutely right. The right hon. Gentleman need only look at the Brown Book that he issued when he was in office and the ones that have been issued since then to see that over the past year there has been a slight improvement in most sectors of the offshore market, but the fact remains that there was a decline after 1979. I recall asking the right hon. Gentleman a question about the matter when he was Secretary of State. I said that there had been a disappointing fall. I was given the explanation that in 1979 there had been some particularly large orders that had benefited British industry. Ministers said that it was reasonable for us to operate on a 60 per cent. to 64 per cent. share. In fact, Britain's unemployment problem is now so severe that we cannot possibly allow our share of, for example, drilling equipment or pipeline orders to be as low as 61 or 62 per cent., which it has been in the past few years. The right hon. Gentleman can look at the record of the Department of Energy. It is published, and it is clear.

I do not believe that I have anything to apologise for. None of my right hon. Friends and hon. Friends who spoke in the debate about an institution that could continue to serve the nation has anything to be ashamed of. We are entirely right and justified in asking the House to vote against this pernicious and nasty, if consistent, Bill.

9.33 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): With the debates on the two reports from the Select Committee on Energy and a full day's debate today, the House has had extensive opportunities in this Session to consider the recent developments in the structure of the oil market. I should like to join my right hon. Friend the Minister of State and the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) in their tributes to the work of the Select Committee and in what they said about the directors and staff of BNOC.

We have had many knowledgable and constructive speeches. I intend to respond to as many as I can of the main points that my hon. Friends and Opposition Members have raised. The detailed issues can be considered in Committee.

The Bill is a modest measure. The hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) asked me to comment on its format. There is no need for any apology. It establishes a small successor body to BNOC, and the structure of the Bill is appropriate for that body. The Government's reasons for abolishing BNOC and for retaining the small number of the corporation's functions that continue to be needed have been fully explained to the House.

Since my right hon. Friend the Minister of State's announcement of 13 March, we have moved swiftly to prepare the Bill and to lay the ground for setting up the new agency. The management of BNOC has made vast progress to rid itself of the supplies which put its finances at risk, and has urgently sorted out redundancy payments for staff who will not be transferred to the agency so that they may know where they stand as early as possible.

The Government have not followed the suggestions of some Opposition Members who, it seems, would have preferred BNOC to have remained, like King Canute, immovable on the beach while the tide of the changed structure in the oil market engulfed it. We must remember that world oil prices are determined by the balance between supply and demand. Neither the Government nor BNOC has wished or been able to affect that. An alternative Government containing Opposition Members might wish it were otherwise, but such wishes are hypothetical. What has been crucial is the avoidance of any actions that could have destabilished the market. That is why, when BNOC disposed of large amounts of crude under term contracts, it ensured that its pricing proposals were handled delicately. Within moments, on a market dominated by spot and spot-related transactions, the corporation's slight capacity to promote stability changed into a potential for promoting instability. In those circumstances, if BNOC's abolition has any effect on the world market, it will be beneficial.

No action by BNOC, even if its board were comprised of omniscient angels, could have averted the market change. The management and staff coped admirably in circumstances that proved to be impossible.

For other hon. Members—in general they are not on the Opposition Benches—the Bill has not been radical enough. Some of my hon. Friends have argued that, having proposed the discontinuation of some of BNOC's functions, we should have gone the whole hog. The Government would not wish to lay claim to such omniscience. There has been a change in market structures which was not envisaged by either party when BNOC was established and which was scarcely envisaged when Britoil was privatised 30 months ago. The market structure might change again. If we have destroyed participation agreements, we might live to regret it in the event of such a change. It remains the Government's view that the Bill strikes the right balance.

Several Opposition Members have charged the Government, and especially my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, with inconsistency. That is not justified. The Government have recognised and reacted to changes. The Government and BNOC cannot influence oil prices in the longer term, and do not wish to do so. In so far as BNOC has any influence in the short term, it rightly exerted that influence to avoid destabilising the oil market. Last July, the spot market plunged on account of temporary destocking and rumours of large barter deals by producing countries. This appeared to be a short-term speculative move. BNOC accordingly and correctly maintained the prices that it paid to suppliers, which were intended to be term prices. To have reduced them would have been to confirm and reinforce current speculation and to have risked setting off a competitive downward spiral of term prices.

BNOC reduced prices in October in response to a change in market fundamentals which had reduced the value of light crudes such as those from the North sea as compared with heavier crudes from the middle east and South America. Speculative downward pressures reappeared and, for much of the past nine months, the spot prices at which BNOC has had to sell its oil are lower than the term prices at which it had to purchase its barrels. In such circumstances, a loss was inevitable. This has happened before. In the debate on the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Bill the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) referred to losses in the summer of 1981. If, by reducing its prices, BNOC had enhanced speculative pressures, its losses could have been magnified.

Right hon. and hon. Members have accused the Government of propping up the oil price. That is utterly false for, as I have explained, we are unable to alter the level of prices in the world market. Sharp movements of oil prices are in nobody's interests. A sharp fall adds to the risks of the world banking system, threatens important debtor countries, and reduces the incentive to energy conservation and substitution away from oil. That would risk making us again, in a few years' time, a captive of OPEC, and the sharp rise that would follow such a fall would damage world economic prospects.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I absolve the Minister of any real attempt to prop up world oil prices, and would condemn the Government for having failed to do so. However, does not the Minister realise that it is over-production from the North sea's Scottish sector, together with production from Mexico and the Norwegian sector, that is swamping the world market and contributing to the downward pressure? In that respect, the Minister is a victim of over-production and of inadequacies of policy.

Mr. Goodlad: I am interested to hear that the Scottish National party would wish to slow down the development of the North sea. Perhaps we should reflect on the effect of that on job prospects in Scotland. However, since the hon. Gentleman has only just joined the debate, he will not have heard what has been said on the subject.

In the past, BNOC's pricing arrangements could make a slight contribution to averting the danger of violent price changes. However, with the change in market structures, they have become a potential for sparking off such violent changes.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney asked for an assurance about the sale of royalty in kind. I assure him that there is no commitment on either BNOC or the agency to sell back to the producers any royalty in kind in oil that licensees produce. I was also asked about the value of the royalty oil sold in the current financial year. It was worth just over £2·2 billion. Royalty oil comprises roughly 10 per cent. of all oil production from the United Kingdom's continental shelf.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney and the hon. Member for Wentworth asked for an unusual assurance — that no BNOC staff should be forced to transfer to the agency. As, fortunately, the Socialist state has not yet dawned in this country the Government have neither means nor intention of forcing BNOC staff to transfer. What is important is that those members of staff who will be offered jobs in the agency should soon be identified and that the board of BNOC should make known what redundancy payments will be made to those not required. I believe that that has now been done.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney asked about BNOC's finances after the Supplementary Estimates approved by the House in December and March. My Department made grants totalling £67,209,000 to the corporation under section 6 of the Oil and Gas (Enterprise) Act 1982. Those payments restored the financial reserves to a level that should be more than adequate to enable BNOC to meet all commitments liable to arise prior to the transfer of its residual assets and liabilities to the new agency.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney also asked about BNOC's institutional arrangements. BNOC was unique as a seller of oil in that its announced price was even more a price applicable to its suppliers than to its customers. The effects of its secure access and pricing provisions and the participation agreements is that it has had to propose uniform transparent prices. That has precluded any hidden discounts, barter deals or processing arrangements. Statoil, which sells only oil, was in quite a different position. That uniform transparent price achieved symbolic significance, so that any change in it was not really neutral but carried the risk of destabilising the market, as my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) demonstrated with his usual eloquence.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney also made a plea, in his usual impassioned way, to the effect that the agency should sell the oil produced by small independent companies. There are four reasons why I do not accept that it is necessary for a public sector body to be involved in such trading. First, many small producers existed, and operated satisfactorily, before BNOC was created. Secondly, the policy of participation halved the availability of their production and so made it more difficult for the small companies to trade the remainder. Thirdly, the hon. Gentleman said that 20 years ago the major refineries refused to purchase oil from the independents. Similarly, I suspect that the difficulties anticipated by Westar in its evidence to the Select Committee were based on the world of 20 years ago. Then the major companies had potential oil production in excess of their refinery needs. Now their refinery needs are greater than their supplies, and they are eager to contract oil from independent producers. I suspect that Opposition Members may be living in the 1960s rather than today.

Fourthly, the danger of allowing the agency to act as a marketer for small companies is that it would yet again get into the business of setting a price to its suppliers. It would then run the same risk of destabilising the market as BNOC has run during the past few months.

My right hon. Friend the Minister referred to the assurances given by the oil companies on the security of supply. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney and the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) poured cold water on that. I cannot disclose the details because they are commercially confidential. The assurances do not have the legally binding force of contracts. I should be surprised if the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen were suggesting that companies of that size, which are dependent on their United Kingdom operation for their economic success, would risk going back on their word. If that is so, what is the use of participation? The British motorist cannot burn crude oil in his engine, nor the textile mills in their boilers. They require products which, whoever supplies the crude, must come from private companies, which Opposition Members consider to be unreliable. My hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) was accurate in his analysis of that point.

The right hon. Member for Govan pointed out that it would be several months after participation options were reactivated before oil would flow to the agency again. Several other hon. Members also probed how the security of supply would be preserved. It is correct that lead times of several months are built into the participation agreements. However, we should consider the position if participation options were already being exercised.

If the agency were by then able to sell the oil on term contracts, it would need many months to get out of those contracts to supply more oil to Britain. It would be reluctant to do so in case it spoilt its market when circumstances returned to normal. That happened in the late 1970s. What if the agency were obliged to sell its participation spot as BNOC must do now? There is no reason why the refining companies in the United Kingdom should not equally be able to buy that oil spot. BNOC claims to have diverted 100,000 barrels a day to United Kingdom companies in 1979. That is 12 months or more after the crisis of that time had started. The increase in all United Kingdom oil supplies between 1978 and 1979 amounts to only 30,000 barrels a day — less than the addition to the companies' own supplies from the North sea.

The oil companies which received BNOC's supplies must have diverted other supplies from the United Kingdom. Our increase of 30,000 barrels a day—about 2 per cent. of our demand—compares with increases of 11 per cent. to France, 15 per cent. to West Germany and 10 per cent. to the Netherlands. Moreover, United Kingdom stocks in that period increased by more than 30,000 barrels a day. Therefore, in spite of active participation, or possibly because of it, supplies to the United Kingdom increased by less than supplies to our continental neighbours, and none of the increase reached our consumers.

Reference has been made to the Energy Act 1976, which gives my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy comprehensive powers to control production, supply, acquisition, use and price of crude oil and oil products. Similarly, reference was made to the International Energy Agency arrangements.

My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannan) asked what would trigger the Secretary of State's consent to reactivation of participation and the assurances given by the oil companies. On the latter, there is no question in general of triggering; the assurances are an ongoing recognition of the companies' responsibilities to the British market. On the former, I would not wish to be precise. There will be no question of an international trigger. It would be for the Government of the day to decide whether the threat to world oil supplies had become sufficiently close to justify the disturbance which reactivation would create.

My hon. Friend also drew attention to the queues in Britain in the late 1970s compared with the adequacy of supplies on the Continent. May that not have happened because of Government intervention on participation and —much more devastating—price control?

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney drew attention to the remarks made by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State last December on tax reference prices, and the right hon. Member for Govan questioned whether the abolition of BNOC would result in a lack of information on the pricing of oil for taxation purposes. In fact, there is substantial evidence of spot prices published in the trade press. The oil taxation office is confident that fair arm's length prices can be established for valuing oil traded within the individual companies. The oil taxation office has plenty of expertise, and, the right hon. Gentleman will be relieved to know, plenty of accountants. The corporation's contribution to tax valuation came from its ability to find a firm market-related term price acceptable to both producers and customers. It did not come from grassing to the oil taxation office on the disgraceful habits of the oil companies. Once BNOC could no longer find a term price acceptable to producers and consumers, it was no longer able to contribute to tax valuations.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), in a thoughtful speech that demonstrated his considerable knowledge of this subject, asked why the Government should continue to take royalty in kind oil. Taking royalty in kind provides the Government with some oil immediately available during an interruption to world oil supplies, so long as that oil is not being sold on long-term contracts. It also provides a quantity of oil that can be sold at arm's length and, therefore, offers some protection should the open market for United Kingdom continental shelf oil be threatened.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney questioned my right hon. Friend's announcement today about LPG trading. The removal of the public sector in LPG trading is unlikely to have a major impact on prices. BNOC was handling less than 30 per cent. of United Kingdom continental shelf production, and less than 20 per cent. of total United Kingdom output, including that from refineries. BNOC's influence with the market was, therefore, not wide ranging and the ending of this trading role will have little influence on the market. It is unlikely that the business would remain viable without the volume provided under participation.

Our discussions with the LPG industry lead us to expect that a company or group will soon emerge to fill the role of BNOC in collecting small parcels of LPG from producers who have only small quantities available. I do not believe that small producers' interests will be disadvantaged in any way.

The right hon. Member for Govan claimed that the Government had no depletion policy. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), on behalf of the Liberal party, suggested that the depletion policy should be reconsidered, although it was not clear how his party would do that. It is the Government's objective to promote the successful exploration for and maximum economic recovery of the United Kingdom's petroleum resources. That policy lay behind the major fiscal changes in 1983, and the Government have been encouraged by the oil industry's response to those measures in the acceleration of exploration and development programmes.

At the same time, the pace of development has been considerably helped by the industry being free from artificial and arbitrary controls on production. Licensees are free to manage production from their fields within a framework of consents or approvals based on the requirements of good oilfield practice and tight controls on gas flaring. It would clearly not be consistent with the Government's policy to impose arbitrary restrictions on the output from producing fields in the present circumstances. The Government of which the right hon. Member for Govan was so prominent a member recognised that point clearly when Mr. Varley, then Secretary of State, had to give licensees detailed assurances that he would not use the powers that he was about to take.

The Government retain reserve powers to limit United Kingdom continental shelf oil production, but, as the Select Committee on Energy's third report in 1982 recognised, the circumstances in which they might be used would relate to specific and overriding circumstances in the national interest or to a radical change in circumstances pertaining to the United Kingdom continental shelf and its development. A move to cut United Kingdom production now would impose clear and tangible losses on the nation, while there is great uncertainty about potential benefits, given that the United Kingdom has only 5 per cent. of world oil production.

Therefore, the use of those powers in the present market circumstances is unjustified. Perhaps Liberal Members believe that, with the help of the wise and the good, they can quantify the benefits of cutting production. I remind them that, only four years ago, the wise and the good were confidently forecasting ever-increasing oil prices.

The right hon. Member for Govan raised the question of the effects on the staff of the suddenness of the announcement of the abolition of BNOC. My right hon. Friend would have wished to avoid the sudden nature of the announcement, but there was no alternative to the most strict secrecy, given the opportunities for speculation that any rumours could have given. The right hon. Member also complained that the Bill hands over the oil business to the private companies. What business? All oil is produced by private companies, refined by private companies and distributed to British consumers by private companies. BNOC has been taking oil from one private company and disposing of it to another. I wish that I could claim that the Bill advanced the Government's privatisation programme, but I fear that I cannot.

Mr. Hardy: It would be remiss of us not to thank the Under-Secretary for attempting to answer a number of detailed questions. However, I trust that before he concludes he will offer some comment about schedule 3 and in particular the almost unprecedented nature of the Government's approach in presenting a Bill on the financial structure of the agency and not yet having said a word about it.

Mr. Goodlad: A large number of matters need to be covered, and I shall come to that important point if I have time.

It is instructive to recall the reaction to my right hon. Friend's announcement on 13 March. The Times, in a leader, talked of "the intrinsic rightness of the Government's decision" and went on to report that the timing of the announcment was being described within the oil industry as "masterful". Even The Guardian, not normally the most vociferous of our supporters, reported the abolition of BNOC as

"the boldest step this Government has taken in the energy field."

The oil markets and the foreign exchange markets reacted calmly to the announcement.

Many OPEC leaders recognised that the opportunties that had been available to BNOC in the past to stabilise the market had disappeared as the structure of the oil market had changed. Our colleagues in Europe and the United States greeted the news with unqualified approval, although many of them were not surprised.

Our critics claim that we shall be weakening our control over the destination of North sea oil, but that is incorrect. The ability to use the participation agreements when they are useful for security of supply will not be affected by these proposals, and the landing requirement for North Sea oil will remain unchanged.

It is perhaps a little difficult to discern the basis for the resistance to the Bill of hon. Members opposite but I suspect that it derives from their simple beliefs that the national interest is best served by expanding the public sector as far as possible, and that state control is preferable to private sector initiative. Perhaps they feel that the defence of the public sector against the supposed attacks of the Government should be proclaimed at every opportunity, even if they cannot work out how that philosophy should be applied to the unusual circumstances of BNOC. Or perhaps they think that the enunciation of some sound Socialist principles, however fatuous, will go down well with their constituency parties.

I hope that on further reflection they will recognise that, given the change in the structure of the oil market, it is clear to all that no responsible Government of any colour could have proposed measures very different from those set out in the Bill.

In a decade, Government policy towards state involvement in the development of North sea oil has turned full circle. Ten years ago almost to the week, the House was debating the Second Reading of the Petroleum and Submarine Pipe-lines Bill. That provided for the establishment of BNOC as an instrument of state involvement and so-called public ownership in the North sea such as would satisfy the most doctrinaire of Socialists.

All that has changed. In 1982, the Government put BNOC's exploration and production business into a new company, Britoil, and transferred these activities to where they rightly belonged—the private sector. The effects of our removing the dead hand of the state from the North sea has been dramatic. In 1983, a record number of 128 offshore exploration and appraisal wells were drilled on the United Kingdom continental shelf. Last year heralded a major increase of 15 per cent. in our gas reserves.

All of these achievements reflect the Government's careful nurturing of the North sea, and it is a record of which we are justifiably proud. In the context of this substantial level of activity in the North sea, the new agency will have a modest role. The Bill is in the interests of both the British oil industry and the country. Therefore, I warmly commend it to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Ports (Finance) Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. — [Mr. Sainsbury.]

OIL AND PIPELINES BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Oil and Pipelines Bill ('the Act'), it is expedient to authorise:—

(a) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of sumes required by the Secretary of State for defraying expenditure of, or making grants to, the Oil and Pipelines Agency ('the Agency');

(b) the payment out of the Consolidated Fund of sums required by the Treasury for fulfilling any guarantee given by them under the Act;

(c) the payment out of the National Loans Fund of sums required by the Secretary of State for making loans to the Agency;

(d) the payment of any sums into the Consolidated Fund or the National Loans Fund.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

Ports (Finance) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

SAFEGUARDING OF FAIR COMPETITION

'The Secretary of State shall not make any grant, loan or guarantee under the provisions of this Act or the Ports (Financial Assistance) Act 1981 save on condition that the same is applied so as not to alter the relative competitive position of any employer of registered dock workers.'.—[Mr. Chope.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

10.15 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I do not expect the clause or the second group of amendments which you have selected, Mr. Speaker, to result in Divisions. I hope that I can draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State my important reservations about the Bill.

My first reservation concerns the increase in public expenditure contemplated by the Bill—£180 million—and whether there are sufficient safeguards of the taxpayers' interests, especially having regard to the financial record of the Port of London Authority and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

My second reservation is that, if we have to pour another £180 million of taxpayers' money into subsidising our ports, we should do so in an even-handed and non-discriminatory fashion. It is to that second point that the new clause is especially directed.

There are three categories of port, and I shall list them in order of privilege. First there are the ports outside the national dock labour scheme. Felixstowe is a prime example of that, and there was a debate about it last night. Those privileged ports are unencumbered by the national dock labour scheme; they are free to bargain terms and conditions with their work forces in accordance with privately arranged agreements.

The second category comprises the ports of London and Liverpool. They are national dock labour scheme ports, weighed down by the burdens of the scheme. However, to a large extent, they are relieved of their burdens by the generosity of this Government's legislation.

The third category comprises the other scheme ports which have to survive without the subsidies that are given to London and Liverpool but which have the millstone of the national dock labour scheme levy around their necks. Principal among those least privileged ports is Southampton.

I understand the Government's policy to be to promote free, open and unsubsidised competition between our many ports. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said on Second Reading that it is right that in a competitive industry we should insist upon an equitable framework for competition.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services was even more explicit five years ago when he was Secretary of State for Transport. He said:

"The Government basically believe that the ports of this country should operate in full competition with one another and meet the normal tests of commercial viability."

It would be unfair to other ports and to British industry generally if we were to pursue any other policy. My concern is that expressions of good intention by Ministers have not been realised.

We began down the road of steadily increasing subsidies to the otherwise bankrupt ports of London and Liverpool in 1980. The Port of London (Financal Assistance) Act 1980 gave £70 million towards to the cost of severing registered dock workers and other staff and for grants, loans and guarantees. The then Minister referred to the strict financial limit as an inherited obligation from the Labour Government. He warned that problems such as those facing the PLA could become permanent if the limit of Government help was not clearly spelt out.

In the Act the limit of Government help was spelt out at a maximum of £70 million—would that that was so today. This Bill proposes that the limit should be raised yet again to a new ceiling of £500 million. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary was explicit in 1980 when he said:

"The aim set for the PLA is to cope with its major problems and to return to profitability by 1983."

He expanded on that by stating that he included within the definition of a return to profitability

"the need for it to service its capital debt, just as any other business does."—[Official Report, 16 April 1980; Vol. 982, c. 1313-79.]

Would that the Port of London Authority had returned to profitability even on the basis that it was not servicing its capital debt. It is far from being in a profitable position today. I am much concerned that nothing that my right hon. Friend or my hon. Friend the Minister of State has said has indicated that there will ever be an end to the open-ended subsidy that is now going to certain ports.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): Southampton included.

Mr. Chope: The subsidy that is going to the port of Southampton is minimal.

Mr. Prescott: Oh.

Mr. Chope: The hon. Gentleman tries to pooh-pooh that, but under the Bill the subsidy that will go to the port of Southampton is limited to a share of £10 million in the first instance with a maximum of £40 million, whereas its principal competitors, the ports of London and Liverpool, are getting £140 million extra. In other words, their subsidy is being increased from £360 million to £500 million. That is just for those two ports alone. If the hon. Member think that that is fair shares, certainly the dockers in Southampton and their Members of Parliament do not agree.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): The new clause refers specifically to "the relative competitive position of any employer of registered dock workers."

The hon. Members seems to be complaining that the subsidy for Southampton compared to that for Merseyside or London is too small. Is that the point that he is seeking to make? If so, he is making it very badly.

Mr. Chope: The point that I make is that the subsidy that is going into London and Liverpool is far in excess of the subsidy for any of the other scheme ports, that that subsidy has been largely wasted in the past and that such limited subsidy as is going to Southampton and scheme ports other than London and Liverpool is far too little compared with what London and Liverpool are getting. My private view is that the ports of London and Liverpool should have been allowed to go bankrupt a long time ago. If that had happened the port of Southampton would be thriving to a far greater extent than it is.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey) rose——

Mr. Chope: I do not question the sincerity with which my right hon. Friend spoke in 1980 in the debate on the Port of London (Financial Assistance) Bill, but the sad reality is that there is no evidence that the port of London is any nearer profitability than it was in 1980, despite financial assistance of over £170 million. Of that, £45·4 million was for registered dock worker severance, £56·9 million for the severance of non-registered dock workers and £68·1 million for guarantee loan deficit grant and written-off debt.

On the basis that all scheme ports have benefited from the £45·4 million subsidy for registered dock worker severance, the payments to the Port of London Authority in breach of the principle of fair competition enunicated in the new clause total £125 million since 1980. That sum has been ploughed into the Port of London Authority in unfair competition with other ports.

It is perhaps fortunate for other ports that the Port of London Authority has not used that subsidy solely to improve its competitive position. Much of it has been frittered away in subsidising strikes, restrictive practices and employee terms and conditions which are generous to say the least.

The sad aspect of the subsidies that are going into our ports is that they are going to people who are earning £190 a week or more and are being paid for by people earning £100 a week or less. That is my main complaint. The Government are expecting people on relatively low earnings to subsidise the privileged dockers in a group of ports who are benefiting from these indiscriminate subsidies.

Mr. Simon Hughes: How does the hon. Gentleman reconcile that argument with the fact that in some areas there is, for the local work force, almost no other industry, unlike the position in his town, while in some areas, not least in London, the cost of living—the cost of homes and the like—is considerably greater than in some of the places about which he is speaking? If there is to be justice, it should be justice for the workers and not simply in relation to competition. That principle too should concern the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Chope: I shall be dealing with that. If those who work in the Port of London Authority were that conscious of their privilege in having jobs there, I am surprised that they were prepared to forfeit 40,800 man days in strikes last year and 88,400 in 1983, to cite but two recent years.

The hon. Gentleman fails to take account of the reality that in the Port of London Authority is a group pf privileged registered dock workers who are taking advantage of their privileged position and have been holding the rest of the country to ransom, who are enjoying the privilege of not being able to be made compulsorily redundant, who have been withdrawing their labour and adding to the cost of the port and who expect the bill to be picked up by the taxpayers, and they are ordinary people earning much less than the dockers.

The scheme ports, other than London and Liverpool, are entitled to know when this unfair subsidy to London and Liverpool will end. The taxpayer is entitled to know what conditions the Government are putting on the new finance of £140 million under clause 2. Is it throwing more good money after bad, or is there a strategy behind it?

[Mr. Chope]

Most of that money, as I say, is coming from people who would enjoy being in the privileged position of the dockers in the Port of London Authority, enjoying a minimum rate of pay of £120 a week, even for doing nothing, and an average rate of pay of £190 a week for doing, relatively speaking, precious little.

Mr. Prescott: What is the hon. Gentleman's daily rate?

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend acknowledged on Second Reading that the taxpayers' payments

"have given the PLA and the MDHC an advantage which other port undertakings have not had".—[Official Report, 23 April 1985; Vol. 77, c. 800.]

The purpose of the new clause is to blow the whistle on this unfair competition and to accept that there must come a time when it ceases to be subsidised by the general body of taxpayers.

Let us reflect on some of the facts concerning the Port of London Authority and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company. Even with £170 million in subsidy to the Port of London Authority—that authority had a turnover in 1983 of about £74 million—it suffered trading losses in the four years to 1983 of £24·45 million.

10.30 pm

There were 1,691 registered dock workers employed in the port of London on 1 January 1985. That was substantially fewer than in 1984 and previous years. Those still employed in the port of London feel that they can strike when it suits them regardless of the consequences for their port. That is in stark contrast to the attitude in Southampton where, as a result of carefully negotiated agreements between the work force and the employers, a no-strike agreement and a two-year pay and conditions agreement have been entered into. Many dockers in Southampton have taken a pay cut to keep the port of Southampton viable. Would that the port of London dockers had accepted the same approach to deal with the financial difficulties facing that port.

Unfortunately, the attitude of those dockers, perhaps encouraged by the legislation that the Government have passed, is to assume that they have an indefinitely rosy future based upon grants and subsidies provided by the taxpayer.

If those who work in the port of London recognised that their jobs were on the line, they would not spend as much time on strike as they have during the past two years. During 1983 and 1984, in the port of London alone, 129,000 man days were lost. The revenue cost of strike action to the Port of London Authority in 1984 was apparently £1·25 million. That compares favourably with the revenue lost by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company which suffered a similar loss of man days. That is perhaps a sign of the productivity of the different work forces.

Mr. Snape: The hon. Gentleman will concede that for various reasons some man days have been lost in Southampton. He has plainly done some work on this new clause. If he feels that London has had a greater share of the scheme than it deserves, will he compare container manning in Southampton with Tilbury?

Mr. Chope: I wish that I could give the House the details of container manning in the port of London. Unfortunately, the questions that I have asked my hon. Friend the Minister of State about efficiency increases in the port of London have resulted in bland answers and a protestation that a detailed inquiry would be in breach of the responsibility that the port has for its own activities and in breach of commercial confidentiality.

The work force and management of the port of Southampton agreed that they would eliminate the restrictive practices which had burdened the port for a long time. They reduced the basic rate of pay by up to 25 per cent. and substantially reduced the work force. For about three months, there was no regular work load. These measures resulted in the port of Southampton being highly competitive in national and international markets and winning back business from the ports of Felixstowe and Liverpool. The port of Southampton intends winning back business from other ports as well. It is doing so on the basis of sacrifices by the individuals who work in the port to ensure that the port survives to fight another day.

The evidence that I have been given in answer to about 40 parliamentary questions during the past fortnight is that the attitude of those who work for the Port of London Authority and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company is very different from the attitude of those who work for the port of Southampton. Those who work for the port of Southampton realise that their destiny is in their own hands, whereas those who work for the other two bodies seem to think that, regardless of what they do, the Government and the Conservative Goverment in particular, will give them a handout to meet the deficits that they cause by their irresponsible actions.

Before the intervention by the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), I was reminding the House that, even after £170 million of subsidy, compared with an annual turnover in 1983 of £704 million, the Port of London Authority suffered trading losses of £24·45 million in the four years to 1983. That shows that the authority has not begun to become competitive and self-financing in accordance with the Government's resolve when they began to give subsidies to that port in 1980. Whenever those subsidies have been increased, my right hon. and hon. Friends have responded by saying that the subsidies were made to enable the authority to get back on its own feet and become financially viable.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Can my hon. Friend help us with his observations on the effect of subsidies on the efficient operation of scheme ports, especially the Port of London Authority and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company? What effect do the subsidies have on the ability of non-scheme ports to compete with scheme ports?

Mr. Chope: I cannot deal in detail with my hon. Friend's intervention. It is estimated that the national dock labour scheme adds 7·5 per cent. to the cost of each container dealt with by the port of Southampton. That is a cost that the ports of Felixstowe, London and Liverpool do not have to bear. The ports of London and Liverpool also receive additional subsidies. Scheme ports, other than London and Liverpool, are severely discriminated against. They are in the third division when it comes to fair competition.

Mr. Hickmet: In that case, if the port of Southampton and similar ports were no longer in the national dock labour scheme, what effect would that have on the viability, profitability and efficiency of those ports?

Mr. Chope: I can only speculate that on the basis of the commitment shown by the work force in Southampton and its management, and given fair competition between the ports up and down the country, Southampton would come out pretty near the top, as it has done in the first division of the Football League this season. There is the will in Southampton to succeed. Given fair competition, it will succeed. I venture to suggest that if we did not have the national dock labour scheme we would not have had the submission before the House last night from the port of Felixstowe to extend its operation. Felixstowe is benefiting from the fact that all its competitors have a millstone round their necks, otherwise known as the national dock labour scheme.

It is the burden of my argument that a port that wishes to get its own house in order, as the port of Southampton has shown clearly over the past few months, is still inhibited because of that unfair competition. The purpose of the new clause is to ensure that there is fair competition between the ports in a way that there has not been in the past.

I think that the House will agree that the position of the Port of London Authority is bad enough. However, the Ports (Financial Assistance) Act 1981 extended the regime of indiscriminate subsidy to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company and lifted the ceiling on payments, which had originally been £70 million, to £160 million. Later, in the Transport (Finance) Act 1982, that ceiling was raised to £360 million.

What has the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company done with all the subsidy money that it has received from taxpayers? Admittedly, it has to an extent reduced its work force. It has reduced the number of registered dock workers. With the benefit of subsidy, it has also reduced the number of non-registered dock workers. However, its net trading losses in the five years between 1980 and 1984 amounted to £18·91 million. That is after subsidy of £144·4 million. I accept that £37·5 million of that sum was on account of the severance of registered dock workers, and it could be said that that subsidy was common to all the scheme ports.

However, I cannot say the same in respect of the additional £106·9 million that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company received in respect of severance of non-registered dock workers and on account of guaranteed loan and deficit grant. Those are enormous sums of money. One can compare them with the turnover of that company in 1983, which was £57 million. The total subsidy that has supported the unfair competition about which I complain so strongly has been excessive. It has been the equivalent of two years' turnover of the whole port.

If I could say to the House, "Well, they are trying to do their best in the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company to put their house in order," that would be some mitigation, but I have to tell the House that last year 48,200 days were lost through strike action in the port of Liverpool. That has resulted in £4 million in lost revenue and an additional £2 million in lost profits. It is clear from those figures that the docks are being subsidised indiscriminately.

The management of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company has thought fit to increase the basic wages of dock workers in Liverpool far in excess of those enjoyed by most others, not least teachers, during the past five years. The House should not have much sympathy for that organisation. In 1984, the basic wages of dockers were raised by 7·4 per cent., the previous year they were raised by 9·1 per cent., the year before that by 10 per cent., the year before that by 14 per cent. and in 1980 they were raised by 18 per cent. Although there is still a substantial surplus of registered dock workers, they receive an average of £189 a week and overtime is available.

When do the Government expect the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company and the Port of London Authority to be able to trade profitably and without the benefit of any financial assistance from the Government and the taxpayer? I am sorry to say that, on 13 May, in answer to a written question to that effect I received the reply:

"That will depend primarily on how quickly they can match their work forces to the requirements of present and future patterns of trade."—[Official Report, 13 May 1985; Vol. 79, c. 66.]

I also asked when restrictive working practices would be eliminated and received the bland answer that the details were commercially confidential. The details of the agreement made in Southampton last year to remove restrictive practices to make the port competitive were not regarded as commercially confidential. They were available to employees, shareholders and those with an interest in the port. Surely the great British taxpayer, who is keeping the ports of Liverpool and London from bankruptcy, should be entitled to more detailed answers about the progress — or lack of it — towards the elimination of restrictive working practices.

On 25 March 1981, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services said on Second Reading of the Ports (Financial Assistance) Bill:

"At any successive stage I shall be prepared to provide assistance under the Bill only if the authorities can demonstrate substantial progress towards reducing manpower and eliminating restrictive working practices, and if I am convinced that all concerned are committed to making the changes that are needed."—[Official Report, 25 March 1981; Vol. 1, c. 993.]

Although there has been substantial progress in reducing manpower, there is no evidence of similar progress towards the elimination of restrictive working practices. I suspect that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister are still reluctant to reveal the full facts because they might be embarrassing.

Under clause 2, the contemplated subsidy per dock worker in the port of London Authority and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company amounts to £44,500. I base those figures on the fact that there were 1,349 registered dock workers in the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company on 1 January 1985, and 1,691 in the Port of London Authority—about 3,000 registered dock workers. Under clause 2 there will be an additional £140 million of taxpayers' money given in subsidies. That works out in excess of £46,000 per registered dock worker. If those ports cannot sort out their problems with that amount of money, they should be forced into bankruptcy.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment said in Committee that of the relatively modest subsidy in clause 1 a maximum of £40 million—which will go to the dock labour scheme ports in general, other than the ports of London and Liverpool — £17 million was already bespoken. That was the extent of the overdraft facility that had already been taken advantage of. We are talking of possible additional expenditure of £23 million under clause 1. If clause 1 were balanced with clause 2, and my right hon. Friend could assure me that there would not be discrimination between the various scheme ports in giving Government subsidies, I would have no complaint. However, I am worried that the relatively modest sum available under clause 1 will be far outreached by the massive sum available to the ports of London and Liverpool under clause 2.

I hope that my right hon. Friend can tell the House that he will ensure that the £10 million, which is immediately payable under clause 1, will be paid this year to the scheme ports other than London and Liverpool, so that they receive some compensation for their suffering from the imposition of the national voluntary severance scheme.

I realise that I have detained the House at length over the matter, but it is vital. Too often hon. Members on both sides disregard sums such as £140 million as being small beer, while they agonise extensively over sums less than £40 million for higher education and the grant system. They certainly agonise extensively over sums even smaller than that, and rightly so. I am disappointed that this Bill, which proposes such massive injections of additional taxpayers' money into our ports, should have received relatively little comment from hon. Members.

Everyone realises that the national voluntary severence scheme must be supported. The Government have made considerable contributions to it. I hope that in reply to the debate on new clause 1, my right hon. Friend will be able to tell the House that there will be a limit on the extent of these new subsidies, and that there will come a time when those who work in the ports of London and Liverpool must face up to reality, as those in Southampton did last year. They will have to say to themselves, "Our jobs are on the line. If we do not agree to remove restrictive practices and become more competitive, we shall fold as our port will fold". That was the ultimatum that the port of Southampton had last year, and I am proud to say that those who work there decided that the port came before their narrow interests. They decided that, for the greater good, they would keep the port going and make sacrifices. Would that the same was the case in London and Liverpool. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will ensure that there is no continuation of the unfair subsidy to London and Liverpool, which inevitably must be at the expense of ports such as Southampton.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): I listened with great interest and mounting anger to the comments of the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope), who obviously does not understand the history of the ports or the position in which the dock labour scheme ports have been placed. It is not a matter of competition, but of how the ports of the south-east and south-west coasts of Britain have taken over the role that was previously played by the major ports of London and Liverpool. They used to be the two largest ports in the United Kingdom, dealing with massive imports and exports of materials that we no longer see in our docks. The port of Liverpool employed about 15,000 registered workers after the decasualisation of the docks industry, which, it would appear, the hon. Member for Itchen wishes to be revived. He also favours the withdrawal of the right of dockers to strike, because he seems to believe that there should never be a reason for dockers resorting to strike action——

Mr. Snape: As in Southampton.

Mr. Loyden: Yes — although Liverpool benefited from that strike, for a change.

The Bill's purpose is to wind down further the number of registered dock workers employed by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company. The number of ancillary workers at the port has fallen to almost nil. That has had a dramatic effect not only on Liverpool, but on large areas of the north-west far beyond Merseyside. The hon. Gentleman should recognise that in places such as Liverpool, where unemployment is 21 per cent., there is bound to be resistance to the sort of dramatic change that has taken place in the port transport industry, with a reduction in registered dock workers from nearly 15,000 to fewer than 2,000. In the 1960s, about 18 dredgers operated in the port of Liverpool, and there was a total dredging fleet of more than 40 ships. Now there are only three, because of the closure of most of the docks at the south and north ends of the city.

The effect of the change on employment and the port-related industries is dramatic. It amazes me that there is no trace of sympathy from Conservative Members for the devastation caused by the decline of the port, which happened because of the political decision of a Tory Government to enter the Common Market. That ended the possibility of those ports continuing to flourish as they had for the whole of the century.

The speech of the hon. Member for Itchen showed the unacceptable face of Toryism towards the areas that have been devastated by the policies that he and his Government have followed. There is not a shred of sympathy for the many unemployed or for a port which was once flourishing but which is now employing, in comparable terms, only a handful of men. He recognised that one of the main purposes of the Government's port policy is to kill off the national dock labour scheme, which, in 1946, ended the inhumane way that dock workers were treated. Thousands of men used to parade on the docks to be taken on by the employers on whim. That is the sort of indignity that the Tories offer to working people, and that is what we expect from this new brand of Tory MPs.

There will be no welcome for the Bill from the port of Liverpool, the registered dock workers and ancillary workers, or the people of Merseyside. It will hasten the further downward spiral of the port by reducing the labour force. The hon. Member for Itchen did not mention the savings that had been made by the massive reduction in the payroll of both the port of London and the port of Liverpool, although he spoke at length about subsidy. Anyone who has examined these things knows that the recovery of that subsidy was amazingly quick once the payroll was reduced. It is a scandal and a shame that there has been no understanding or sympathy for the plight of these two great ports, but I should not expect that from this new brand of Tory.

I hope that the Secretary of State will ensure that the problems facing London and Liverpool will be met as they should be. They are not the responsibility of the ports but result from the dramatic changes that have taken place, not only technologically but in the location of our trading ports, and they have led to the deterioration and downfall of our ports. There should be constant Government sympathy and understanding of the position. They could show that by ensuring that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company and the port of London are not left with a burden that is not of their making, but has been acquired to sustain those ports, and to give employment opportunities, and the services provided by both ports.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I am much in sympathy with the thrust of the new clause. I would prefer it if the House were discussing the abolition of the National Dock Labour Board scheme, but that was not to be, at any rate not for this year. The scheme is a major distorting factor in the ports and docks industry, in which there is plenty of capacity and competition is keen between scheme port and scheme port, and scheme port and non-scheme port.

My interest in this matter arises out of the fact that in my constituency I have the most recently constituted dock in the country. On 1 January 1984, the Medway Ports authority moved into the royal naval base at Chatham, set up a subsiduary company, the Medway Chatham Dock Company, and started a commercial dock operation. The MPA already operated a highly successful deep-water dock at Sheerness.

Much that I have to say about Chatham applies equally to Sheerness, although the latter is situated just outside my constituency, and in that of my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate). Both Sheerness and Chatham are scheme ports, and are successful to boot. The new Chatham docks has started with all the disadvantages of an old-style enclosed dock, just like the London docks, the royal docks, the Surrey docks and all the old-fashioned ports. Ships have to be locked in and out and they are dependent on tidal estuarial water. Despite that, in its first year of operation, the Chatham docks showed a profit. It handled over 400,000 tonnes out of 336 vessels, and used all of its eight berths in the great number 3 basin of the former Royal Navy dockyard.

In 1985 that tonnage is expected to rise to more than 1 million tonnes. By 1988 it should reach 2·5 million tonnes. The tenants of the Medway Chatham Dock Company expect to invest £5 million in new facilities at Chatham during 1985. That is not a bad record, when one considers that in 1984 there was an irrelevant and damaging attempt to involve dock workers in the coal strike. Jobs have been created in an area of high unemployment and deindustrialisation. There may be gloomy predictions from many of Britain's ports, but the considerable success of Chatham shows that Medway is an exception. Its success is already putting a strain on the infrastructure.

One may ask why the Medway scheme ports are doing so well. Where is their business coming from? Chatham, which is well placed for the motorway network, is probably taking trade away from the east coast ports, but there is little doubt that the growth of Sheerness has been at the expense of port of London facilities, particularly at Tilbury. Why has that happened? The most telling single factor is the difference in the attitude of the work force. The men on the Medway are paid a good day's pay for a good day's work, whereas I suspect that my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) would say that PLA men are paid a fair day's pay for an hour's work.

Mr. Prescott: Look at the daily rates that they get.

Mr. Couchman: The contrast in attitudes towards the 1984 strikes between the Medway men, who rapidly cleared the backlog of cargo that accumulated during the first strike and who did not go on strike at all when the second strike was called, and the PLA men in Liverpool, to whom strike action is a knee-jerk reaction, is stark indeed.

The men in the ports of London and Liverpool bear much of the blame for their lack of competitiveness and success and for the need for this House to consider raising the ceiling for financial assistance from £360 million to £500 million, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport may give to the PLA and to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company by means of grants, loans and guarantees. The Bill stipulates that that assistance should be devoted to reducing manpower in the ports and, to quote from the explanatory and financial memorandum, to "supporting them while such measures are being taken."

It is the latter vague description and definition which worries the movers of the new clause, for there is a heavy suspicion that Liverpool and London are offering discounts to offset their mediocre industrial relations, discounts which will be paid for by means of the financial assistance that they are to receive. That creates unfair distortion of the whole market and serves to put the successful scheme ports of the Medway at a grave disadvantage. The Bill both accentuates and perpetuates that unfairness.

There is another unfairness. Because the Medway ports are successful and are recruiting labour, they are paying heavily into the National Dock Labour Board levy, whereas the unsuccessful docks which are shedding labour are receiving money from the levy. The make-up of the board of 50 per cent. employers and 50 per cent. representatives of the work force controlling dicipline, employment protection and, above all, recruitment means that competition from the successful scheme ports can be stifled by the competitors of those ports and by trade unions whose interests may be very different. The scheme must mitigate against the successful scheme port in several ways and it distorts the whole market. It should have been scrapped when decasualisation took place in 1967. It should be scrapped now and the money involved in implementing the provisions of the Bill should be used to that end.

To continue to pour money into unsuccessful ports, propped up by such a distorting agency as the dock labour scheme, is as wasteful and as sterile as pouring money into unviable coal mines, unused railway lines and unwanted steel capacity. The money would be better invested— [Interruption.] It would do Opposition Members well to listen instead of chiacking from a sedentary position. The money would be better invested in making even more attractive the successful ports, such as those on the Medway. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State could make a start by providing within his roads budget a much needed new access across the Medway to the new docks scheme so that the projected 1,100 heavy lorries a day which will thunder through Gillingham and Chatham do not make the life of my constituents hell. That would be a good way of spending the £40 million included in the Bill and proposed to be used for propping up London and Liverpool docks.

[Mr. Couchman]

I have a great deal of sympathy with the clause, and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will accept it.

Mr. Snape: At the outset of the debate, I thought that we would have a nice, quiet and pleasant evening. One imagined that the Secretary of State would creep into the Chamber wearing his carpet slippers and throw a bucket of public money at the latest problem that he and his Department have managed to create by their incompetence. The debate has been much livelier than we expected.

My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden), who rightly pointed out that industrial relations problems are not peculiar to Liverpool, did so with particular effect on the comparison between Liverpool and Southampton. It is not customary for Opposition Members to exacerbate the effects of industrial disputes anywhere in the country. Until comparatively recently, somewhat regrettably, the port of Southampton appeared from time to time in the long list of industrial disputes in the country. Indeed, until quite recently it was said by various Fleet street newspapers—we understand that they are not renowned for their accuracy in dealing with industrial relations — that the activities of a minority of dockers in Southampton were leading to the transfer of traffic out of the country, and that our competitors in the EEC were benefiting as a direct result.

According to the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope), who somewhat tenuously represents one of Southampton's constituencies, all these problems are behind us. The Opposition, of course, welcome that. We are delighted that industrial relations in Southampton have shown this much-needed improvement.

If ever the time of Parliament was wasted, it was for 40 minutes or so tonight with the hollow sound of whatever sort of grapeshot one could call it that came from the hon. Member for Itchen — perhaps Bordeaux grapeshot would be a good description — because the hon. Gentleman has no serious intention of asking his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to accept the clause. If the Secretary of State declines to accept it, as I fairly confidently predict he will, I hazard a guess that the hon. Member for Itchen, for all the chest beating and tub thumping that we have listened to tonight, would not dare vote for it. The port and the constituents that he represents have directly benefited from the scheme about which he complained so bitterly tonight.

Mr. Chope rose——

Mr. Snape: I will give way in a moment or two. The hon. Gentleman will find it helpful if he allows me to finish giving him the verbal box round the ears before he starts to retaliate; otherwise we might well be here for considerably longer than we should.

Listening to the hon. Gentleman, one would have thought that the only two ports that had benefited from the scheme were London and Liverpool. We heard a great deal from him about the working practices and the comparatively high salaries, so he said, that the dockers earned at Tilbury. The figure of £125 was one that——

Mr. Chope: For doing nothing.

Mr. Snape: I always like to listen to barristers talking about the salaries of other people. I have no doubt that £125 a week would not interest most of the barristers in the hon. Gentleman's chambers. I hazard a guess, looking at the hon. Gentleman's dad's occupation, that it would not keep his dad in lunches for too many wet Wednesdays.

11.15 pm

When the hon. Gentleman talks about dockers and their wages, he should be a little less offensive. I hazard a guess that all the empty threats that we have heard this evening will not be followed by action—indeed, they could not be, because the hon. Gentleman knows full well that there have been redundancies in Southampton that were directly funded by the very scheme that he affects to despise and which he implies he will vote against if he pushes new clause 1 to a vote.

I cannot understand why the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) has disappeared. If any hon. Member who has put his name to the new clause has a legitimate grouse, it is he. Unlike the warlike hon. Member for Itchen, the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe has in his constituency the scheme port of Immingham, which has not so far benefited from the redundancy payments payable under the scheme. Perhaps that is why he made a quick intervention, to prove to his local newspapers that he was here for a minute or two, and the scuttled from the Chamber. There is a legitimate gulf between the two hon. Members. The hon. Member for Itchen represents a port that has benefited from the scheme, while the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe does not.

Mr. Chope: What proportion of the £360 million so far voted under the Ports (Financial Assistance) Act 1980 has been to the benefit of Southampton, and how much of the remaining £140 million proposed in the Bill will be to its benefit?

Mr. Snape: Again, we have the problem with Conservative Members who are all in favour of capitalism —but not too much of it in their constituencies—and against subsidies, except when the subsidies to their constituencies are smaller than those to other parts of the country.

It has nothing to do with the productivity record of Southampton that it has benefited less than the port of Liverpool. As my hon. Friend the Member for Garston accurately said, the fact that Britain joined the EEC benefited Southampton at a stroke, and provided an enormous disbenefit to Liverpool. I do not think that even the hon. Gentleman, in his desire to blow his constituency trumpet, can deny that that geographical accident — Southampton being nearer than Liverpool to the other countries in the EEC—will inevitably benefit that port and tell against Liverpool.

Mr. Chope rose——

Mr. Snape: I shall give way in a moment. The hon. Gentleman had 40 minutes huffing and puffing—[HON. MEMBERS: "Forty one."] so he had 41 minutes huffing and puffing, and if he is ever to blow down this House, he will need more ammunition than he has produced so far. I am a patient man and I am prepared to give way to him again.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I do not know whether he saw a national newspaper earlier this week which had the headline:

"Pay-cut port sets hourly record in container trade".

It stated:

"The Port of Southampton, where dockers have accepted pay cuts and lower manning levels to try to win more business, set a record last week for the number of containers handled."

To what extent have the ports of London and Liverpool sought to help themselves in the same way as Southampton?

Mr. Snape: Again, the benefits received by the port of Southampton are a direct result of this scheme about which the hon. Gentleman seeks to complain. They have been paid for directly through this scheme.

Mr. Chope: Rubbish.

Mr. Snape: It is not rubbish at all; it is fact. If the Secretary of State has brought the right brief, he will tell the hon. Member for Itchen that. The benefits which Southampton has enjoyed have been funded directly by the scheme which he seeks to complain about and to vote against, although we doubt whether the donning of war paint and the brandishing of spears will lead to much when the Division bells ring. We shall do our best to provide the hon. Gentleman with the opportunity of proving to his constituents that he is serious, that the chest beating that he has indulged in tonight meant something and that he seeks to prevent the port of Southampton from receiving any more benefits from this scheme which, in the terms of the new clause that he has moved, is designed

"so as not to alter the relative competitive position of any employer of registered dock workers."

That comes from an hon. Member who has seen the competitive position of the dock workers in his constituency boosted by the scheme. For him to indulge in 41 minutes of empty rhetoric about the working practices of Tilbury and Liverpool is an abuse of your tolerance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and, as we shall see in due course, is likely to be regarded by the rest of us as an abuse of the procedures of the House.

The hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) read his notes very well. He referred to the miners' strike. One can always tell when the Conservative party is getting desperate because it delves into history, whether a long way back or a short time ago. According to Conservative Members, the miners' strike was a good investment. They do not seem to be too eager to remind us of those days now, but, to give him his due, the hon. Member for Gillingham did so. He, too, was against any sort of subsidy. He implied that there could be no subsidy for outdated industries and under-used railway lines.

In the next breath he demanded extra roads to be paid for by the taxpayer to take the extra heavy lorries that he did not want thundering through his constituency. Where does he think the money will come from to pay for new roads? Is it to be plucked out of the air? The Secretary of State does not have much credibility these days, let alone any money. The money for roads comes out of general taxation or the taxation of private motorists. Certainly it does not come out of the budget for the road haulage iudustry or, fortunately for the hon. Member for Gillingham, from the ratepayers in his constituency.

Again the hon. Gentleman is fortunate, because the port to which he referred has not so far had to apply for benefits under the scheme. Is he sure that that will continue to be the case? He must not fall for the sort of empty rhetoric that was used by the hon. Member for Itchen. After all, his hon. Friend is a barrister; he is used to blowing hot and cold with empty rhetoric, and charging a pretty penny for the use of it too. The hon. Member for Gillingham has had a much more varied career and he must not indulge in that sort of thing. He cannot guarantee that in the future the Medway ports will not need to apply for benefits under the scheme.

The Secretary of State is determined never to have any sort of national ports policy. He believes in the philosophy of the market place. We are eagerly awaiting his honeyed words. As I said, he will no doubt chuck another bucket of public money at yet another disaster. Nominally he believes in the freedom of the market place and he is not in favour of a national ports policy. In a moment or two he will tell the House why he cannot accept the new clause so ably if not too briefly moved by his hon. Friend the Member for Itchen.

I confess to some relish about tonight. I have not had the privilege of listening to the Secretary of State for some weeks, and when he appears before us to advocate a little Socialism, I should be the last to complain. He will tonight advocate the spending of more public money to correct a series of mistakes made over the years by the Department of Transport and to contradict some of the fine Right-wing phrases used by some of his predecessors.

In view of that, I urge the right hon. Gentleman to accept the new clause and show us what a good capitalist he really is. I cannot say that the hon. Member for Itchen is a good capitalist, because his port has had its nose in the trough for some time. Although the right hon. Gentleman will not want too many noses being put in the enormous trough that he will fill tonight, I hope he will demonstrate that at heart he is still an old-fashioned Treasury Minister, and accept the new clause. By so doing, he will demonstrate that, no matter what sneers come from Opposition Members or what unkind comments come from his hon. Friends, he remains a lovable and unrestrained capitalist of whom the Prime Minister approves so much that she keeps him in her Cabinet despite all the newspaper prophecies about his future and despite the more than a dash of Socialism that he will offer the House tonight.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): What a pathetic speech the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) made. He has never made a constructive remark about anything. Indeed, if he had an entry in "Who's Who", he would list under hobbies only one—there might be others, but I had better not go into those now—and that would be "fishing in troubled waters." That is all he has ever tried to do. I assure him that tonight the waters are not as troubled as he thinks. His bait is easy to see, with a great hook sticking through it, and I advise my hon. Friends to pay no attention to that part of the debate that has been totally and utterly wasted by him.

The debate has otherwise ranged wide. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) said that Liverpool had declined because we joined the Common Market. Why, then, did London decline, as it too is on the east coast, as is Felixstowe? The hon. Gentleman stretches that point too far and fails to notice the enormous technological revolution that has taken place in the docks, with containerisation, roll on roll off and oil and bulk cargo moving by pipeline, all of which has been the cause of the massive decline in dock labour in this country.

I agree with the hon. Member for Garston that nowhere has that decline been more massive than in London and Liverpool. He quoted some figures. In 1960, there were 14,823 registered dock workers in Liverpool. Now there are 1,925. In London the drop has been even bigger, from 28,401 in 1960 to 2,744 now. On many occasions the House has felt that problems on that massive scale, with an industry which is not profitable, has required the intervention of the taxpayer to assist in managing the decline.

[Mr. Nicholas Ridley]

This is not the occasion, and it certainly would not be right for me, to go into comparisons between Liverpool, London and Southampton or even Chatham and Sheerness, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) referred. It would be quite wrong to go into which had the best strike record or productivity record or which, as it were, deserved rewards or penalties from the taxpayer. That is not the way to look at the matter. I acknowledge that my hon Friend's ports are now beginning to prosper and I hope that many others which have suffered serious decline will go in the same direction.

I believe that the basis on which the Government have assisted the industry is the only correct one. It is not based on strike records, efficiency, productivity or anything of that kind. It is based on the need to assist people who have to leave the industry because there is no longer any work for them. Assisting those albeit voluntary redundancies has been the purpose for which the vast bulk of the money has been used in the past. In a sense, there is no competitive advantage in it for one dock or another. That which suffers the biggest drop in its labour force will receive the largest amount of severance grant, but I am not sure that that is really relevant to the efficiency aspect.

There are three ways in which the Government can assist ports, under the 1981 Act and under the Bill if it becomes law. I should like to describe them, as I believe that this will help to allay the fears of my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) that there is discrimination and that too much money will go to London and Liverpool at the expense of other scheme ports.

First, there is the money paid for the severance of registered dock workers. I believe that the figures given by my hon. Friend were correct, but that money does not go to the benefit of London and Liverpool particularly. It is paid to the National Dock Labour Board, which then compensates those dock workers whose jobs are to be voluntary severed, whatever their port of origin. Under the dock labour scheme both London and Liverpool pay the levy towards the severance fund. The benefit of the money paid for the severance of registered dock workers goes to the industry as a whole. The amount paid under clause 2 is determined by the number severed in London and Liverpool. That is the trigger determining the number of severances to be paid, but it is not and never has been an advantage for London or Liverpool. Recognising that the way in which this is funded should be broadened, however, clause 1 enables the Government to pay money direct to the National Dock Labour Board, which will be of equal benefit with the clause 2 money for the severance of registered dock workers.

Secondly, the money has been used in the past to pay for severance payments to non-registered dock workers in London and Liverpool. In this context, my hon. Friend the Member for Itchen is absolutely right to say that that is an advantage which goes to those two ports and not to other scheme ports. That is why I announced on Second Reading the Government's intention to phase out the payment of severance money for non-registered dock workers in London and Liverpool in two or three stages over two or three years. We have not yet settled the details precisely but that will bring this form—it is not discrimination—of favourable treatment, compared with other ports, to an end.

Mr. Prescott: Is it not discrimination?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has the better of me in forming the term of words.

The third way in which London and Liverpool have been assisted is through grants, loans and guarantees for their economic performance. My predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), told the House in December 1982 that he would continue to meet the cost of severances by the Port of London Authority and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company and to make loan finance available for justified projects until he judged that the authorities could make their own arrangements to cover those items. He said that he would guarantee overdrafts to cover normal trading fluctuations.

I am as anxious as anyone to bring to an end the special assistance that the PLA and the MDHC receive and which other ports do not, but that must be done in a realistic way. To end it now, completely, would place a greater burden on both authorities than they could reasonably be expected to bear. That is why I intend to phase out the assistance that we have been giving in the form of guarantees and loans, and more especially grants, for the cost of severing non-registered dock workers. We have already reduced the overdraft guarantee for the MDHC from £5 million to £1 million. My predecessor said that we would not resort again to deficit financing for London and Liverpool and that I reaffirm we shall not do.

I share the objective of my predecessor of working towards a position of no favouritism. I agree that some ports have been in a third group, as it were, and have had the least help, including Southampton. That is why we, my hon. Friend and I have both suggested a way of moving such Government finance as will be needed towards the scheme ports as a whole under clause 1. Secondly, we have announced the phasing out of the payment of severance grant to non-registered dock workers at London and Liverpool. Thirdly, we shall tighten the financial regime on London and Liverpool so that as soon as it is ever possible for them to do so they will stand on their own feet without Government support.

Given the size of the decline in the work forces in the ports of London and Liverpool, there would be no possibility of anything but total collapse if the form of assistance that the Bill provides had not been extended to the ports. We are near the stage when special assistance can be brought to an end. The two ports are nearing the point where labour requirements are not far below the labour that they still have on their books.

I was shocked to hear the hon. Member for Garston say that within the Government there is no sympathy for the plight of the ports. As my hon. Friend the Member for Itchen said, there is £180 million-worth of sympathy in the Bill. The hon. Gentleman took an extreme and unjustified position.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Itchen will accept that I have announced active measures to end discrimination. There has been an enormous reduction in the number of registered dock workers due to the impact of technological change. We are close to obtaining our goal of even-handed and non-discriminatory competition. We intend to use the Bill to reach that stage as soon as possible. I hope that my hon. Friend will not feel like pressing the clause to a Division.

Mr. Chope: Although my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not given a specific date by which the special assistance will be brought to an end, I hope that the House will accept what he has said in the spirit in which he said it. I hope also that his remarks will be borne out by results. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for going as far as he has, which I think is further than hitherto. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Snape: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not unprecedented for an hon. Member to detain the House as long as did the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) without finding the courage to vote —[HON. MEMBERS: "Bogus."] Conservative Members do not know yet what I am about to say. The hon. Gentleman did not find the courage to vote for his new clause. Indeed, he did not find the courage even to call a Division. Bearing in mind the seriousness of the new clause that we have just been discussing and the fact that the hon. Member for Itchen took no less than 41 minutes to explain the reasons behind his tabling of the new clause, surely it must be discourteous, if not unprecedented in the House, for the hon. Gentleman then to seek to withdraw the motion, although the explanation that he received from the Secretary of State was manifestly unsatisfactory.

I have no intention of detaining the House for a moment longer than is necessary, but it is for you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as an old campaigner, to guide the hon. Gentleman on his duty in the House, particularly in regard to the contents of the Bill, which are vital to thousands of people who work in ports throughout the country. I hope that you will consider, if not formally reprimanding the hon. Gentleman from the Chair, at least guiding him on the moving of new clauses and their impact on legislation as important as this Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I do not know about precedents, but I know that what the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) did was not out of order. It is not unknown for amendments and new clauses to be moved and for the mover to be persuaded by the argument. However, it is not for me to decide why the action was taken. It is for me only to say that it was perfectly in order.

Mr. Snape: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker — [Interruption.] I should have thought that even at this comparatively late hour the House would be interested to learn the views of at least some of us who were concerned enough about the legislation to remain here until this time of night. I object to verbal abuse from Conservative Members who have been conspicuous by their absence from the debate so far, yet on the bidding of the Whip, the hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), come into the Chamber to seek to barrack Opposition Members who wish to make a constructive point.

In reply to the point of order that I raised, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you said that it was not unprecedented for an hon. Member who has moved a new clause, albeit at some length—and I notice that you did not comment on the time that it took the hon. Member for Itchen to move his new clause — to be persuaded by the argument. An inordinate time was taken in moving that new clause, and the explanation to which you referred, Mr. Deputy Speaker, was specious to say the least. The House is worthy of better consideration than that which it has received from the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Itchen.

In conclusion, I ask that if the hon. Member for Itchen pursues the amendments, which deal with fairly substantial matters in the Bill, they should be moved with a little more diligence and brevity than the new clause on which he recently failed to vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I had intended to inform the House that I allowed a fairly wide debate on the new clause —clauses 1 and 2 were referred to often—so the debate on the amendments will be much narrower.

Mr. Snape: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Might I ask you to look at the names of the hon. Members in whose names amendment No. 1 has been tabled? You will see that the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) appears.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): Cynon Valley?

Mr. Snape: To an Englishman, one valley is pretty much like another. It is bizarre even by the standards of the House of Commons for us to be taught Welsh by a resident of Brighton at midnight. My point of order is that I believe that my hon. Friend's name appears in error, and I should like your guidance on how to remove it before the amendment is debated as I know she would not want to be associated with it. I hope that when the hon. Member for Itchen moves the amendment he will make that plain.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have noticed the protest of the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), but he has failed to inform us that there are no Back Benchers behind him——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That was not further to a point of order about signatures to the amendment.

Mr. Harris: With the greatest respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East said that the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) wished to be dissociated from the amendment, but she is not here. No Opposition Back Benchers——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that that is not a matter for me. I think that we can now consider the amendments.

Clause 1

Grants to National Dock Labour Board

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We now come to amendment No. 1 with which it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 4, in page 2, line 9, leave out clause 2.

No. 5, in clause 2, page 2, line 13, leave out '£500 million' and insert '£400 million'.

Mr. Chope: I regret that the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) should have trivialised the important issues that affect the ports industry by rather flippant remarks dressed up as points of order. We had a useful debate on subsidy on new clause 1. I thought that my right hon. Friend's reply met what I said and showed that the Government will not allow unfair discrimination and the subsidy to the ports of London and Liverpool to continue indefinitely. That is good news for Southampton and other scheme ports. I am sorry that some of my right hon. and hon. Friends have been inconvenienced by being put through a Division called by Opposition Members when I had made it clear that, in the light of what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had said, I wished to withdraw the new clause.

This group of amendments flow from the new clause. Because of what my right hon. Friend said, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no question of withdrawing the amendments.

Mr. Snape: I rise to speak to the amendments. [Interruption.] It is normal custom and practice for one hon. Member to speak at a time, except late at night when one or two Conservative Members have had rather a good dinner.

The amendments involve a large element of unfair discrimination and subsidy. The hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) has used that phrase himself. From the wording of the amendments——

12 midnight

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) must not speak to amendments which are not before the House. He can move the amendment.

Mr. Snape: I had not realised that the hon. Member for Itchen had not moved the amendment. What he said for 41 minutes bore no resemblance to what he did when the new clause standing in his name was put before the House. If the hon. Gentleman has not yet moved the amendments, for the purpose of discussing the amendments, I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 8, at end insert

'other than those registered with the Port of London Authority and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company'.

May I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether it is in order to debate amendment No. 2 with amendment No. 1, or whether you wish me to debate them separately?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Amendments Nos. 2 and 3 are out of order. The hon. Gentleman or another hon. Gentleman can move amendment No. 1, and amendments Nos. 4 and 5 may be discussed with it.

Mr. Snape: I am appalled that the hon. Member for Itchen tabled amendments Nos. 2 and 3 which have been ruled out of order. Given his pretended expertise, I should have thought that he would have taken proper advice before tabling them. When the amendments are put to the vote, I reserve the right to demand a separate vote on amendments Nos. 4 and 5, although we may debate all three amendments together.

I denounce the appalling discrimination behind the amendments, which the hon. Gentleman did not have the courage to move. We heard a wholly unjustified tirade against the employees of the ports of London and Liverpool. Prejudice against those employees lies directly behind the tabling of the amendments. I move amendment No. 1 merely to discuss it.

The amendments seek to exclude from the nationally agreed scheme the employees of the Port of London Authority and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company. In an earlier speech, the hon. Gentleman left the House in no doubt about his feelings about the employees of those two ports. Indeed, he was most outspoken about what he saw as their appalling strike record. He spoke of what he termed their appallingly low productivity, and sought to compare what he termed as inefficient and incompetent employees of those ports with the super-efficient employees of the port of Southampton.

Given the opinion polls and the results of the county council elections, I well understand that a Conservative majority of about 5,000 does not allow one to rest easy in one's bed, and that the hon. Gentleman would have to portray himself to his electorate as a great defender of their interests and a proud advocate of the working practices in the port of Southampton. However, that is no excuse for his earlier attack on the employees of Liverpool and London, nor for the tabling of the amendment, which seeks to perpetuate those wholly unproven and unjustified allegations. Again I refer to the hon. Member who used to represent Anglesey. As an Englishman I would not even attempt to pronounce his present constituency. He assured me that the hon. Member for Itchen spoke for no less than 41 minutes. I hope that, now that I have moved the amendment on his behalf, the hon. Gentleman will attempt to justify the allegations that he made. Without repeating any of my earlier points about the fortunate geographical location of the port of Southampton compared with the other two ports, I must say that such attacks are completely unjustified.

Indeed, given the complexity of the scheme, it is completely unnecessary for the hon. Gentleman to make such an attack, because the winding up of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company and its exclusion from the scheme is nothing new. As long ago as 1970, in the brave new world of Selsdon man, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who was then Prime Minister, decided that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board was bankrupt and, therefore, should go to the wall sooner rather than later. Common sense prevailed, and even the Government of the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup, in their fairly Right-wing days—the Secretary of State for Transport was a fairly junior member of it—saw the folly of what they were trying to do and introduced legislation to bail out the port of Liverpool.

The fact that we are debating a similar matter tonight shows that the brave Right-wing rhetoric of the Conservative party soon melts away when it is faced with electoral reality. We saw that phenomenon in the speech of the hon. Member for Itchen on new clause 1. In 1972, the House was asked for the first time, but certainly not for the last, to vote considerable sums of money in loans and grants for the preservation of jobs and the infrastructure of the port of Liverpool. The Bill is not unusual; indeed, a similar Bill was debated only about two years ago.

To try to exclude those ports from the benefits of the scheme is blatantly unfair. The Secretary of State——

Mr. Chope: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Snape: No, not yet. The hon. Gentleman has been put up to intervening by the Secretary of State's parliamentary private secretary.

Mr. Chope: Not at all.

Mr. Snape: I am not giving way, so the hon. Gentleman had better sit down or he will be ruled out of order. If he wishes to speak to the amendments that stand in his name, he should have had the guts to get to his feet and do so at the appropriate time. He could have done so when you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, called the amendments immediately after the Division—a Division in which he did not have the guts to vote—and I have no intention of giving way to him.

Mr. Chope: Will the hon. Gentleman give way? He has cast aspersions on my character.

Mr. Snape: I have no intention of giving way to the hon. Gentleman. I could not possibly cast aspersions on his character, because I would not know him if he walked into the Chamber, or even walked out of the Chamber, as he is doing now. The aspersions that the hon. Gentleman cast on the employees of those two ports were little short of deplorable.

For once, the Secretary of State and I are at one, because we both wish to guarantee the future of those two ports. He and I are, in our respective ways, anxious to ensure that the ports of Liverpool and London prosper, although it is an expensive business to guarantee, if not their prosperity, their continuation. The provisions of the scheme could extend far beyond the two ports that the amendment seeks to exclude.

As I said earlier, it is largely a matter of luck rather than judgment, of geographical location rather than productivity and of fortune rather than working practices that has brought some prosperity, not without much anguish, particularly in Southampton. It is clear that ill fortune has frowned on the ports of London and Liverpool. I hope that, in the more measured atmosphere that we now find ourselves, it will be possible to elicit from the Secretary of State some further concrete guarantees about the future of these two ports.

I assure the Secretary of State that if it becomes necessary, at some unspecified time in the future, for him to come to the House to ask for a further tranche of public money to fund the scheme in London and Liverpool Labour Members, albeit with a little light banter, will be delighted to support him. Although the support from Tory Benches may melt away, I assure him that, whatever the time of day or night, if jobs at Liverpool, London, or any other port, within the scheme or outside it, are affected, provided that he comes to the House properly to request that money, the Opposition can guarantee not only our support but our presence.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): I do not intend to keep the House long, but I am somewhat puzzled. I have been trying to follow the amendments and compare them with what has happened to Tory Members. I have listened to my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) with interest, as I always do. As usual, I found his arguments cogent and reasonable. However, I cannot understand why certain Tory Members want to leave out references to the London and Mersey docks. Nor can I understand why they want to leave out clause 2, because if that were put to the vote and carried, the whole scheme would collapse. Nor can I understand where they get the figure of £100 million in the reduction that they propose in amendment No. 5.

It might seem odd that I, as a Member representing a Tyneside constituency, bearing in mind the interest of the Tyneside docks, should be speaking against amendments that would allow more money to come to Tyneside, because that is the import of amendments Nos. 4 and 5, if carried. However, I have a problem. I do not know why the hon. Members who tabled the amendments moved amendment No. 1. I have no clue. They sought to withdraw it before it was moved. If there is a problem with London and Merseyside, they should let the House know what it is. However, we have not had the benefit of the analysis of hon. Members who have tabled the amendment. It was only my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East who pushed the amendment so that we could discuss this fact. I cannot see any of the hon. Members who tabled the amendments here. Indeed, I cannot see many Tory Members at all.

[Mr. John McWilliam]

It is an abuse of the House to table an amendment, and then abandon it as this one has been. Some of the signatories have made use of the amendment to get a bit of cheap publicity, but where are they tonight to explain its purpose? I deplore the way in which this has been done. It is not within the best traditions or principles of this House for it to be dealt with in this way. I should dearly like to know what was in the minds of those Conservative Members who laid this amendment. They might have had a point which some Opposition Members would have been able to understand. We have not been given the opportunity to hear their argument since they have chosen to abandon it.

12.15 am

I hope that the amendment will not be pushed to a vote. If it is, I fear that, since no arguments have been advanced in its favour, it will suffer the fate that it so richly deserves.

12.26 am

Mr. Ridley: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Mr. Snape: The House will be grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that little burst of oratory, even at this time of the morning. Of course, it would be remiss of us to allow the Bill to pass without a few comments.

If anything illustrates the weakness of the leave-it-to-the-market view, it is the Bill. We are debating the disbursement of about £500 million of public money. It is a somewhat poignant figure, because it is about the same amount as the country spends on subsidising buses each year. To save £500 million of subsidy for buses, the right hon. Gentleman has spent considerable time in Committee, and provoked considerable political controversy from one end of the country to the other. Yet here we are debating the Third Reading of a Bill that involves the same amount of money, and on which the right hon. Gentleman has resisted amendments from his hon. Friends who sought to reduce that £500 million to what they considered to be a more reasonable figure. That is a somewhat unusual, if not invidious position, for the right hon. Gentleman. It is the result of the lack of an overall ports policy since the Government were elected in 1979. Indeed, the cynic would say that the lack of policy on ports has bedevilled the Conservative party since the early 1970s.

If the right hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends will not put these pointed questions, it is for us to do so. Although we agree with the expenditure of public money on ports, we feel that we have a duty to discharge. We must ask the relevant question about expenditure. The first and obvious question is whether the right hon. Gentleman will return next year, or even before, and say that the Government have been blown off course, things have gone wrong in the ports industry and there will be even more redundancies. Will he ask for an even greater amount of public money for that area? In short, will he be back again next year seeking to chuck even more money at that deep-rooted and, in many ways, grave problem of redundancies and the future of dockers and port workers throughout the country, but especially at the scheme ports?

Mr. McWilliam: I do not wish to imply that I am in any way opposed to the Bill, because I am not. Will my hon. Friend put another question to the right hon. Gentleman? Does he still believe in competition?

Mr. Snape: Valid though that intervention is, I have some other questions to put to the right hon. Gentleman. I hope to elicit some answers from him. I might even start answering for the right hon. Gentleman the question that my hon. Friend has put. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman agrees with competition, like many of his predecessors in that office. Under a Conservative Government he stumps the country advocating the principles of captialism and competition, if that is not a contradiction. Occasionally reality must intrude and it is necessary for him to don his other hat as Secretary of State and say to the House of Commons, "Capitalism is not working and it is necessary to find some public money to assist those in the scheme ports who regrettably have to be made redundant"—I am using his words even though one cannot see the bubble emanating from his mouth. He may say, "Regrettably it is necessary to persuade even more dockers to leave the industry. Therefore, I must come before the House of Commons to ask for a further transfer of public money."

Conservatism is a strange policy and philosophy. As we can see from the legislation proposed by a Conservative Government, it does not work. It is strange policy for an avowedly Right-wing Secretary of State to come to the House to ask for this £500 million and to say that basically most of this money is intended as a loan against the redundancy pay of dockers in various scheme ports. Although he may not say so, we know that the burden of maintaining those dockers and their families will remain with the state because, once they have been made redundant, they will become eligible for state benefits. We shall pay twice. It is a strange form of capitalism although I am used to strange forms of capitalism emerging from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Loyden: Does my hon. Friend agree that we have a degree of sympathy for the Secretary of State? Having served with him on the Committee considering the Dock Work Regulation act 1976, and knowing how vociferously and adamantly he presented the argument against the national dock labour scheme, we now see him doing at least half a U-turn to maintain what were once the two major ports in the country. Probably he was a little afraid of the voices from his own Back Bench tonight that argued constantly for bankrupting the ports of Liverpool and London. I wonder how long the Secretary of State will be able to resist such demands from his Back Benches.

Mr. Snape: My hon. Friend has put his finger on a great dilemma that faces the Secretary of State. When the Conservatives are in opposition the answers are easy. They revert to the policies, philosophies and ideologies of the market place, which lead to some distortions, but by and large when in opposition the Conservative party would say that they work and that any Government interference or attempt to inject public money is to be regretted, if not deplored.

That is the philosophy of the Conservatives when in opposition. When in Government, reality frequently intrudes into that myth and it becomes necessary, even for this Secretary of State, to promote legislation such as this and, no matter how distasteful, to advocate the expenditure of substantial sums of public money.

I cannot answer my hon. Friend's question about how long the right hon. Gentleman will be able to defend the ports of Tilbury and Liverpool from the predators who sit on the Benches behind him. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will answer that because it is a justifiable question, because although Conservative Back Benchers failed to pursue their amendments to a Division, they left the House in no doubt about their detestation of a further tranche of public money being directed towards those two ports.

We cannot tell, therefore, for how long the right hon. Gentleman will be able to resist that pressure from his hon. Friends. Indeed, I know not whether he has been under pressure from his former colleagues at the Treasury. After all, one would have thought that the expenditure of £500 million of public money would have been resisted vociferously by Treasury Ministers. Given the right hon. Gentleman's track record, one would have thought that while he might not agree with his former masters at the Treasury, he would have a degree of sympathy for them in their endless pursuit of savings in the public sector.

I like to give the right hon. Gentleman credit when I can. As I said earlier, the need for him to advocate what might be regarded as Socialist policies must be distasteful to him. Tonight he must stand before us and say, "Regrettably, yet again the system has fallen apart and the philosophy of the market place has been found wanting. I have had to knock on the door of the Treasury and ask for £500 million to dispense in the area covered by the Bill." Whatever hon. Members on either side of the House feel about the right hon. Gentleman, we must be touched by the thought of this somewhat sad figure having to go through that exercise.

Mr. McWilliam: Does my hon. Friend consider it strange that while the Secretary of State is proposing to increase from £360 million to £500 million the level of financial assistance, he is, under clauses 3 and 4, seeking to withdraw himself from any real control of the expenditure of that public money? I thought that the Conservatives were keen on accountability.

Mr. Snape: My hon. Friend amply illustrates the incompetence of Ministers in the present Government in relation to the spending of public money. The House has spent a considerable amount of time, and some of us spent a great deal of time in Committee, discussing how money is disbursed by local authorities. Conservative Members left us in no doubt as to their views about that. They believed that some authorities — including, coincidentally, the top-tier authorities of London and Liverpool — were guilty of gross misspending. I think that that is a fair summary of the Conservative view on the Local Government Bill. Yet the expenditure under discussion today is a very imprecise science indeed.

As far back as 1981, the then the Secretary of State for Transport—the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Fowler)—was responsible for the Ports (Financial Assistance) Act which empowered the Government to make up to £160 million available to London and Liverpool by way of grant. At that time, the then Secretary of State said that that was the end of the road and that there would be no further advances for those ports.

Within a year, however, the Transport Finance Act 1982 raised that figure to £360 million. Admittedly, there had been a change of Secretary of State. By then, the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield had gone on to seek fame if not fortune as Secretary of State for Social Services, but the new Secretary of State for Transport, the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), sang a pretty similar tune. On that occasion, too, the House was assured that that amount would suffice for the scheme.

Whatever one's view of the characters of the two previous Secretaries of State, one would have thought that from a purely monetarist standpoint their diligence and desire to reduce public expenditure would be vastly exceeded by the hard Right-wing monetarist views of the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley). Yet within three years he has sought to increase the £360 million, which his predecessor assured us was the final payment, to a new limit of £500 million? When it comes to talking about money, one just cannot trust anyone in the Government nowadays.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Does my hon. Friend agree that because the Government keep upping the ante many dockers will not accept this as a final figure either? Does he agree that they are likely to wait for the next round of increases in the hope that more money will be available rather than accept what is now on offer, especially as taxi rounds and shops which eventually go bankrupt cost more and more on Merseyside?

Mr. Snape: My hon. Friend illustrates the scale of the dilemma in which the Government now find themselves. Lacking any national ports plan, the Government have spent years trying to bribe dockers and registered port workers to take redundancy, with the result that people in London and Liverpool especially do not believe that this is the end of the road, and who can blame them? Given the deplorable lack of consistency shown by successive Ministers in a Right-wing Conservative Government the average docker in London or Liverpool is most unlikely to say, "Well, this is it, lads—we had better take the money and run because this time they really mean it." The House deserves some assurances from the Secretary of State that this really is his last demand for more public money to be spent in this way—although of course, Labour Members are the first to agree that if it is necessary for people to lose their jobs under the scheme it is right that they should be compensated.

Mr. Roberts: Are the Government aware of the law of diminishing returns? There is a limit to the number of taxi drivers who can drive unemployed dockers, to the number of those who take redundancy money and buy shops to serve the unemployed who have only their redundancy money and to the number who can take redundancy money and run public houses to serve those who are living on redundancy money. Unemployment levels are such on Merseyside that if someone takes redundancy money he will be unable to buy a business to which any customers will come.

Mr. Snape: My hon. Friend has underestimated the ingenuity of the Secretary of State. For all my hon. Friend's ingenuity, he has failed to recognise an area in which those who have accepted redundancy payments can invest their money. The Government have introduced a Bill to save the £500 million of public money that we shall spend under the Bill. Under the Transport Bill, it will be possible for redundant dockers, provided that they have sufficient money, to buy a bus and operate a bus service. They will be able to cater for redundant dockers in pubs. Others will be able to drive redundant dockers in taxis. They will be able to drive redundant dockers in their search for new small businesses, or for work that does not exist, in buses that they have purchased with the lump sums available under the Bill. They will be free to apply for licences and obtain them under the terms of another piece of legislation for which the Secretary of State is responsible and to which I do not wish to refer in any detail this evening.

There is a lack of national direction. If we had not had a general election in 1983, the Labour Government would have created a national docks authority. That would have provided us with the opportunity sensibly to organise capacity throughout the ports. Under this Government we have a system whereby non-scheme ports are encouraged to proliferate and scheme ports are undermined because of a lack of central policy. Under the terms of the Bill, millions of pounds of public money will be disbursed in redundancy payments while millions of pounds from the same source are being expended on infrastructure, including roads to non-scheme ports. The Secretary of State is known if not loved for his eccentricity, but even against that background the Government are pursuing a strange and expensive philosophy. They choose to pay off those who work in scheme ports while spending as much money in improving the infrastructure of the non-scheme ports and building them up.

The philosophy of the Secretary of State is to up the subsidies and scrap controls, which leaves us with the worst of both worlds. Perhaps that is a fitting commentary on the right hon. Gentleman's attempts to ruin public tranport industries since the unfortunate date when he was appointed Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. Loyden: My hon. Friend will recognise that besides the medicine that is being offered for the scheme ports there is a poisoned chalice in clause 6, which will give virtually a free hand to the non-scheme ports to develop and extend their activities. That will be done only at the expense of scheme ports. The haemorrhaging of the scheme ports will continue as a result of clause 6.

Mr. Snape: That was the point that I was seeking to make. Public money is being devoted to building up the non-scheme ports while at the same time we are being forced by the Bill to stump up public money towards the redundancy payments of those employed in the scheme ports.

We are not merely discussing Liverpool and London, however important are those ports and their preservation. There are problems throughout the scheme ports. Cries of anguish and pleas for help are aimed at the Government. May I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the Tuesday 7 May issue of the Journal of Commerce and Freighting World, which is not an especially Left-wing newspaper? Under the headline:

"State aid plea for River Clyde"

the article said that a plea for Government assistance for funding maintenance dredging of the river Clyde in a bid to safeguard jobs in local industries had been made by the port boss. In his statement in the Clyde Port Authority's annual report, its Chairman Robert Easton was reported as saying that the cost of dredging in relation to the diminished level of trade in Glasgow continued to cause concern. He was said to be firmly of the view that central Government should directly contribute to that cost. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman agrees with that view, but it is one that is common throughout the scheme ports. If that plea for assistance to dredge the river Clyde is not answered there will be a further decline of the Clyde and no doubt that decline will be accelerated by the policy of moving containerised traffic from Scotland to ports such as Felixstowe.

As long as we have that illogical "hands off the non-scheme ports" approach by the Government, too much container capacity, and an apparent desire by the Government to create more container capacity outside the scheme ports, the right hon. Gentleman will presumably continue to come before the House year after year to beg for a further injection of public funds. The "pay up and hands off" approach contained in the Bill typifies the right hon. Gentleman's all too often muddled philosophy.

As I tried to show when I described the problems faced by the river Clyde, playing off a scheme port such as the Clyde against a non-scheme port such as Felixstowe merely involves the nation in the expenditure of a great deal of public money. It does nothing for any coherent ports plan or to boost the prospects for the British economy. The right hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. Are we to have a national ports policy or are we to have Secretaries of State for Transport continually coming to the House to say, "The policies of the past 12 months have not worked. We must seek another cash injection."? The Secretary of State should devote his reply to those points. No hon. Member would wish to see the right hon. Gentleman next year again under attack by his colleagues and again seeking the protection of those of us in the Opposition who happen to be interested in the preservation of jobs and the creation of a national ports council.

It is fortunate that those Conservative Members who made such warlike noises a couple of hours ago proved to have more wind than stamina, because it could have been embarrassing for the Secretary of State had some of us on the Opposition side of the Chamber not been around to protect him.

We do not oppose the Bill. Regrettably, it is necessary. We warn the Government that there is no point in saying day after day that public expenditure is inherently wicked when they are creating increased public expenditure by not having a national policy or by having, in some cases, ill-thought-out competition between ports in certain categories. The Secretary of State has been fortunate so far in receiving the support of Labour Members, but, unless he is more persuasive, he might have a great deal of difficulty in persuading his colleagues about the necessity for similar legislation.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): As I said on Second Reading, I do not oppose the Bill. My reason is encapsulated in the comments that I would have made on Report, if I had intervened, during the contribution of the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope). It would have been folly for a series of Governments to invest in an attempt to restructure the port industry—specifically London, but also Merseyside—and then suddenly find, when there was a prospect of everything coming to life again, that the taps were turned off so that industry fell flat as an investment. That would have wasted the investment of years.

Not many weeks ago the House passed a Bill which was equally related to financing England's dockland areas—the New Towns and Urban Development Corporations Bill. We substantially increased the amounts of money that the urban development corporations in London and Liverpool docks were to receive—to £400 million and £800 million respectively. On Second Reading, the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary of State said that the ceiling of financial assistance provided in the Bill was necessary because a promise was given and a scheme was established. As more and more people leave the dock labour scheme they have to be paid at the same rate as they were led to believe they would always be paid. One cannot break one's word nine tenths of the way through a deal. The increased provisions should be used to provide a regeneration in the ports which, because of their differing histories and circumstances, need the industry and are suitable in many ways for the necessary adaptation to the technological revolution. We cannot go back to the old style of port or trade. Trade has moved on, and we accept that. I have to ask the Secretary of State, as I asked his colleague on Second Reading, whether we can get more than just the gleam of hope or glimpse of the vision referred to in reply to the questions that I raised on Second Reading. We need some clear and decisive answers as to how we bring back the trade to the ports and up the rivers, particularly in this, our capital city.

It would be ludicrous if we did not seek to use the moneys that the Bill and the New Towns and Urban Development Corporations Act of this year provide by way of borrowing and funding to maximise what must be a great opportunity in the new containerised trade for either the port of London or part of the river further down the estuary, and capture trade from our competitors elsewhere. It is not trade that we need take from other ports on the east or west coast, but trade that we can take from ports on the other side of the North sea and the English Channel, to which we have been losing trade for a variety of reasons.

There are specific questions related to increasing the advantages for the private wharves as well as wharves that remain in my part of London, nearest to the Pool of London. They should be considered positively and urgently by the Government. I have not decried the ideas that have emerged since 1981, when the development corporation was set up. It is one of the areas that could produce something. It has not done so yet. I ask the Secretary of State and his colleagues to see to it that they continue their obligation, which they and previous Governments undertook to uphold, to the mass of people who put their backs, years and lives into building up and sustaining our port industry through the blitz as well as times of peace. Those people now have to be relocated elsewhere, and a commitment is made to them in the Bill.

However, we need more than just a commitment to pay off those people; we need a commitment that the moneys that the Government invest will be invested to provide jobs anew for people with skills and the willingness to contribute to the rebuilding of industry in the areas now deserted by the industry that they knew and to which they wanted to contribute.

I look to the Government to do more in seeking ways to do that. I am sure that colleagues from other parties as well as mine will say that Merseyside needs help. Both Liverpool and London need continued incentives for employment, using the enormous skills that the people have.

Mr. Loyden: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point, which is relevant to the Bill. Had alternative employment and training been available in the ports of London and Liverpool, the transition from the old method of dock working to the new technology would have been virtually painless, and would have been embraced by the people who worked in those ports. Sadly, that was not so. It has been a painful experience.

Mr. Hughes: I accept that entirely. In many ways, it is almost too late. However, it is just not quite too late.

I should like to end with this sombre warning. In London and Liverpool we have relied in large measure on transport for our jobs—not just in the docks, but in related industries, such as haulage and the warehousing that relates the two. Not only have we lost the industry from the ports and the docks in areas of London such as mine, as well as in Merseyside, but a substantial part of the remaining related transport industries is being pulled away from us. Perhaps it is good for the silicon vallleys, the M25s and some employers that the haulage industries move away. But we cannot have the transport industries drained from us without having something to substitute.

I ask that the Secretary of State for Transport perceives more clearly the need for transport industries still to play a major role in the British economy. They have always been important. If we lose that sector of industry, we shall lose something which, in all probability, we shall not recover. It would mean not only many lost jobs but an enormous amount of lost opportunities for those who now have skills, and who are willing to learn and adapt those skills to apply them to our nation's wealth in the years and decades ahead.

1.5 am

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) has not done his homework on the Bill. He said that it provides for £500 million. It does not. It is £150 million, not £500 million of new money, increasable by order to £180 million. He has missed the first and most elementary point about the Bill.

The hon. Gentleman also said that the Transport Bill is intended to save money. He obviously has not read that Bill either. There are no financial clauses in that Bill with such an effect. Its purpose is to improve the use of money that is spent.

The hon. Gentleman said that the Bill enables loans to be made to various dock undertakings. Again I must correct him; it makes grants. He said that a docker who lost his job as a result, sadly, of redundancy immediately went on social security. People with £25,000 of capital are not eligible for social security. That is the extent of the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of the subjects about which he wasted a considerable amount of the House's time today.

Mr. Snape: In the interests of accuracy——

Mr. Ridley: I have not given way. I shall be delighted to give way to the hon. Gentleman, but I shall do so when I feel like it, not when he feels like it.

Mr. Snape: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, even though he was a little churlish. I think that I said that someone who was made redundant went on the dole.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman did not say that.

Mr. Snape: That is the phrase that I meant to use.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman did not use it.

Mr. Snape: In that case I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept that that is the phrase that I meant to use and that is the context in which I meant to——

Mr. Ridley rose——

Mr. Snape: I have not finished yet. It is difficult to convince the right hon. Gentleman about this appalling legislation, but if I have to tell him about the elementary etiquette of the House we may be here for a long time.

Mr. Ridley rose——

Mr. Snape: The right hon. Gentleman cannot cease to give way. I am not trying to make another speech. I am merely asking the right hon. Gentleman to accept the accuracy of the correction that I have mentioned. I hope that he will do so.

Mr. Ridley: It is nice to hear the hon. Gentleman grovelling. I imagine that he could not read the writing of his superior, the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who clearly had written his speech. I am sorry that her writing is so bad that he cannot get his facts right when he is brought in for a Bill at, I admit, very short notice. This is the first time that the hon. Gentleman has had anything to do with the Bill, as is clear from his performance.

I shall not come back to the House next year for a further Bill such as this. I have no difficulty in persuading my hon. Friends who voted for the Second Reading and who will vote for the Third Reading if so required and did not vote for the amendments. Only the hon. Gentleman called for Divisions on the amendments. I am in no trouble, but it seems that the hon. Gentleman might be because he could not get anyone to vote when he called a Division. Any support that the hon. Gentleman might have in his party has not been in evidence tonight.

Mr. McWilliam: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman has noticed that the amendments on which my hon. Friend called a Division were signed by Conservative Members, with the exception of one hon. Lady.

Mr. Snape: And that was a mistake.

Mr. McWilliam: We called a Division to enable Conservative Members who might have felt that they had a problem with the Bill to record that problem. Their failure to do so is a matter for them, not for my hon. Friend.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I hope that we shall not hark back to amendments which we have already discussed. We are now on Third Reading.

Mr. Ridley: I was also hoping that. If we are to discuss who put their name on the Order Paper, including the hon. Lady for the unpronounceable valley, we may get into considerable trouble. Most of the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who put their names to the blocking motion on Third Reading are not present. I assume that their names are there by mistake. May I withdraw the names of the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and so on because I have it on good authority that they did not mean to put their names to the motion? Anyone can play at that game.

The hon. Members for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) and for West Bromwich, East said that a ports policy would make life difficult both until now and in future. When the Labour Government were in power from 1974 to 1979 there were 57 applications for investment permission under the Harbours Act 1964. They turned down two of them, one of which was simply for a fishing boat harbour and required 85 per cent. subsidy, and the other 55 were accepted. The net effect of their having the powers, which they now regret losing, was to stop one harbour development, thereby preventing a few people from getting jobs. That is a planned ports policy, as administered by a Labour Government during five years of office. The net result was to prevent jobs from being created at one port. Therefore, I simply do not know what is the point of the hon. Gentleman's criticism of the Government's port policy.

Mr. Loyden rose——

Mr. Ridley: I give way for the last time.

Mr. Loyden: Does the Secretary of State agree that the important point was the limit on the sums that could be spent, which prohibited ports from making a major development? Most of that money was used for capital equipment rather than for the extension of the ports.

Mr. Ridley: The Act provided that investments above a certain size had to be approved. The only way in which the powers can be used is by not approving those investments, thereby reducing port developments and the number of jobs created. If the Labour party thinks that a negative control of that sort will solve the problems with which we are grappling in the ports industry, it must think again.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) regretted, as does the Labour party, the fact that trade changes. It changes for 100 different reasons. It changes principally for technological reasons, but also for reasons of trade, geography, and the alteration of the type of business carried by ships. Obviously it is sad and regrettable when trade leaves a port. However, it is almost inevitable that it will move from the pool of London and narrow river harbours of the sort that front the hon. Gentleman's constituency. It is not good enough to say that somehow the Government must bring back trade, especially to Bermondsey and Southwark. It is hopeless and unrealistic to suggest that, on Third Reading and wholly out of order, I can announce a policy to bring back trade, which may have vanished 50 years ago from wharves in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. That may be good vote winning stuff, but the hon. Gentleman must do better than that.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose——

Mr. Ridley: No. I said that I would not give way again.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that, through flexibility, competition and private capital, we have seen the growth of continental ports such as Rotterdam and Antwerp. That has not happened because of a planned ports policy or nationalised state capital. It has not happened because of wishing that the Government would bring back the trade. It has happened because a long time ago those countries followed policies similar to those of the present British Government.

Rotterdam probably handles as much trade as all the United Kingdom ports put together, and it employs 4,100 dockers. Britain still employs 12,000 registered dockers. That is why we need the Bill, and I hope that the House will give it a Third Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

South-East Asia (Refugees)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Mather.]

1.15 am

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): During the past few days, most of us have participated in celebrations to mark the 40th anniversary of VE day. Less well publicised is the 10th anniversary of the fall of Saigon, which happened only two years after American troops pulled out. The effect of that is with us today. The withdrawal from Vietnam tilted American foreign policy off balance and seriously undermined the self-confidence of the most powerful nation in the world, in addition to bringing tragedy to the families of the dead and injured American conscripts, the average age of whom, as the current best-selling pop record tells us, was 19.

The shadow of Vietnam hangs like a pall over the United States' intervention in other countries and colours moral judgment in a comparison, however inappropriate, with Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

The misery and convulsion of south-east Asia continues and, occasionally, is brought home to people in the western world through a haunting picture such as that in The Times yesterday of a Vietnamese child with longing eyes peering through the wire fence of a closed refugee centre in Hong Kong.

Anyone who has seen the current factual film "The Killing Fields" about the excesses of the Pol Pot Khmer Rouge regime in Cambodia should realise that such things are still going on in south-east Asia today.

In Vietnam today there is a policy of tyranny and oppression towards those who had anything to do with the Saigon Government. Thousands of people are in the so-called re-education camps — a synonym for concentration camps. I spoke recently with a person who had finally escaped from one such camp after three years. His fellow escapees had been shot in the attempt. He told of a daily regime which involved working in the fields for almost 12 hours, followed by two hours intensive political indoctrination by camp leaders who were not qualified teachers. Individuals are required to learn parrot fashion everything they are taught, are tested every three weeks and are required to go over it again and again until it is well conned. The only newspaper available is the organ of the party.

About 3,000 people were in his camp alone, divided into units of 10, of whom two remain to prepare meals while the other eight go to work in the fields, still having to do the work of all 10. No communication between groups is allowed and individuals are permitted to send one censored letter and receive one food parcel every three months. Only goods for immediate consumption can be received, and nothing can be stored. The people must grow their own food, but most is taken by the Government.

The misery is unendurable for many. There are several suicides. I was told of a man who hanged himself from a low beam in the hut by holding his legs off the floor until he was past saving.

The result of such oppression has made Vietnam an international pariah, and has led to a massive exodus of her people. First the ethnic Chinese came, but now the refugees arriving in Hong Kong are 98 per cent. ethnic Vietnamese. They have come in whatever way they can to escape the tyranny of their country. It is difficult for us to imagine the sense of despair which leads to such a flood of humanity and which drives people to leave home, family, possessions and familiar surroundings and to commit themselves to the uncertainty of becoming refugees. Thousands who trusted themselves to small boats perished at the hands of the cruel sea or pirates. Yet still they come.

We have a moral duty to use every way open to us to get Vietnam not only to change its internal policies towards its citizens, but to enable those who have difficulty in obtaining exit visas, many of which must be paid for dearly through corrupt officials, to leave their country under the orderly departure programme. The British Committee for Refugees from Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, of which I have the privilege to be the chairman, has obtained permission from the royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea to erect on the banks of the Thames in London a telling memorial to those who perished at sea in the search for freedom. It will be a statue of a mother holding a baby emerging from the waves. We are raising funds for it now. It will be a constant reminder to us all that the price of freedom can be life itself.

In January, I visited Hong Kong and went to see refugees in Chi Ma Wan closed centre, Kai Tak transit centre and the Jubilee camp. The Hong Kong Government have coped remarkably well and with great endeavour and skill with well over 100,000 Vietnamese refugees who have arrived in a community which has a population density of 4,972 persons per sq km, which compares with 230 in the United Kingdom and 22 in the United States of America. In the last financial year, the Hong Kong Government spent about 100 million Hong Kong dollars, of which the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees provided about 20 million Hong Kong dollars. Many of them have been resettled in Western countries following the Geneva conference in July 1979. I am pleased that the British Government took a leading role in that conference and agreed to take a quota of 10,000. We now have about 19,000 Vietnamese refugees in the United Kingdom.

However, as at 1 December 1984 there still remained 12,258 Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong, although I understand that that figure has subsequently decreased. Hong Kong has already assimilated many refugees in its community, but there is now a need for further international response to help to clear this human log-jam. Mr. Paul Hartling the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, is in Hong Kong and now has called on the United Kingdom to take a few hundred more Vietnamese refugees from Hong Kong.

A similar plea has been made in the excellent and comprehensive report of Vietnamese refugees, produced by the Select Committee on Home Affairs. We eagerly await the Government response.

In giving evidence to the Select Committee, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, said:

> "It is our responsibility to take the lead, as the Department in the Government responsible for Hong Kong, and to try to find a solution to it."

He agreed that

> "it must be a priority in terms of our responsibilities".

I understand the view of the Home Office that there is no positive evidence that other countries would follow suit in taking more refugees, but no country is likely to give an undertaking in advance of any proposals by Britain.

There is strong evidence to suggest that such a lead would be imitated by other countries. Canada has recently announced that it will take more refugees. In any event, it is worth while our doing so. The numbers are small. We took only 88 people from Hong Kong last year. Those refugees in Hong Kong with close family relatives in the United Kingdom number no more than 434, or 112 cases, on figures given to me when I visited Hong Kong. It is because these refugees have family links with the United Kingdom that no other country will have them. If we do not take them, they will be condemned to remain in Hong Kong camps indefinitely.

What does that mean? Chi Ma Wan is a prison camp. The refugees there are "behind barbed wire", the phrase that forms the title of the policy statement issued by the British Refugee Council in December 1984. I was greatly impressed by the standards of cleanliness and hygiene, the quality and variety of the food and the excellent medical attention. I asked the resident doctor, who was English and had lived in Vietnam for a time, whether she was short of any supplies, and she said that she was not. However, the fact remains that these people cannot go outside the camp, unlike their fellow refugees, and sometimes relatives, in the open camps, who can go outside and work in the Hong Kong community. There were 2,502 in Chi Ma Wan when I was there, mainly aged 15 to 30, 73 of them under six months old. Some 90 had been born in the camp in 1984. About 100 are going on to resettlement in the United States, Canada and Australia.

Some 300 to 400 have been there since the closed camp policy was started in July 1982 to deter further refugees from coming. These tend to be the most uneducated of the single young males. They are unlikely to be accepted by any country and will have to be assisted into Hong Kong society if no other country takes them in. In Kai Tak, I was told that 60 per cent. had not been taken because they refused a previous offer of resettlement because they were ill or had a criminal record. I have never been satisfied that the closed camp policy acted as a deterrent. In any event, if it ever did, its raison d'etre has disappeared. The numbers of refugees coming to Hong Kong have dropped off, not just as a result of the closed camp policy. The numbers were dropping off before July 1982, as the British Refugee Council has pointed out.

It is true that there was a quite dramatic diminution in numbers about that time, which has continued. However, it flies in the face of common sense to suggest that those who are prepared to risk losing everything, including their lives, in escaping from tyranny, are likely to be deterred by the thought that they would be incarcerated for a time in a closed camp. Natural optimism would entitle potential refugees to think that the period in such a camp would not be too long, even if they were also to discover the facts.

In conjunction with the Select Committee on Home Affairs, I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to persuade the Hong Kong Government to phase out closed camps as soon as possible and allow the inmates to work in the community. I accept that our moral position of persuasion will be weak if we do not accept the fewer than 500 refugees whom I have mentioned, and if there is not a rolling programme of acceptances over a period to assuage the fears of the Hong Kong people that 12,000 refugees, speaking a different language and with a different culture, will no be integrated into Hong Kong society once they are able to work in it pending resettlement. The resettlement must be assumed.

There is one matter to do with the closed camps which the Hong Kong Government can remedy immediately. From my talks with Government officials there, I am optimistic that the Government are on the verge of a change and need just a gentle push from my hon. Friend the Minister of State. That change would be to allow refugees in closed camps to join their spouses in open ones. One woman I met in Chi Ma Wan had been there with her two children for two years unable to join her husband who was living in an open camp and working. This is inhumane. It is no good suggesting that those in open camps can give up work and join spouses in closed ones. Realistically, the concession must be the other way round.

Since May 1981, Vietnamese refugees settled here have had applied to them the same criteria as for other citizens for family reunion—that they can be joined by minors under the age of 18 and spouses but not by others, unless they are elderly dependants or there are compassionate grounds. Unaccompanied minors, for example, do not qualify to have families join them. Refugee agencies give a much broader definition of close relatives, as we did before 1981. I believe that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Home Office does the best he can, but I urge the Government to give a broader interpretation. I should like to know whether other recipient countries adopt similar restrictive criteria.

More needs to be done, but they are matters mainly for my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, so I shall not deal with them in detail now. I believe that we now need to concentrate assistance on those areas in which Vietnamese refugees settled here have congregated following the disastrous initial dispersal policy. If it is right for other ethnic minorities, it is certainly right for this industrious and decent people, for whose character and ability to adapt I have the highest regard. I urge the Department of Health and Social Security to look carefully at the effect on insecure refugees of the board and lodging regulations and to exempt refugees if the regulations work unfairly against them. We owe a duty to all our citizens, including those from overseas who enrich our society. Many such points were raised last Thursday during an Adjournment debate by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), who has apologised to me for not being able to be here tonight.

The situation in south-east Asia has been destabilised by the occupation of, first, Laos and then Cambodia by Vietnam, which has the third or fourth largest standing army in the world. One hundred and fifty thousand Vietnamese troops are stationed in Cambodia, and after the recent offensive which pushed into Thailand the forces of the coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea, a Soviet-backed communist regime's forces now lap up against the border. There are 250,000 Cambodian refugees within Thailand and I ask my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office whether he does not think it necessary for further international action to be taken to deal with this massive problem.

The United States is deeply concerned not just about any possible further aggression against Thailand and compromise of its territorial integrity which would involve American troops once more in south-east Asia but also about the refugee problem, which is insupportable for Thailand. That country has just persuaded the United States that it must have F16 fighters. All around, the countries of south-east Asia are arming. The situation is critical.

Personally I doubt whether Vietnamese adventurism would risk a major conflagration, but the danger must be met. After its considerable losses in the abortive action against the northern part of Vietnam in 1979, China is unlikely to try to force the issue militarily, although it will continue to support the coalition Government, in particular the brutal Khmer Rouge.

Cambodia is going through an agony. There is an active policy by the invaders of Vietnamisation, particularly in the schools, and an attempt to suppress Cambodian culture, as well as reported atrocities. However welcome the Vietnamese may have been in 1979 rescuing the Cambodians from the loathsome Khmer Rouge regime of Pol Pot, they have now become unwelcome oppressors, condemned by the United Nations and the international community. It has been said that, as long as the Khmer Rouge cast their shadow over the country, the Vietnamese are likely to remain and the people of Kampuchea will be glad of their protection. That is open to question, but the Khmer Rouge are no friends of democracy.

Of the two other members of the coalition, Son Sann is presently too weak, though perhaps the most favoured by the west. We must look to Prince Norodom Sihanouk, who is the key to a resolution of the problem and who may be able to establish a genuinely neutral Cambodia. This might persuade the Vietnamese, with much guerrilla fighting ahead of them otherwise and continuing international criticism, to withdraw if they could be satisfied that Cambodia would not be a threat on their borders. Prince Sihanouk has a home in Peking and could well be acceptable to the Chinese but act as a buffer against any thoughts of extension of influence from that quarter which would be met with concern by Indonesia.

There is no easy solution, and one is still a long way off, as acknowledged by Senor Perez de Cuellar. Yet a time bomb is ticking away in south-east Asia which could threaten world peace. It is for that reason that Great Britain has a vested interest in seeking a workable solution, along with other nations that wish to save a brave and deserving people from suffering.

1.29 am

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Richard Luce): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) on raising in this Adjournment debate the subject of the crisis in south-east Asia and the refugee problem. He addressed it with the greatest thoroughness and has shown that he has not only a great interest in the problem but a very great knowledge of it. He spoke with great feeling. He is the chairman of the British Committee for Refugees from Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia of the British Refugee Council and does a great deal of very important work in that area. I am glad too that my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) is present because he takes a close interest in the affairs of refugees, and of Vietnamese refugees, particularly in Hong Kong, and has been active in the Select Committee that has been looking into these matters.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn is absolutely right in drawing attention to the root cause of the whole problem of Vietnamese refugees. It lies, as he said, in Hanoi. The oppressive foreign and domestic policies of the Vietnamese Government have led to economic priorities whereby disproportionate resources are devoted to maintaining the third largest army in the world. This, combined with a lamentable human rights record, has resulted in a continuing exodus of large numbers of Vietnamese — around one million since 1975. These people flee their country in search of a better life. Last year a further 25,000 fled by boat, risking dangers at sea, including piracy. I think that these figures in themselves are a massive condemnation of the policies of the Vietnam Government.

Many thousands of Vietnamese have been detained since 1975 in the so-called re-education camps of Vietnam without charge or trial. They continue to be subjected to exceptionally harsh treatment, and deprived of food and medicine. We are similarly disturbed by the continuing detention without trial or charge of intellectuals, diplomats and writers, for example, who have expressed views even marginally different from the official party line, by the discriminatory attitude of the Vietnamese Government towards Chinese and other ethnic minorities in Vietnam, and by the persecution and harassment of Catholics and Buddhists—particularly of Catholic and Buddhist priests —solely because of their faith. We and the international community must continue to try to persuade the Hanoi Government to treat their citizens in a civilised fashion and to take proper responsibility for them. We certainly make this clear whenever we can.

The United Kingdom and Hong Kong, although they have no historic links with Vietnam, have made important contributions in helping to alleviate this human tragedy. As my hon. Friend has already said, some 19,000 Vietnamese have been given new homes in this country, and over 14,000 Indo-Chinese have been resettled in Hong Kong. The 1979 conference on Indo-Chinese refugees was a United Kingdom initiative. Over 12,000 of the refugees who have been resettled in this country have come from Hong Kong. The House should be aware of our continuing international commitment to resettle family reunion and ship rescue cases. Last year alone, we took in 832 Vietnamese in these two categories. Under the orderly departure programme, the Vietnamese continue to join their families here direct from Vietnam.

If I may say a word about Cambodia, a further reason for the crisis in the region has been Vietnam's unwarranted invasion and occupation of Cambodia in 1978. Vietnamese troops totalling 160,000 are still there. Vietnam prides itself on having fought for its own liberation. It should respect the wish of the Cambodian people to determine their own future free from outside interference. But the Vietnamese Government have ignored repeated calls at the United Nations, in the 1981 international conference on Kampuchea and subsequent General Assembly resolutions, for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Cambodia and the holding of internationally supervised elections for a neutral, non-aligned and independent Cambodia. These principles were re-endorsed at last year's UN General Assembly by an overwhelming majority of 110 countries. Not only have these calls been ignored, but last November Vietnamese forces launched their most ferocious offensive to date on the Thai-Cambodia border, causing well over 200,000 Cambodians to flee into Thailand with great human hardship.

What is the United Kingdom policy? The British Government have consistently supported these UN calls, and we have condemned the Vietnamese occupation, which is the root cause of the Cambodian refugee problem. We have also called upon the Vietnamese to put a stop to actions such as their repeated offensives and violations of Thai territory, summoning the Vietnamese ambassador to reinforce these views. We shall certainly maintain this pressure.

We play, and intend to continue to play, a full part, in conjunction with our European and other Western partners, in support of the ASEAN nations, who are rightly in the forefront. We maintain the closest contact with them on this and on other matters. Any solution in our view must be based, as ASEAN insists, on withdrawal of the Vietnamese forces from Cambodia. We shall certainly continue to keep in the closest touch with our ASEAN colleagues, as, indeed, my right hon. Friend, the Prime Minister, has done in her recent tour.

We shall continue to support the aims of the resistance coalition whose forces confront Vietnam in Cambodia. Prince Sihanouk and Mr. Son Sann, the leader of the Khmer People's National Liberation Front, play an important role in providing a focus for Cambodians who wish to see their country independent once again. We maintain links with representatives of the Prince and Mr. Son Sann. Indeed, my right hon. and learned Friend had talks with Mr. Son Sann only a year ago. We have provided bilateral humanitarian aid to their two organisations after the attacks by Vietnamese troops on the Thai-Cambodian border.

United Kingdom support for the coalition does not mean support for Pol Pot. We withdrew our formal recognition of the Pol Pot regime in December 1979. Our representative at the 1982 United Nations General Assembly made it quite clear that our support for the credentials of Democratic Kampuchea did not represent a change in the Government's position in this matter, and that we had no intention of contributing to the re-establishment of the Pol Pot regime. It is surely for the people of Cambodia to decide who should represent them. In contributing to international relief on the Thai-Cambodian border we have made it clear to the agencies concerned that our aid must not go to the Khmer Rouge, and we are assured that that commitment is honoured.

I should also refer to our efforts to help Cambodian refugees, a subject of concern to my hon. Friend. Together with other western countries, we co-ordinate our policies closely to try to alleviate this problem. During the financial year 1984-85, we contributed £850,000 to international relief work on the Thai-Cambodian border, and we shall continue to maintain our contacts with the international bodies in the period ahead.

I want to say a word about the important subject of Hong Kong, which is our responsibility. The recent publication of the Select Committee on Home Affairs on refugees and asylum highlighted the problem of Vietnamese refugees, especially those in Hong Kong. That makes the debate most timely. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office said during an Adjournment debate on 9 May that the Government were considering the Select Committee's recommendations very carefully, and would be giving a detailed response in due course. In the meantime, it would not be appropriate to offer detailed comment on the recommendations.

I assure the House that the Government attach the utmost importance to improving the position of the Vietnamese who have settled in this country and to finding permanent solutions for the 11,200 who are still in Hong Kong awaiting resettlement.

My hon. Friend referred to the remarks of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, Mr. Hartling —who is now visiting Hong Kong—to the effect that Britain should "take an initiative that would encourage other countries to take more."

I said in my evidence to the sub-committee on race relations and immigration on 4 February that

"a clear indication that we are prepared to carry out a resettlement programme, linking it perhaps to special family reunion cases, and that we have very positive proposals and ideas in this connection, could well produce a response."

I believe this to be the position, but there obviously can be no guarantee.

As my hon. Friend the Minister of State said on 9 May, the Government will look at the question of the United Kingdom accepting more refugees, especially family reunion cases, in the context of their consideration of the Select Committee's recommendations. It is, therefore, inappropriate for me to comment in more detail, save to stress that the Government are treating the matter as one of very great importance and urgency.

I wish to praise the contribution already made by other countries towards helping to solve Hong Kong's refugee problem. The United States, Canada and Australia have accepted 55,000, 16,000 and 4,400 refugees respectively from Hong Kong. I am pleased to say that Canada has just announced a decision to take an additional 500 refugees this year from Hong Kong on top of the 600 that it had already agreed to take. That means that this year it will take the same number as last year.

In particular, I must thank the Hong Kong Government and people for what they have done to help the Vietnamese refugees. Since 1975 they have provided temporary asylum for more than 100,000 refugees. In addition, they have themselves absorbed more than 14,000. They have turned none away. It is a remarkable humanitarian achievement for such a small and densely crowded territory.

In regard to the difficult problem of the closed camp, as I said in my evidence to the Select Committee on 4 February, the position of having 5,600 refugees in closed camps and an equal number in open camps—but I refer particularly to the closed camps — is such that no Minister can conceivably say that it is satisfactory, desirable or acceptable. It is not. Nor is it satisfactory or desirable for the Hong Kong Government. We and the Hong Kong Government would like camps to be abolished as soon as possible. But we have to face reality. Hong Kong is one of the most crowded places in the world. The population density is 20 times that in this country. It has received more than 100,000 refugees since 1975. It has enormous immigration presssure simultaneously from China. It has been difficult for the people of Hong Kong to accept that Chinese, often kith and kin, should be returned to China, while Vietnamese remain in Hong Kong pending resettlement overseas.

I ask my hon. Friend to bear in mind that the evidence shows that, however painful the process of introducing those camps in 1982, it has led to an increase in the decline in the number of people arriving from Vietnam in relation to the number of people who have been going from Vietnam to other countries. The figures for the period from 1981 to 1984 demonstrate clearly that there has been a decrease in the numbers arriving in Hong Kong. In 1983 the arrivals decreased by 53 per cent. but on a regional basis by 36 per cent. In 1984 the Hong Kong arrivals decreased by 39 per cent. and the regional arrivals by 11 per cent.

Those who argue that Hong Kong's refugee burdens were already declining when closed camps were introduced should bear in mind that in July 1982, the month in which Hong Kong changed its policy, arrivals in the territory reached their highest level for three years. More than 1,600 refugees arrived in Hong Kong in a single month. I ask my hon. Friend to bear in mind that it is terribly important to take these factors into account and to consider the difficult position of the people of Hong Kong.

The Hong Kong Government make every effort to meet the needs of refugees for shelter, food, medical treatment, clothing, education, welfare and recreational facilities. In particular, they are devoting considerable attention and resources to improving educational and training opportunities. They seek to provide educational and vocational training, with emphasis on English, in all Government-run centres. In Hei Ling Chau closed centre for the North Vietnamese where the resettlement rate is therefore lowest and potential integration problems greater, the Hong Kong Government intend to provide special multi-purpose training centre, to be funded by United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and run by the World Relief voluntary agency. We all hope that will help.

In particular, my hon. Friend referred to the segregation of husbands and wives. That is one of the most difficult and humane problems that one has to deal with. The problem is that if we allow people from closed camps to join their spouses in open camps there is a serious danger of abuse of the system which must be taken into account. In the meantime, there have been 50 applications for reunion in closed centres; 37 of them have been approved. I shall consider very carefully the recommendation that my hon. Friend has made.

Again, I thank my hon. Friend for raising this important issue. Our objective is to seek durable solutions to these painful problems. In looking to the future, we believe that in the long term the ideal goal is to create conditions in which refugees will want to return to their countries of origin of their own free will. They must not be denied that aspiration.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Teachers (Pay)

1. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to meet representatives of the Educational Institute of Scotland to discuss the teachers' campaign for an independent pay review; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Younger): No such meeting is at present arranged, but I am always prepared to consider requests by the Educational Institute of Scotland for meetings on matters of mutual concern.

I regret very much that, although the employers and two of the other teachers' unions would have been prepared to agree to my proposal that the Scottish joint negotiating committee should carry out a review of pay and conditions of service together, the EIS has maintained its demand for an independent review of pay alone. The sooner the EIS ceases its damaging strike action and returns to the negotiating table, the better it will be for Scottish education.

Mr. Strang: When will the Secretary of State attach to Scotland's teachers the same priority as he has to our hard-pressed ratepayers? Does he recognise that the decision of the EIS to suspend the targeting of Minister's constituencies means that the Government have three weeks before the EIS delegate meeting to come forward with a new initiative? Does he accept that the answer he gave is wholly unacceptable, and that if he continues in that vein the meeting on 7 June is bound to vote for more militant action?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman will be as aware as all hon. Members on both sides of the House that as long ago as December I recognised the strength of the teachers' feelings on these matters and offered to consider a package of pay and conditions and to make a contribution towards implementing it. The EIS has made no positive response to that, although the other unions are prepared to meet. I believe that that answers the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question. I believe it is generally agreed that targeting has been a most unfortunate development. In the targeted areas it has harmed the opinion that people have of teachers. With regard to time, as the hon. Gentleman will be aware, I have all along been encouraging the teachers to discuss these matters. There is no reason why they should not do so.

Mr. Henderson: Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity today to appeal once again to the EIS to explore the opportunities that he has offered for fruitful discussion and review through the joint negotiating committee? Does he agree that that would be a more fruitful way of going forward than the campaign on which it is waxing strong and which is often misleading? For example, one EIS representative said that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), would not know the inside of a Scottish school if he saw one, although he had recently visited Bell Baxter school in his official capacity. He was a pupil there and no doubt saw his name on the dux board.

Mr. Younger: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I know what nonsense such a remark is about my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary. As to making an appeal to the EIS, may I again stress that at no point during the long dispute have I denied that the teachers feel strongly about it? What is depressing is that they have not been prepared even to discuss pay and conditions. I hope that they will reconsider their position on that.

Mr. Bruce: Does the Secretary of State recognise, from parents' meetings around the country, that there is considerable anxiety about the prolonged nature of the strike and the dispute, and the need for it to be resolved? Parents do not feel that the Government have responded positively enough. Taking up the question by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang), when will the Secretary of State recognise that Scottish education will receive the priority that it needs only when he is prepared to find new money for it in the way that he has been able to find new money for other things which he clearly believes have higher priority?

Mr. Younger: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that parents are most anxious about the position. Although I do not believe that he has been involved, I can tell him that the parents in those areas that were targeted feel bitter about the way in which they were singled out for action in this matter. As regards the hon. Gentleman's suggestion about finance, I must again repeat that since as long ago as December I have been offering to try to find some money, but I have had no response from the EIS.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Will my right hon. Friend stress that he is absolutely ready and willing to negotiate in an effort to break the deadlock.

Mr. Younger: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point, but it is really not up to me to negotiate in this matter. The negotiating takes place in the joint negotiating committee between the employers, who are the education authorities, and the representatives of the teachers' unions. Usually the Secretary of State plays no part in such negotiating, apart from having two observers present. However, in this instance I said that I would look at a package of pay and conditions and endeavour to help in implementing it. So much time has passed since I made that offer that it will become increasingly difficult to meet it, but it is still there.

Mr. Douglas: Does the Secretary of State appreciate that the teachers have reached a crisis position and that they are adamant about pursuing a review by an independent body?

Mrs. McCurely: The professional association is for negotiation.

Mr. Douglas: Well, the vast majority of them take that view, and we are talking about the vast majority. Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that this cat-and-mouse attitude of his will not do and that a crisis has been reached in Scottish education which only an independent review body can resolve? Will he concede that that should be done before the 1985-86 session commences?

Mr. Younger: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that this is a very serious matter indeed for Scottish education. I can sum up the respective positions briefly by saying that while the hon. Gentleman is right to say that the EIS has been adamant, I have not been adamant. Everyone can see who is trying to resolve the dispute and who is trying to be selfish.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that while, obviously, some Scottish teachers merit greater rewards for what they do, the days when across-the-board agreements could be reached disappeared when the Labour Government went to the IMF? Does he further agree that to get the rewards for those who deserve them, it is essential that conditions as well as other matters are looked at; in other words, that it is impossible to look at pay in isolation?

Mr. Younger: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is unrealistic in any profession or employment to look at pay completely unrelated to conditions of service. That will have to be tackled as one subject, or as two subjects both applying to this problem. Until that happens, it will be impossible to have a realistic discussion.

Mr. Buchan: Did the right hon. Gentleman hear one of his hon. Friends say, "Not enough" when my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) referred to the vast majority of Scottish teachers approving of this action? May we be told what would be enough on the part of the teachers to persuade the right hon. Gentleman to change his mind, considering that the EIS represents 80 per cent. of Scottish teachers? Will he stop trying to pretend that they are an isolated group? They represent the vast majority of teachers and, I believe, the vast majority of parents, too.

Mr. Younger: It is true that the EIS represents the vast majority of teachers, and I have never suggested otherwise. It is significant, however, that the other unions are at least prepared to enter into discussions on the matter. It is very sad indeed that the largest union should not be prepared at least to try to resolve the dispute.

Mr. Wilson: Is the Secretary of State aware that there is disbelief among the EIS about the Government's willingness to give sufficient priority to the educational system in Scotland and to find the money necessary to answer the claim, and that that feeling is rooted particularly in his refusal of an independent pay inquiry? Will he give an undertaking here and now to find new money to prime the pump so that these negotiations can be started? Is he aware that, without doing that, he will be in great difficulty?

Mr. Younger: Any teachers who are not convinced that the Government place a high enough priority on education have no reason to take such a view, considering that we are providing more per pupil both in primary and secondary schools than has ever been provided before. That answers completely that suspicion. The answer to the rest of the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question is that since last December I have been offering to help. The trouble is that nobody has taken it up.

Mr. Ewing: Despite the insults hurled at the teachers by the Secretary of State and by the Minister responsible for education and industry at the Scottish Office, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the teachers have shown a fair degree of good will in ensuring that the O and H-level examinations proceed smoothly? Will the Secretary of State show similar good will and give an assurance that it is no part of his tactics to allow the dispute to run on into the summer holidays and create discontent when the new term starts? Will he consider a fresh initiative to get talks going to solve this very damaging dispute?

Mr. Younger: I have never uttered any insults to teachers or, so far as I am aware, to anyone else. As for the examinations, I am very grateful to the EIS teachers for changing their deeply unpopular proposal to disrupt the examinations, which I understand are now proceeding reasonably normally. I certainly do not agree that parents would take a happy view of what has occurred, because they feel very bitter about the way in which their children have been targeted. As for showing understanding, any reasonable person considering the two parties to the dispute would agree that I have shown understanding throughout and that the other teachers' unions have also shown flexibility, but there has been no sign of that from the biggest union, which is a great shame.

Western Isles

2. Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he intends to make representations to the EEC for an extension of the integrated development programme in the Western Isles.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): The European Commission first proposed the IDP and, in the light of progress, it would be for the Commission to propose an extension if it believed one to be warranted. If it did so, the Government would evaluate the proposals carefully.

Mr. Stewart: In view of the satisfactory and widespread take-up of the grant available, does the Scottish Office intend to make its own approach to the EEC for an extension of the programme? In view of the wide take-up, will the hon. Gentleman ensure that there is a proper return on investment by all concerned by saving the agricultural advisory service from the cuts that he intends to make?

Mr. MacKay: I certainly hope that there will be a good return on the investment of £12 million by the Government and £8 million by the EEC for agriculture and fisheries and the additional £36 million from the Government for infrastructure and other activities. The IDP regulations require the Commission to submit a progress report before April 1986 and to make proposals to the Council of Ministers before 1987 as to whether the IDP should be extended. As I have said, we shall consider carefully anything that comes from the Council then.

Dr. Godman: With regard to European Community involvement in Scotland, what is the likelihood of the Government conducting a review in the near future——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is referring to the Western Isles.

Dr. Godman: I am referring to the whole of Scotland.

Mr. Speaker: The question relates to the Western Isles. Can the hon. Gentleman get his question into order? If not, I call Mr. Kennedy.

Mr. Kennedy: In representations about the IDP in relation to the Western Isles, will the Minister bear in mind that the agricultural development programme — or the assisted development programme, as it is also described — covering the Western Isles and other parts of the Highlands and Islands commands broad public support in those areas and also within the Commission and that the Government were committed to it before the last election? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is misleading always to say that it is up to the Commission to make proposals when those of us who represents the interests of the Highlands and Islands know — the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) will confirm this —that at present there is a more sympathetic ear from the Commission than from the Scottish Office?

Mr. MacKay: On the last part of the question, the hon. Gentleman is quite wrong. The Government are fully aware of the disadvantages of the Highlands and Islands. That is why we have injected substantial sums into the Highlands and Islands Development Board and introduced measures such as the recent enhancement of hill subsidies in the Highlands and Islands development area. As we have said before, however, it is for the Commission to come up with proposals for a development programme and we have undertaken that any such proposals will be given careful consideration.

Conservation

3. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will advise the chairman of the Forestry Commission to establish improved arrangements for consultation with responsible organisations concerned with conservation; and what arrangements for such consultations currently exist.

Mr. John MacKay: Discussions take place between the Forestry Commission and conservation bodies and there are many close contacts at local level. My right hon. Friend has no reason to think that the commission is unaware of the views of conservation bodies or that it fails to take them into account, and he is not convinced that there is a need for the introduction of any more formal arrangements.

Mr. Hardy: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there is widespread continuing concern that the Forestry Commission is reluctant to engage in meaningful consultation with responsible conservation bodies? Does he agree that there should be further examination of this matter to ensure that a sensible policy on broadleaved woodlands emerges?

Mr. MacKay: Most of the major conservation organisations will have had four opportunities to express their views to the Forestry Commission—in comments invited before the publication of the paper, in accepting the open invitation to submit written comments, by attending the seminar which was held on 8 May and by submitting written comments in a paper on that seminar. I think that every opportunity has been given to the conservation lobby to consult the Forestry Commission.

Sir Hector Monro: Is my hon. Friend concerned at the increasing trend towards undertaking afforestation without grants? Does he agree that this takes away the limited control over planning through the grant system and that, therefore, conservation and Scotland's scenic beauty are increasingly at risk?

Mr. MacKay: The case in the south of Scotland is the first major case of its kind in 10 years. The action taken by the owners of the land is to be deplored. It would be unfortunate if this incident were used to undermine confidence in the consultation procedures, which have proved highly effective over the years.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Will my hon. Friend accept that many of us on the Conservative Benches are also concerned about the broadleaved woodlands? When my hon. Friend speaks to the chairman of the Forestry Commission, will he tell him that many of us who take pleasure in the countryside take no pleasure whatsoever in seeing the broadleaved woodlands steadily eroded, very often by alien trees?

Mr. MacKay: I did not quite catch the last part of my hon. Friend's question. The Government and the Forestry Commission are well aware of the importance of broadleaved woodlands. That is why the Forestry Commission produced the paper and is having such widespread consultation on the future of broadleaved woodlands. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects to make a statement on the matter before the summer recess.

Mr. Dalyell: Will Parliament have an opportunity to debate the statement before decisions are taken?

Mr. MacKay: As I have just said to my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor), my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects to make a statement on this matter before the summer recess. Questions of debate are for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and not for me.

Mr. Home Robertson: Will the Under-Secretary of State say something about the disturbing case at Crichness in my constituency, where a private forestry company has completely disregarded the previously accepted system of controlling afforestation through forestry grants, which are supposed to take account of environmental and social concerns? In view of the damage that blanket afforestation could cause to the economy and environment of many hill farming areas, will the hon. Gentleman intervene to prevent a precedent from being set?

Mr. MacKay: As usual, the hon. Gentleman has greatly over-reacted to something that is, as I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), the first major case of its kind in 10 years. I think that I have made the Government's position clear. We deplore what has happened there. It would be unfortunate if the incident were used to undermine confidence in the consultation procedures, which have proved highly effective. Obviously, we shall carefully watch this case, and any others that come behind it.

Mr. Key: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is responsible for trees in my constituency of Salisbury, will my hon. Friend give an undertaking that, in the review of broadleaved woodlands policy, a proper balance is maintained between the preservation of the environment and employment opportunities in forestry-related industries?

Mr. MacKay: I thought for a moment that my hon. Friend was going to invite me to come to Salisbury. One has to take a broad view of forestry in the countryside. It has an important part to play in conservation, but it is also an important provider of employment in the rural areas.

Employment Prospects

4. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will next meet the general secretary of the Scottish Trades Union Congress to discuss the employment prospects for Scotland and Lanarkshire in particular.

Mr. Younger: I have no such meeting arranged, nor has any such meeting been requested.

Mr. Hamilton: As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, Labour Members have been persistent and insistent and will continue to be persistent in trying to alleviate the scourge of unemployment in Scotland, and in Lanarkshire in particular. As he is aware, two cases of major redundancies have been made known to us in my own constituency, and one company is teetering on the edge of bankruptcy. At the same time, many of the lads and lasses in the youth opportunities programme have not yet had their first job. Many people between 45 and 55 are still unemployed and have been unemployed for over two years. If the Government are not prepared to align themselves with the Centre Forwards, will they align themselves with the sweepers and try to sweep up this scourge?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's great concern about unemployment, which is shared by hon. Members in all parts of the House. The hon. Gentleman's description of some of the ill effects of unemployment is correct and should be borne in mind by everyone in the House. But it is unfair not to mention the large amount of work that has been done, the huge amount of money put into the youth training scheme, and before that the youth opportunities programme, and also some of the items of good news industrially in his own part of the world, including the better news regarding Terex and new orders for TWC.

Mr. Hirst: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the future of Ravenscraig is vital to employment prospects in Lanarkshire? Will he and his ministerial colleagues do everything possible to impress on the British Steel Corporation the need to invest in new coke ovens so that Ravenscraig can continue to produce competitively priced steel?

Mr. Younger: As my hon. Friend knows, I watch the position very closely. No such proposals have yet been made to the Government. When they are, I shall be looking into them very carefully.

Mr. Martin: The right hon. Gentleman may know that it has been announced that by 1987 the work force in the British Rail workshops will be reduced to about 460 people, salaried and non-salaried. He will know that since the new year the Alliance Box Company has closed down, White Horse Whisky has closed down, and now it appears that the only railway workshop in the country will possibly close down, because it cannot be sustained with that number of personnel. Will the right hon. Gentleman come to Springburn and do something for the people in that community?

Mr. Younger: I am extremely concerned to hear the news this morning about the railway workshop, and I echo the hon. Gentleman's concern about it. I am glad that BREL and the Scottish Development Agency are financing a study, commissioned by Glasgow Opportunities, into alternative employment opportunities in the area, and that BREL has allocated £500,000 towards putting the recommendations of the study into effect. The decision is for BREL, and it is caused by the fact that it has spent so much money in modernising railway stock that it does not need so many people to maintain old stock. It is a commitment from British Rail which, alas, has very unfortunate consequences for us.

Mr. Malone: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the deep concern in the city of Aberdeen about the employment prospect for workers in the Hall Russell shipyard? Will he do what he can to ensure that the yard is disposed of as quickly as possible so that uncertainty can be dispelled? Will he also ensure that, when the yard is disposed of, it will be on terms that allow it to be as competitive as other yards in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend has expressed great concern to me about this matter. In the Scottish Office we are also very concerned. I agree with him that the most important task is to end the uncertainty, and that the yard should be given the best possible opportunity to be competitive and get new work.

Mr. George Robertson: Does the Secretary of State realise that one Lanarkshire person in every five is out of work and that each is a major human, economic and social tragedy? Does he accept that that well merits the strictures in Oxford last night by the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym). Instead of giving us, at Question Time after Question Time, soft words of sympathy on unemployment, will the Secretary of State take the advice of his right hon. Friend and embark on a major investment programme in Scotland and get people back to work?

Mr. Younger: I am very anxious not to make the position worse by putting many other people out of work through raising interest rates and taxation to levels that businesses cannot afford.

Mr. Henderson: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that during the past year there has been an increase in the number of people in work in Scotland? Can he say what sectors of the economy have shown that increase? Will he discuss with the Scottish TUC whether, in concert with the CBI, its experience is that the prospects for stability of employment in the manufacturing sector are now more encouraging than for many years?

Mr. Younger: It is encouraging that for the past year there has been an increase in employment in Scotland. That must be the first step towards obtaining a reduction in unemployment. The increases have been principally in the service sector, which has been performing very strongly during the past few years. However, during the past year the manufacturing sector has also begun to increase employment, which is an encouraging sign.

Mr. Ewing: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the only growth industry in Scotland is the working parties being set up by him to consider alternative employment for those made redundant by the Government's economic policies? What will he do about the 600 redundancies announced today at the British Rail workshop at Springburn? Is he in favour of British Steel investment at Ravenscraig to replace the coke ovens? When will he stop expressing such pious concern while unemployment in Scotland continues to go up and up?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman's remarks would hold water only if his opening remark had been true. I wonder where he has been during the past few years. What about the oil industry, the electronics industry and the health care industry?

Mr. Ewing: They are all employing fewer people.

Mr. Younger: That is a totally untrue statement. All the industries that I mentioned are employing more people. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman gets his facts rights before he makes such statements.

Local Government Finance

5. Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received on the raising of local government finance; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): My right hon. Friend has received some 15,000 represention on the linked subjects of rates, revaluation and local taxation. Many of these suggest changes in the method of financing local government.

Mr. MacKenzie: Is the Minister aware that although many of us gave a guarded welcome to the proposals announced yesterday, we feel that they were hastily conceived? Many of us believe them to be a temporary, patch-up job. Is the Minister aware that we want the Secretary of State to go back to his office and take plenty of time to talk to local authority people and those who know about these matters, and return to the House with proposals on rating, valuation and rate support grant that will be fair, equitable and lasting for the future of Scotland?

Mr. Ancram: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his welcome — even though a little grudging — for the package announced yesterday. That is in line with the welcome given to it by ratepayers in Scotland. I find it difficult to understand how he could suggest that the scheme was hastily conceived when, for the past five weeks, others in this House have accused the Government of not coming forward with a scheme soon enough. We waited until we had the information we required to prepare a scheme that could work. When we had that information, we announced the scheme. The right hon. Gentleman knows that there is a current Government review, of which I am a part, looking at the whole system of financing local government. We hope to come forward with proposals this year.

Mrs. McCurley: While I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on his supreme efforts during the past few days to alleviate the problems of ratepayers in Scotland, may I suggest that before we make any radical alterations to the rating system we do not go from the frying pan into the fire, that we halt the decline in rate support grant and that we stop hooking the local government line with a sharp stick and reach a conciliatory point with it? That is absolutely necessary if we are to treat with local government over the next few years, which, after all, we must do, and which our supporters want us to do.

Mr. Ancram: I agree with my hon. Friend that the proposals that the Government bring forward with regard to the system of financing local government must be workable. It is for that reason that we are taking time in considering them. I believe that we will be able to come forward with something that meets that requirement. I further agree with my hon. Friend that we want to have good relations with local government. Last year, when there was a gap of some £200 million between that which it wished to spend and the level at which we believe it should be spending, we came halfway to meet it by enhancing the provision made by £98 million. We looked to it then, and we look to it now, to play its part. If it sticks within the reasonable spending guidelines set by the Government, there is no reason why we should not have the sort of relationship that my hon. Friend seeks.

Mr. Roy Jenkins: Can the hon. Gentleman confirm that in his right hon. Friend's scheme announced yesterday there is no tapering provision and that, therefore, for somebody short of a threefold increase in valuation with, say, a factor of 2·8 per cent., which probably means an increase in the actual bill of 80 to 100 per cent., there is no benefit at all, whether domestic or commercial? In view of the fact that this has to be seen in circumstances in which the Secretary of State has taken unprecedented steps to interfere with local government finance, and in which there is an alleged Government achievement of an inflation target of 4·5 to 6 per cent., this cannot be regarded as a matter for congratulation of the Secretary of State's administration of the Scottish Office.

Mr. Ancram: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman was present yesterday when my right hon. Friend made his statement, but, if he was, I do not think that he has understood the scheme that has been proposed. The scheme is quite simply to ensure that nobody suffers rate increases as a result of having a revaluation of over three times the valuation he had previously, so that those who benefit will benefit down to that extent only. I think that that is a fair way of doing it. If I may say so, it is somewhat in line with the proposals that were put forward by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) in his ten-minute Bill. The only difference— and I fear that this seems to be part of the alliance's way of calculating things—is that he got his calculations on what it would cost wrong by a factor of 10. That seems to be endemic in the Liberal party at present.

Mr. Dewar: First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) on what she said, which was certainly welcome. May I suggest to the Minister that, if he wants to make peace with local government, one contribution might be to refrain from financing the package announced yesterday from a general abatement clawed back out of the already inadequate spending allowed to local authorities? Can he confirm—because we want to avoid doubt and know exactly where we stand—the views of the Secretary of State that a manifesto commitment at the next election to rating reform will not do, and that the Scottish Office will therefore be in a position not only to produce a scheme but to legislate on rating reform in this Parliament?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman has quoted, I think accurately, what my right hon. Friend said at the conference, and that is of course the position. I think that many of us would be interested to know the views of the Labour party on rate reform. Opposition Members critise easily and give only grudging acceptance to the scheme that we put forward yesterday, but we hear nothing from them as to whether they wish to see the present rating system reformed or replaced. We look forward to hearing that in the future. As to the penalties, the hon. Gentleman knows full well that last August, a long time before revaluation took place, we were warning authorities that if they spent over the guidelines they would face penalties far more severe than those which were imposed last year. That has been the case, they made their spending decisions in the light of that knowledge, and we hope very soon to be able to announce the details of the penalties.

Rates

6. Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what further additional assistance he intends to give to Scottish ratepayers.

7. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the Government intend to seek to take any immediate action to relieve the rates burden on those commercial businesses most adversely affected by recent rates increases.

11. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he is considering for rating reform in Scotland to relieve the added financial burden on many small businesses during the present financial year.

Mr. Ancram: I refer the hon. Gentlemen to the statement my right hon. Friend made yesterday.

Mr. Marshall: Yesterday's statement anticipated many of today's questions, but for domestic ratepayers this is a case of too little too late. Will the Minister give a categorical assurance that this level of relief will continue for each year until revaluation takes place in the rest of Britain, when the situation can be reviewed? Will he also give an assurance that it will all be new money and that it will not be taken from the Scottish Office budget or recouped by further cuts in local government rate support grant?

Mr. Ancram: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said yesterday, we are talking about new money. The hon. Gentleman claims that we are giving too little too late to domestic ratepayers. He might like to consider the fact that the domestic relief element of the rate support grant, which directly benefits domestic ratepayers, was increased by £88 million this year, in addition to the £10 million announced yesterday. We have reacted to the revaluation problems in an exceptionally generous way and I am sure that the ratepayers of Scotland recognise that. As my right hon. Friend said yesterday, we shall consider what will happen next year in the autumn, when we make decisions on public expenditure for next year.

Mr. Wallace: Since the Chancellor of the Exchequer warned the Scottish Conservatives in Perth that he might not be so open-handed next year, can the Minister assure the House that the Secretary of State will at least argue his corner in Cabinet next year to achieve a similar arrangement? If it is not too late, will the Minister accept the need to consider the particular difficulties facing distilleries in Scotland, in particular two in my constituency, which face rate increases of over 80 per cent.? Will he give them special assistance this year and in future years?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman's concern for the Scottish ratepayers is in distinct contrast to that shown by his hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), who yesterday said that the package showed warped priorities. I wonder how many Scottish ratepayers will regard the package that way. We shall take decisions about next year in the autumn when we consider the rate support grant settlement and the domestic and other elements.

Mr. Kirkwood: I endorse what the Government have done, but will the Minister accept that there is an element of rough justice in the way in which the ceiling is applied? Has the Minister any plans to help the small business man with a multiplier of less than a factor of three who might still be put out of business? Has he any plans to consider his plight?

Mr. Ancram: We had to create a level of protection which we believed to be correct. The factor of three in terms of a multiplier on valuations covers the worst of the examples that have been drawn to our attention. As my right hon. Friend said yesterday, it covers about 50,000 commercial subjects. On the basis of those figures it is clear that many people who have been hard hit by the revaluation will benefit. I believe that the system is fair. When the details are made clear the hon. Gentleman might agree that it is fair.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There was a statement yesterday on this subject, so today I propose to give priority to those right hon. and hon. Members who were not called yesterday.

Mr. Fairbairn: Does my hon. Friend appreciate that, although we are grateful for the increase in money for domestic and commercial rate relief, quoting figures does not assist domestic or commercial ratepayers who are being asked to pay extra sums in rates which are uncommercial because they simply cannot afford them? Will he consider a scheme which, after the application of the announced scheme, is equitable and provides an equitable remedy for those who are caught in the rates poverty trap?

Mr. Ancram: I have to agree with my hon. and learned Friend that in some instances even a small increase in rates, of the type that has been imposed in past years, will cause problems. Even my hon. and learned Friend would not expect a scheme to be so sensitive as to deal with such instances. We have reached a formula by which, on the data available, we believe that the worst of the increases, such as those in my hon. and learned Friend's constituency which he drew to my attention, will be mitigated. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend's welcome for the scheme will be further enhanced when he sees the details of it and realises what it will mean.

Mr. Gourlay: Is the Minister aware that relief for domestic and commercial ratepayers, with which I agree, sets aside decisions by assessors? Will the Minister therefore take a further step and encourage the Scottish assessors to agree a basic system of valuation for Scotland and so prevent the assessor in Fife from going his own solitary way and deciding on his own the basis for certain properties?

Mr. Ancram: I do not think it can be said that we have set aside the decisions of the assessors, because, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said yesterday, there is a gap between the neutral effect of revaluation and the three times multiplier. Within those areas, the effects of the assessors' valuations will still be felt. It is important to remember that the basis of the system in Scotland is that the assessors are independent; they come to their judgments independently and, if necessary, they have to defend those judgments before the courts. There is an appeal system. Where valuations are felt to be unfair, I hope that people will make use of that appeal system, which we improved last year.

Mr. McQuarrie: I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on his most excellent statement to the House yesterday, which was widely welcomed in Scotland despite what we heard from the Opposition. Can my hon. Friend give any advice to highly rated commercial and domestic ratepayers, who have already received their demand notices, about whether they should withhold payment of their rates pending publication of the details of the Bill that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will introduce?

Mr. Ancram: The information that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave yesterday is sufficient for both domestic and commercial ratepayers to calculate whether they will benefit under the scheme, and by how much, because it is related to the amount of rates that is applicable as a result of their revaluations being over the three times multiplier. As those people will know that they will receive relief for that amount, I hope that they can make their business and commercial judgments accordingly.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the legislation make it clear that this is not a one-off exercise? Otherwise, what the Secretary of State offered yesterday will be seen as a sop to dissipate anger, but the anger will be much greater next year when the rate increases have to be met. Will the Under-Secretary guarantee that the Bill will carry on the Secretary of State's commitment to extra relief for more than one year?

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend said yesterday that he had heard what hon. Members had had to say about that matter. However, the details of the Bill must remain confidential until the Bill itself is published. That is the normal way in which things are done in the House. We hope to be able to publish the Bill shortly, and at that time the details will become apparent to the hon. Gentleman.

Glenochil Institutions (Report)

8. Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, following receipt of the report of his working party studying the Glenochil institutions, he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: The report of Dr. Chiswick's working group on suicide precautions at Glenochil will be published as soon as possible after I have received it. Fatal accident inquiries into the two most recent deaths at Glenochil have been arranged to start on 28 May and 12 June respectively. I shall consider the determinations of those inquiries, as well as the findings and recommendations of the working group, carefully and as a matter of urgency. I shall inform the House of my conclusions as soon as possible thereafter.

Mr. Steel: I thank the Secretary of State for that statement. Does he accept that there is still unease that there is not a more widespread inquiry into sentencing policy in Scotland? For example, will the working party that he has set up be empowered to take evidence from former inmates or the parents of former inmates of the Glenochil institutions?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his acceptance of what I said. I do not rule out some form of wider inquiry if we find from the report of Dr. Chiswick or from either of the fatal accident inquiries that further matters need to be investigated. I should not like to rule that out at this stage. With regard to further evidence, it is important that we should not delay Dr. Chiswick's report, or any others, by widening the working group's terms at present. I should prefer to get its results and then make any further inquiries that are necessary in the light of those results.

Mr. O'Neill: I welcome the Secretary of State's comments, which endorse what was said by his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram), in the debate two weeks ago. May we take it therefore that once the sub judice limitations of the fatal accident inquiries are out of the way it will be possible for the Government to institute a wider inquiry, and that that will mark a change in the Government's attitude to wider-ranging inquiries into Glenochil and other young offenders' institutions?

Mr. Younger: I do not think that I would wholly accept what the hon. Gentleman says. It is not really the sub judice position that prevents a further inquiry at this stage—although I believe that it would do so. The point is that we need to get a response to the initial inquiries first, to find out what else—if anything—we need to know. For my part, I wish to be as open as possible about the whole matter. If further matters need to be inquired into, I shall be glad to arrange that in due course.

Mr. Dewar: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for what he has said, which is helpful on the whole. The Opposition support the need for a detailed inquiry into the handling of suicide risk patients. The fatal accident inquiries are of course, essential, and I accept that they must be dealt with first. However, there is a strong feeling on the Labour Benches that we should consider the separate but important issue of whether it is right that detention centres should have been established as the only custodial option for many young offenders. That should be high on the agenda once the immediate inquiries into these tragic deaths have been completed.

Mr. Younger: I would be very happy for the whole subject, in its widest sense, to be on the agenda, and to co-operate in any suggestions that the hon. Gentleman has for discussing the matter or inquiring into it more widely, once we have received the preliminary results. There has been considerable widening of the methods of treatment of young offenders in recent years, and I see no reason why we should not examine the position further to see whether still more improvements could be made.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Drunkenness

42. Mr. Hirst asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many people in Scotland were charged with the offence of being drunk and incapable in the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): Provisional figures for 1984—the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available—reveal that 6,581 persons were proceeded against for the offence of being drunk and incapable.

Mr. Hirst: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for his reply. Does he agree that it would be more appropriate to treat a drunk in a detoxification centre than in a police court? If so, will he place on record the fact that he accepts that the DHSS resettlement unit at Bishopbriggs is fulfilling a vital role in treating chronic drunks in the west of Scotland?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I can make no particular comment on the unit at Bishopbriggs, although I know that my hon. Friend has taken a special interest in its work. However, there has been a great improvement in Grampian region and in Aberdeen city, where we have had a dreadful problem of people being drunk and incapable. They are now being referred to the detoxification centre, which is very often a much more appropriate way of dealing with the problem.

Mr. Maxton: Will the Solicitor-General for Scotland give us the figures for those in the west of Scotland who, instead of being charged with being drunk and disorderly and other drunkenness offences, have been taken to a detoxification unit? If the answer is none, when are the Government going to fulfill the pledge to decriminalise drunkenness that they made five years ago in the criminal justice legislation?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I commend the hon. Gentleman for repeating the points that he made in a recent debate during proceedings on the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill. Strictly speaking, this is not a matter for me, but I have already made it clear that, generally speaking, if we can take people who are simply drunk and incapable out of the courts and use detoxification instead, that is something to be desired.

Mr. Johnston: The search for a designated place is being actively pursued in Inverness. In view of what the Solicitor-General for Scotland has said about detoxification centres, can he assure us that there will be financial support from the Government for such an objective?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Although, with my responsibilities, I take a great interest in the handling of such matters, they are, strictly speaking, a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. I refer the hon. Gentleman to what my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay) said during an interesting debate on the matter during the Report stage of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill.

Mr. Fairbairn: Can my hon. and learned Friend give the House a breakdown of the figure of 6,500? Are there 65 people who are charged a hundred times each, or 6,500 people who are only charged once?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: No, I cannot, but the point implicit in my hon. and learned Friend's question is one that I appreciate. Often, unhappily, those convicted of being drunk and incapable are repeatedly taken before the courts for the same offence.

Coal Industry Dispute

43. Mr. Canavan asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many people were (a) arrested, (b) charged and (c) prosecuted as a result of incidents arising from the miners' strike; and, of those charged, how many the procurators fiscal have decided definitely not to prosecute.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As at 8 May 1985, 1,504 persons had been arrested; 1,483 persons had been charged by the police and criminal proceedings had been instituted by procurators fiscal against 1,004 persons as a result of incidents related to the miners' strike. Procurators fiscal decided not to take criminal proceedings against 450 persons reported as a result of such incidents.

Mr. Canavan: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree with the principle that no one should be punished twice for the same offence? If so, will he appeal to Albert Wheeler to stop his witch hunt and to reinstate all sacked miners, given that the loss of a man's livelihood is in most cases a much more severe punishment than that meted out by the courts?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: It is an essential principle of the criminal law in Scotland that no one should be subject to any double jeopardy. I have attempted to answer this question on at least three occasions. The hon. Gentleman must appreciate that how the National Coal Board deals with matters such as industrial misconduct following criminal conviction is entirely a matter for the NCB. The hon. Gentleman would be very surprised if I sought in any way to interfere in that.

Mr. Eadie: The hon. and learned Gentleman, who is accountable to this House, surely cannot sidestep a question such as this—even the question of legality—given that he is a member of the Government. He must be aware that double jeopardy is involved in these cases, because a man is not only found guilty of the offence but loses his job. Is the hon. and learned Gentleman aware that although the strike ended months ago, the number of victimised miners is increasing—initially it was slightly more than 200, and now it is more than 300?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Industrial misconduct and possible dismissal arising from it is not a matter for me. If the NCB or any other employer has acted in breach of the law in dismissing these persons, a clearly defined remedy is available through the industrial tribunals. Miners who feel that they have been unfairly dismissed have the opportunity to take advantage of that. I am responsible for criminal convictions arising out of criminal offences. The hon. Gentleman will particularly appreciate that it would be quite wrong for me to seek to interfere with any decisions taken by the NCB in relation to employment and industrial misconduct.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that, in relation to people arrested and later charged, it is common practice among procurators fiscal not to proceed for a variety of reasons? Consequently, the figures that emerge here are not dissimilar from what one would expect in other circumstances. There is nothing unusual about an individual being dismissed for conducting himself in a manner considered to constitute industrial misconduct. It happens to bus drivers, lorry drivers and others who are found guilty in the courts of offences that affect their jobs.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: My hon. Friend is quite right. There are a variety of reasons why, at the end of the day, procurators fiscal determine not to institute proceedings against individuals. A discretion is vested in those procurators fiscal, and on a number of occasions —not just arising out of the miner's strike, but more generally — they determine that there should be no proceedings, although prima facie, on the basis of the information available to them, there had been a breach of the law.

Mr. Dewar: Has the hon. and learned Gentleman noticed that out of the first 603 people prosecuted as a result of the miners' strike, only six were convicted of assault, five for carrying offensive weapons and 27 for vandalism—a total of 38? All the rest were charged with much more minor offences such as obstruction or breach of the peace. Does that square with the claim that all the miners who have been dismissed have been guilty of serious offences against other miners, their families or board property?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As the hon. Gentleman appreciates all too well, in Scotland the offence of a breach of the peace covers a very wide range of conduct, and in some circumstances a breach of the peace can be a very serious matter. On the basis of the figures that the he has advanced, and those which he has extracted from all the figures that are available, I must repeat that it is for the NCB to determine what it considers to be industrial misconduct giving rise to dismissal. As the hon. Gentleman also appreciates, if the NCB is wrong, the industrial tribunals can reach a different determination.

White Fish (By-catch Prosecutions)

24. Mr. Wallace asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions and convictions there have been in Scotland since September 1984 for offences arising out of a white fish by-catch in excess of the permitted 18 per cent. by-catch in the Norwegian pout fishery.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: One.

Mr. Wallace: I note that there has been only one prosecution. Will the Solicitor-General confirm that, before prosecutions are instituted, the actual by-catch which has been measured as a sample is usually much in excess of 18 per cent. and, indeed, is about 24 or 25 per cent.? Will he accept that because of that Danish boats fish for pout in waters which they previously did not fish? Will he give all support to his colleagues who, at the forthcoming meeting of the EC Council of Fisheries Ministers will try to reduce the by-catch to 10 per cent.?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As the hon. Member appreciates, my right hon. Friend has already given an answer on the appropriate level of by-catch. Between October 1984 and March of this year 70 boardings were made by enforcement officers; in 53 of these by-catches of under 10 per cent. were found and in 17 there were by-catches of over 10 per cent., but still under 18 per cent. There was only this one case where the by-catch exceeded 18 per cent. I hope the hon. Member will be reassured that the extent of the by-catch by Danish fishermen has not been so great as to be a cause of anxiety to fishing organisations in Scotland. If the hon. Gentleman has any other information I hope that he will make it available.

Early-day Motion 686

3.33 pm

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I draw your attention to early-day motion 686—

[That this House condemns the reported statement of the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley that the Falkland Islanders lacked guts and calls upon him to withdraw the statement; and further calls upon him to give up his campaign of rewriting the history of the events before, during and after the conflict which is designed to justify his attitude towards the sending of the Task Force to restore freedom, the rule of law and democracy to the islands after the unprovoked invasion by the Argentinians.]— and also to Prime Minister's questions yesterday when comments were made based on reports in the national newspapers which were completely untrue? May I tell you and the House that at the incident concerned no water jug or glass was involved and no scuffle took place? The Secretary of State for Defence was not involved, and he will confirm that. The statement attributed to me was not correct. I said that the mothers of the disappeared are as brave as any Falklander, and I stand by that.

I have subsequently had an apology from Reuters, which issued the statement. May I now ask how I can get an apology from the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), the Prime Minister and the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and his colleagues who put down the early-day motion, no doubt in good faith but based on an entirely untrue report?

Mr. Speaker: I have allowed the hon. Gentleman in fairness to put his point of view to the House. The hon. Members concerned will have heard what he said.

Later—

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Early-day motion 686 stands in my name. I accept unreservedly what the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) has said and I am prepared to withdraw any criticisms that are implied in the motion. However, Mr. Speaker, you will remember that yesterday——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not qualify his generous withdrawal.

Mr. Walker: You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that I spoke about the matter during yesterday's proceedings, again on a point of order. I said that matters had developed because of the radio broadcasts from the Falkland Islands. I listened on Radio Clyde, of which the hon. Gentleman will be aware, to the tape recordings of the radio programmes. However, I am still prepared to accept his categorical assurance that he did not say that which was contained in the broadcasts, and I withdraw unreservedly any criticisms that are implied in the motion. However, I remind the hon. Gentleman of the submarine——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman has done very well.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Today the Home Office has issued a supplementary White Paper on the scientific procedures on living animals. It was issued at a press conference thereby giving the press an opportunity to question the Home Secretary. I hope that you, Mr. Speaker, will support my view that on such an important matter a representative of the Home Department should have been in the Chamber today to answer Members' questions on the paper. Many people are concerned about animal experiments. In fact, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, on Friday morning I shall present a petition signed by 500,000 people who are concerned about the outrageous and barbaric LD 50 test. I mention that only to show you the magnitude of the concern of the British people about animal experiments.

Is it within your power, Mr. Speaker, to insist that the Home Secretary or one of his junior Ministers should come before the House and allow Members of Parliament to have the same right as members of the press have had today?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that I feel strongly that this House should be the forum of the nation where we should discuss all these matters. It is not a matter for me whether statements are made to the press or elsewhere.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not a fact that a White Paper is presented to Parliament? Surely that is the purpose of a White Paper; that is what is said on a White Paper. I put it to you as protector of the interests of the House of Commons that for a White Paper to be issued and a statement then made to the press and not to Parliament is offensive to the interests of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: That is as may be, but, unhappily, it is not a matter for me.

Questions to Ministers

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During Question Time the Secretary of State said when answering a question on the teachers' dispute that he had two observers on the management side of the teachers' negotiating machinery. That is an incorrect statement. The fact is——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is seeking to perpetrate a practice of which I think the entire House disapproves, which is to continue Question Time. Hon. Members often feel that Question Time should continue but, in fairness to others, I cannot allow the hon. Gentleman to continue with his point of order.

Early-day Motion 692

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I draw your attention to early-day motion No. 692.

[That this House expresses its surprise at the non-participation of the Right honourable Member for Chesterfield in the debate on the Second Reading of the Oil and Pipelines Bill on 14th May.]

I have not contacted the hon. Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles), who tabled the motion, and I imply no criticism of any hon. Member who tables an early-day motion which is accepted by the Table Office.

My point of order turns on the acceptance of an early-day motion that seeks to criticise a right hon. Member for not seeking to take part in a debate. It is a dangerous precedent. It presupposes that if any right hon. or hon. Member seeks to participate in a debate the occupant of the Chair will automatically call him. There is a host of reasons why from time to time right hon. and hon. Members do not seek to take part in debates. If the Table Office is to accept such motions as early-day motion 692, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the Order Paper will be littered with them day after day.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has drawn attention to a matter that is important for the entire House. The early-day motion was in order — there was nothing wrong with it — and that is why the Table Office accepted it. However, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is not possible for every hon. Member to take part in every debate. If hon. Members sought to do so, my job would be impossible.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I, too, am slightly concerned about early-day motion 692. Any Member could find himself confronted with a motion on the Order Paper condemining him for not taking part in a debate even though he may have attempted to do so. The decision whether a Member takes part in a debate lies entirely within your discretion, Mr. Speaker, as it should do. I am wondering whether it was in order for the Table Office to accept the motion in the first instance.

Mr. Speaker: I have already said that it was. I think that the House has the sense of what I said to the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing). I do not think that the tabling of such motions is a very wise practice.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that there is an important debate to follow.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I can put my point in one sentence. Is not early-day motion 692 a challenge to the Chair?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think so.

Handicapped Young Persons

3.39 pm

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Education Act 1981 to improve provision for handicapped young people; and for connected purposes.

This is International Youth Year. It is right that Parliament should concern itself with young people in general and in particular with those young people to whom nature has given less of a deal than to others. My Bill seeks to do something for young people who have special educational needs.

The House will recall that when the admirable Warnock report became enshrined in legislation in the Education Act 1981, there was general concern about some of its details. We have now had two years of monitoring that Act. I should like to draw the attention of the House to the Official Report of the proceedings on Monday 13 May and Tuesday 14 May and to the replies that I received to my questions.

On Tuesday 14 May I

"asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many young people there are between the ages of 16 and 19 with special educational needs; and how many places are available for this group in (a) schools and (b) further education".

The reply that I received was:

"This information is not available centrally." — [Official Report, 14 May 1985; Vol. 79, c. 105-106.]

On Monday 13 May I

"asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average length of time between a parent appealing to him under . . . sections (6) of the Education Act 1981 and the announcement of the result of the appeal."

The reply that I received from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science was:

"The average . . . is 17 weeks." — [Official Report, 13 May 1985; Vol. 79 c. 54.]

My modest Bill seeks to improve the lot of those young people who are caught by both aspects of the Act. Let me deal, first, with the 16 to 19-year-olds, who were identified by Warnock as one of three priority areas. Local education authorities have a duty under the Education Act 1944 to provide "full-time education suitable to the requirements of senior pupils".

The Act defines a senior pupil as one between the ages of 12 and 19.

The House must understand that a handicapped young person needs to be provided with the opportunity for further education. Some will have missed a substantial amount of schooling and taken longer to assimilate skills. Others need further education for the chance to live an independent life. The opportunity to lead that kind of life can be crucially affected by three years within or outwith education. The present loophole means that some young people — those with less caring local education authorities or with less articulate parents than others — are being denied opportunities which are rightfully theirs. I submit that it is plumb wrong that provision for handicapped people should be a lottery, as it is now, depending not on need or ability but on where one lives and how loudly one's parents can shout.

If I may turn to the appeals procedure, the 1981 Act allows parents to appeal against the statement of needs and the local education authority's proposals to meet those needs. However, the appeal tribunal is prevented by the

[Mr. Clement Freud]

Act from taking positive action. It can accept the statement or it can send it back, but it cannot change it. If the tribunal sends it back, the local education authority has no legal duty to change the proposals. I add in parentheses that parents can then go to the Secretary of State for Education and Science, but that is hardly the point.

My Bill will give to the tribunal the same legal powers as those which were given in the 1981 Act to tribunals deciding upon choice of school. It will thus bring to an end legal discrimination between the parents of handicapped children and the parents of other children.

I should like to tell the House about the case of Major Lawson, a gentleman who had two sons with learning difficulties. Under the 1981 Act, the boys were the subject of statements by Surrey local education authority. It proposed that the boys should be sent to a local school and that the local school should be awarded an extra teacher. Major Lawson appealed. The tribunal sent the case back to Surrey local education authority—a clear indication that the tribunal was not satisfied with its proposal—but Surrey declined to do anything about it. Eighteen weeks later the Secretary of State overruled that decision.

Not all children are fortunate enough to have someone like Major Lawson fighting for them. To have children with special educational needs is hard enough without having to fight bureaucracy as well.

I should like to know why it takes 18 weeks for the Secretary of State to make a decision under the 1981 Act. He said that education would be a partnership. I want to make it a genuine, not a weighted, partnership.

I believe that it is right, during International Youth Year, to improve legislation introduced during the International Year of Disabled People. I therefore wish to present the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Clement Freud, Mr. David Alton, Mr. John Hannam, Mr. Jack Ashley, Mr. Dafydd Wigley, Mr. Gordon Wilson, Mr. A. J. Beith, Mr. Charles Kennedy, Mr. Archy Kirkwood and Mr. Michael Hancock.

HANDICAPPED YOUNG PERSONS

Mr. Clement Freud accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Education Act 1981 to improve provision for handicapped young people; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 7 June and to be printed. [Bill 147.]

Opposition Day

[11TH ALLOTTED DAY]—considered

Industry and New Technologies

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister. In view of the number of right hon. and hon. Members who have indicated their wish to take part, I propose to apply the 10-minute rule to speeches between 7 pm and 8.50 pm.

3.46 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I beg to move,

That this House deplores the Government's wilful neglect of British manufacturing industry which has caused the continuous erosion of the individual base, the record high levels of unemployment and the huge and unprecedented trade deficit in manufactured goods; and calls upon the Government to put into effect a programme of industrial regeneration based on the application of new technology to modernise existing industries and to develop new products and processes, the provision of adequate investment for industry in Britain, the necessary provision of research and development and a massive expansion of education and training in order to reduce production costs and increase competitiveness at home and abroad.

Outwith the ranks of Government apologists and acolytes, there are few people in Britain today with any knowledge of our industry who take seriously the Government's claim that their economic and, in particular, industrial policies have been successful. That, of course, is the claim — everthing is improving, increasing or growing. Each week we have to listen to the Prime Minister during Prime Minister's Question Time replying with a carefully manicured set of selective statistics. She will claim that industrial output is better in 1985 than it was in 1981. Perhaps so. It should be. It was at an utterly disastrous level in 1981. The fact that that disastrous level was caused by her policies does not seem to worry her.

The Government's policy is to brass it out, and to batter the critics with selective statistics and sometimes, I understand, with slogans that cause offence to Conservative right hon. Members; to suppress criticism — although not successfully in some cases; to malign critics — that is almost always done; to claim that all public intervention of any kind would be disastrous, despite the evidence of the results of the lack of it; to claim that all spending must be inflationary; and to pretend that one can live comfortably and with a good conscience in a nation where there are nearly 4 million people unemployed, where there is a growing under class of the deeply impoverished, and where the young generation has been condemned to idleness or to a gross diminution of opportunity.

To put matters into perspective, let us remind ourselves of the statistics. Investment in manufacturing is still 25 per cent. below 1979 levels and manufacturing output has far from reached the 1979 levels. What a result of six years' so-called progress. Over those years we have seen a relentless erosion of our capacity for industrial success. Indeed, if production had increased at the levels of 1974 to 1979, it would be 6 per cent. higher than it is at present, which means that a great deal more wealth would have been available to this country.

Mr. John Harvey-Jones, together with Lord Weinstock, in giving evidence in another place the other week, fired a broadside at the complacent Government by observing that not only did he sell 11 per cent. less of ICI's products in the United Kingdom than he sold in 1979 but that the principal reason for that was that 30 per cent. of his customers had ceased to exist since 1979. [Interruption.] That seems to be the cause of some merriment to the parliamentary private secretary, the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page). I assure him that it is a matter of deep concern to those customers who have ceased to exist since 1979.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that this is his party's Supply Day and that the packed Labour Benches show the extreme interest of his hon. Friends in what he described as a severe and difficult subject?

Mr. Smith: I was not remarking on that. I was remarking on the fact that the hon. Gentleman appeared to find it amusing that 30 per cent. of ICI's customers had ceased to exist. That should be a matter for shame among Conservative Members.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble) rose——

Mr. Smith: I have hardly started my speech. Perhaps I may be allowed to develop my case before being interrupted.

In our motion, we draw attention to the catastrophic position in trade and manufactured goods. In 1984, the trade deficit in manufactured goods on current account was £4 billion. That was not some blip in the figures or flash in the pan. In 1983, the deficit was £2·5 billion, and it seems from the figures for the first quarter of 1985 that we are heading for an annual deficit of well over £4 billion.

We see not a word about that from the Government in their rather silly amendment to our motion. However, it throws a searchlight of truth on the Government's selective statistics. We are losing out in the competition with other industrial countries. Not only are we now in deficit where once we were in continuous surplus, but the size of the deficit is alarming.

When he replies, I hope that the Secretary of State will explain precisely what the Government plan to do about this worrying trade deficit. What is their view of it? We have never heard one expressed. They may not wish to discuss it, but here, in the House of Commons, where they are accountable, they must discuss it. The truth is that it reveals a serious decline in the capacity, competitiveness and effectiveness of British Industry.

These problems have, at the least, been sharply accentuated, if not caused — indeed, we believe that many of them have been so caused — by Government policies, or the lack of them, towards industry since 1979. They have neglected British industry with the dire consequences which we now confront. They do not believe in Britain as a manufacturing economy. The Chancellor said in February of last year:

"I am at a loss to understand the selective importance attached by the Opposition and some Tories to the manufacturing sector".

It could not have been said more clearly or plainly than that. He and his predecessors have believed that Britain could get by living on North sea oil revenues, on the expansion of service industries and on a few profitable industrial centres. That is the heresy of modern Conservatism. It is a dangerous heresy. It was corroborated by that other famous fatuity of the Chancellor when he spoke to the International Monetary Fund on 25 September of last year and said:

"Many of the jobs of the future will be in the labour-intensive service industries which are not so much low-tech as no-tech."

What a vision of the future for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to have. If he intends to staff all the fried chicken concessions from one end of the land to the other, he will have to do that by driving down the wages of young people so that they will be forced to abandon their legitimate ambitions and submit to low grade work for low grade pay.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): The right hon. and learned Gentleman is disparaging the extremely important job-creating and money-earning capacity of tourism, which is vital to the north west.

Mr. Smith: I have not yet said anything about tourism. I was talking about fried chicken. If the hon. Lady regards that as tourism, she needs to learn a little more before attempting to cross-question me on the subject. In fact, I regard tourism as an important sector. Its services, like those of banking and finance, are internationally tradeable. Many so-called service industries, however, are merely an exercise in taking in one another's washing and do little to increase our wealth, competitiveness or economic strength. The hon. Lady should have a word with her right hon. Friend the Chancellor about the dangerous fallacy of creating so-called service industries and forcing young people especially to accept low wages to work in them.

There is no better example of the Government's neglect of industry than the present situation at British Leyland. BL has put to the Government a corporate plan for the Austin Rover group, including a replacement for the A series engine which was originally designed in 1951 and requires replacement by a product in line with modern technology and performance expectations. I understand that those improvements are unlikely to take place because the Government regard the corporate plan as too ambitious. If BL cannot produce the replacement engine itself, it is supposed to take one from Honda. The Government claim that there is no problem and that they are simply having friendly discussions with BL, but last week a prominent BL executive resigned in disgust at the Government's reaction to the corporate plan and it is clear that the Government have no intention of supporting the development of the new engine.

Collaboration with Honda is one thing. Capitulation is quite another. BL is a vital, British-owned part of our manufacturing industry. There has been a magnificent fight-back by workers and management and it must not be prejudiced by a silly Government's refusal to support the sensible proposals in the corporate plan. I hope that the Government will soon remove that uncertainty. If they support the corporate plan and give BL the resources that all who work there believe that it deserves and which the Opposition certainly support, I shall be the first to congratulate the Government. If, however, they let slip another asset and tip Britain's remaining capacity to develop motor vehicle engines gratuitously into the hands of the Japanese, they will deserve the contempt of the House, the entire British people and especially of those who depend on that industry for their livelihood.

Mr. Robert Atkins: As the Member representing Leyland, I have as much interest in it as the right hon. and learned Gentleman has. Will he comment on the problems faced by the truck and bus division, which is part and parcel of BL? I agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman's comments about the difficult times that the firm has been through and the achievements of the work force in terms of productivity and facing up to the problems involved. The biggest problem for the truck and bus division, however, is the fall in exports to Third world markets caused by the recession. How does the right hon. and learned Gentleman expect the company to get out of that problem?

Mr. Smith: I was referring to the need for the Austin Rover group to update and replace the series A engine and nothing in the hon. Gentleman's comments contradicts that. If the hon. Gentleman is as interested in the future of BL as he claims, I hope that he will join the Opposition in pressing the Government to support the company and the industry properly.

There is a serious trade deficit in the motor vehicles sector. Even sadder to relate, another example is that of information technology goods. In 1984, the deficit in the information technology sector alone was £2·3 billion, following deficits of £462 million in 1982 and £800 million in 1983. The situation seems to be worsening and there is now about 54 per cent. import penetration, so the situation is desperately serious for our industry.

Information technology has the capacity to change the whole of our society, and it is of the greatest importance that we maintain our position. The trouble is that it looks as though our position is seriously deteriorating. The Ashworth report, which was prepared by the information technology economic development committee of the National Economic Development Office, told us that United Kingdom industry faces a crisis of survival. It now has such a small share of the market that it can no longer invest adequately in product development. In the graphic words of Professor Ashworth, "the so-called sunrise industry may be eclipsed before it has even risen."

This aspect is of strategic importance to the whole of British industry. If we become dependent on overseas suppliers, we shall not only lose the wealth that we could have gained if we had produced the goods ourselves but become seriously disadvantaged in other crucial respects. Inevitably, our imported equipment will lag behind the best that has been produced by the originators. The originators will be better placed to anticipate the next moves forward and to foresee more clearly and act more quickly to exploit more applications and markets. Perhaps the worst aspect of all is the fact that we shall be in the hands of others.

Lest there be any doubt about the danger, let us remember the letter that IBM sent to all those who had bought its products in the United Kingdom, reminding them of the so-called requirement to observe the law of the United States—another example of the legal imperialism to which, I am sorry to say, the United States is so wedded.

The only way in which we can protect our industry and people and safeguard our key technology is to free ourselves from such a dependence and support our industry. That would, of course, involve the Government. The Government have been involved, but only tentatively, in the support of information technology.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): The right hon. and learned Gentleman has made an interesting point about world demand. Is he aware of the statistic——

Mr. Smith: I was not talking about that.

Mr. Leigh: I think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was talking about the market for British goods.

Mr. Smith: I was not making that point.

Mr. Leigh: In that case, I shall intervene later.

Mr. Smith: As the hon. Gentleman was asking a question on an assumption that I had not articulated, I think that I was foolish to give way to him.

The Alvey programme amounts to £350 million over five years — far too small a contribution — for precompetitive research. It is only scratching at the edge of the problem. Support for the innovation programme was brought to a shuddering halt last November when it was suddenly cut. There was a five-month moratorium before the Government finally emerged from their deliberations to announce a new programme of support for innovation. The sum of £10 million has been cut from a budget that was already too small.

The Ashworth report showed that a consensus exists in the information technology industry, comprehending management, the unions and the experts, all asking for action to be taken by the Government. The only people so far to lag behind are the Government, who have refused to support the industry in the way requested.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Does it come as a great shock to the right hon. and learned Gentleman to learn that there is a consensus within the industry about the need for more Government money?

Mr. Smith: It does not come as a great shock to me. If there is a need for more research and development, for more education and training and for support to be given to industry in this country on a similar level to support in other countries, I would expect an intelligent industry to ask the Government for support. I am shocked not by the request but by the Government's response—a response which this Government appear almost uniquely to give. Our competitor countries do not take that attitude. The hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) and his colleagues would do better to back industry rather than this rather silly Government.

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: This is the last time I shall give way. I have given way frequently.

Mr. Lloyd: I have been following with great fascination the arguments which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has been articulating, because they closely match those that I directed at the Labour party when it was in power. That is not to say that some of his arguments do not have some validity. The right hon. and learned Gentleman seeks to pin responsibility "uniquely" on this Government. Has he read the OECD report on the semiconductor industry which points out clearly that the main difference is between, on the one hand, the United States and Japan and, on the other, the whole of western Europe? The criticism that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is applying uniquely to the British Government applies to the whole of western Europe and all its Governments, Conservative and Socialist alike. How does the right hon. and learned Gentleman escape from that dilemma?

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman should read the Ashworth report in detail. In it unfavourable comparisons were made between the support given to industry by other OECD countries and that given by the United Kingdom. It may well be true that, regrettably, the United States and Japan are well ahead of western Europe as a whole; I would not dispute that for one moment. I am prepared to compare our performance with that of Japan and the United States and our performance with that of the EEC. Even comparing Britain's performance with that of the rest of Europe, the Government have no cause to congratulate themselves. I am sure that the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd), who has long had an interest in these matters, agrees that the importance of information technology cannot be underestimated. It is the key to the new products and processes of the future. It is as important to the renovation of traditional industries as it is to the discovery and development of new industries, some of which may at present be beyond our imagination.

The motor vehicle industry is one of the biggest users of modern electronics. The fewer cars we make, the fewer components we sell, and so on—the process goes right down the line. We lose out at every stage. The Labour party certainly rejects a superficial distinction between sunrise and sunset industries. The crucial question to ask is whether the industries can be renewed.

The leader in The Times today says that the Labour party is wrong to attack the Government for their neglect of the new technologies. The Times says that Britain is doing quite well. Its leader writer should read the Ashworth report. He certainly does not seem to have noticed the trade deficit of £2·3 billion. He said that finance was easily available to companies in the high-tech sector, but I think that that will come as a great surprise to some of those companies that have gone under recently. It will come as even more of a surprise to those who have had to sell out to United States companies to stay in existence and to the management of Acorn which developed the BBC2 microcomputer and which, because it could not find finance in this country, was recently taken over by Olivetti. Many companies in this sector have been forced into amalgamations or forced to stop business because of the lack of suitable finance.

When companies seek to expand in the information technology sector and other sectors, they run into problems because of high unemployment. They run into labour shortages — of computer technicians, scientists and other people at all levels. This is true of a much wider range of British industry than just the IT sector. We read of the difficulties faced in finding workers, even those with traditional skills, such as fitters, welders and machinists. All this is happening in the wake of the dismantling of the industrial training boards, the destruction of the apprentice training system and the closing down of the skillcentres — all of which have been the result of Government policies. The Government cannot be surprised when those aspects of British industry that can expand seek to do so and collide immediately with labour shortages. Much of the responsibility for that lies at the Government's door.

This will go on—high unemployment together with skill shortages, poor collaboration of research and development with poor Government support of it, missed opportunities and the colonising of our markets by our competitors — until we have an industrial strategy and resolve to plan our recovery and the regeneration of our industry. The present Government will not do that. They are wedded to non-intervention as a political principle and to market forces. Specifically in the crucial area of the Department of Trade and Industry, they avow a policy of withdrawing from the industrial scene.

I do not think that the Liberals or Social Democrats are likely to produce a different policy. They are as wedded to market forces as the Government. This is especially so of the Social Democratic party. I note that the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) is here. The leader of the Social Democrats is even more extreme than the Government in his addiction to market forces. So addicted is the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) that he has been tipped by a former director of the Institute of Directors as the next leader of the Conservative party.

Any recovery and adoption of industrial strategy must be planned. This will not happen accidentally or spontaneously. We argue that three crucial engines of that recovery must be at the heart of any intelligent industrial strategy: new policies for investment; new policies for education and training; and new policies for research and development.

We know that the City has failed to provide for the investment needs of British industry, especially at the high-technology, high-risk, end. It is difficult enough for investment to be made with the highest real interest rates in our history and with the most erratic movements in the exchange rate, to both of which Government folly has subjected us.

In too many cases the City and its institutions refused to provide adequate finance. Indeed, we suffer grievously from the lack of an industrial banking system. That is why the Labour party urges the creation of a national investment bank which can lend to industry on a time scale and on a basis which will secure the investment that our industry needs to re-equip, particularly in the new technologies—[Interruption.] I think that the objections of some Conservative Members arise from the fact that they think that the City already provides adequately for the needs of British industry and that there is no need for the state to provide an institution such as the Labour party proposes.

If that is their belief, I recommend that they listen to the words of one of their colleagues in the Cabinet. I refer to a speech of the Secretary of State for Wales to Cardiff Business Club. I quote from the Financial Times of 9 March 1985 what he said about the City:

"there is a prejudice, ignorance and a striking lack of awareness of what is actually happening in a fast-changing industrial world outside the narrow confines of their own experience."

He went on to say that there was a "physical chasm" between the City and Britain's industrial areas. He said:

"Among many household names in the financial world, there is at best a failure to comprehend the problem"— that seems to be a problem here as well—

"and at worst a startling arrogance that leads them to conclude that all is well, that nothing calls for reform and that anyone with a good project can always find backing for it."

I think that the Secretary of State for Wales has played himself into the position of "Centre Forward" with that observation.

[Mr. Smith]

In research and development, the notion of Government non-involvement is particularly absurd. No one can believe that there will be any improvement in research and development in Britain unless the Government take a hand and sponsor it. It is through our universities, our polytechnics and our research institutes that we shall help the research and development that should have been going on in industry. At present it is left to market forces, and it is simply not happening. A Government who recognise that Britain needs an industrial strategy and needs to have the proper research and development which alone will find the new products and processes need to sponsor it directly and make sure that it happens.

We have magnificent inventors and scientists. Very often the innovative breakthrough in technology is made here, but for some reason the brilliant idea and the successful product are too infrequently connected. It is just not happening. Do we sit back and let it not happen, or do we set to work to make it happen?

The only way in which we shall get research and development on the scale that modern British industry needs will be for the Government to take upon themselves the responsibility to make sure that it happens. That will mean the commitment of resources and investment by the Government. I do not know why Conservative Members find that difficult to understand. It is so commonplace that it would not merit comment in Japan or in our competitor countries in Europe. They would not regard it as a startling statement to make. It is so obvious that they would wonder why it needs to be articulated.

We need a massive expansion of education and training. It was always true to say that our future depended on the skills of our people. In an age of information technology, it is even more profoundly true. Education is now a crucial part of an intelligent industrial policy. In the destruction of our apprenticeship system and the whole apparatus of industrial training, to which the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry committed himself when he was Secretary of State for Employment, the Government have done of their greatest disservices out of many to the British people. Education and training simply cannot be left to the erratic play of market forces.

The programme for investment, education and training, and research and development, will need resources and investment. Is there any alternative to what the Opposition are proposing? It is not as if the Government have not had resources in recent years. Since 1979 they have had what the previous Labour Government did not have—North sea oil revenues, now running at more than £13 billion each year. Only a fraction of that huge windfall of North sea oil revenues has been spent on industrial investment, in research and development, and in education and training. With proper investment, would not our industrial prospects have been transformed?

The money was handed to the Government on a plate when they took office. What have they done with it? They have spent every penny piece of it on paying for the cost of extra unemployment created since they came to office. That is the contrast between the Opposition and the Government. Investment must be made in the crucial areas to which I referred.

Unemployment, which is costing about £19 billion in benefits, lost income tax and other taxes, is the expensive option. Apart from the fact that it is the road to misery for millions of our people, and a denial of opportunity to a whole generation, it is such a misshapen use of resources that it is almost obscene.

Therefore, we ask the House to support our motion, which draws attention to the neglect under which British industry has languished under this Government, manifested so clearly by the disastrous trade figures of recent months and years. But we do more than that: we point the way forward to a sensible policy for the 1990s. Our fear is that Britain will enter the 1990s with an industry based on an obsolescent technology and with an unskilled work force, just at the time when North sea oil is running out, and that we shall be exposed to the full force of international competition, without the masking effect which North sea oil has had over our trade statistics. That would plainly be a disaster. The decisions have to be taken fairly soon if they are to have any effect in avoiding that catastrophe in the 1990s.

That is why the Labour party has embarked on a jobs and industry campaign to put the issues at the centre of political debate, not only in this House but throughout the country. We hope to start a national debate, and that our views will find increasing favour with the electorate. I believe that they will.

The Government deserve the censure of the House for the neglect to which they have subjected British industry. But their true reckoning will not be in the debate here today; it will be at the next general election, when, because of their record, they will be replaced.

4.18 pm

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'welcomes the recent substantial increase in manufacturing output, the sharp rise in exports, the major gains in the competitiveness of British industry, and the improved optimism of independent bodies such as the Confederation of British Industry; congratulates the Government on the measures it has taken to assist the recovery of British industry through its support for innovation programme, support for investment, support for exports, business and technical advisory services, assistance with education and training and in particular today's Export for Jobs seminar and the commencement of Local Enterprise Week, as well as its policies to improve the economic climate in which business operates; and regrets the Opposition's willingness to support every single strike no matter what the cost, its reactionary and damaging policies in favour of increased taxation, further nationalisation, and greater state intervention, its policies of deplorable fiscal irresponsibility, incompatible with the restraint of inflation and enhancement of competitiveness, and its eagerness to seek partisan gain at the expense of British industry and jobs.'.

An hon. Member: Speech.

Mr. Pattie: I did wonder, after hearing the length of the motion moved by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), whether he would sit down after reading it, which would have enabled me to do the same after reading the amendment, thereby giving more time for our respective Back Benchers to contribute.

The Opposition have chosen a manufacturing topic, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman was somewhat slighting in his reference to the service industries, which are extremely important. The House is aware that services in all advanced economies are taking a larger and larger share of the total national output as living standards improve and a larger share of consumers' income is spent on services rather than physical assets. That trend will undoubtedly continue. For example, in the United States the service sector is now three times the size of the manufacturing sector.

There was a series of significant inaccuracies in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech. Early in his speech he said that the unemployment figure was nearly 4 million—in fact, it is 3·2 million—[HON. MEMBERS: "It is more."] I do not believe that 3·2 million is nearly 4 million, but the mathematics of the right hon. and learned Gentleman may be at variance with mine.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Does the Minister recognise that when the Government took office they excluded people from the register and allowed people not to register but still obtain benefits in order to massage the figures? The real figure includes the best part of 800,000 above that admitted by the Government. It is in fact over 4 million.

Mr. Pattie: I reject that. We are talking about the actual figures for unemployment. Opposition Members are fond of making comparisons with other nations. They might be interested to know that if Germany included the people on training schemes or conscripted into the armed forces, its unemployment figure would be about 5 million.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East was wrong when he spoke about support for the innovation programme. He said that when my right hon. Friend announced the lifting of the moratorium at the end of March, the budget had been cut by £10 million. It was not. The 1985-86 budget for research and development is £297 million; the 1984-85 budget is £283 million. That is an increase, not a decrease. However, once again the right hon. and learned Gentleman's maths may be at variance with mine.

Mr. John Smith: If I am wrong, it is because I quoted from a Department of Trade and Industry press notice which said that funds allocated for the programme in 1984-85 were £308 million, and for 1985-86, £298 million. The Minister can work out for himself that that is a reduction of £10 million. If he is wrong, will he tell his press office to stop misinforming people?

Mr. Pattie: The right hon. and learned Gentleman was talking about research and development. We are quoting two sets of figures, both of which may be right. We spoke at length about British Leyland—I say that my figures are right and he says that his figures are right——

Mr. Alan Williams: Which figures are right?

Mr. Pattie: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman got his figures from a press handout from my Department, they must be right.

I was talking about the main theme of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech, which was research and development. I may have misheard him because he spoke at such speed. He spoke about British Leyland as though the Government had given it no support at all. He waxed lyrical about the Government wasting a great national asset. He ignored the fact that since they took office in 1979 the Government have pumped £1·34 billion into that company. I agree with him about the great efforts made by the work force and management together. However, he tried to create a wrong impression.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke about the information technology trade deficit—

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): What about the new engine for Leyland?

Mr. Pattie: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will make a statement about that.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman was selective in his figures for the information technology trade deficit. He went back to 1980 and mentioned a figure of £384 million, which was correct. In 1981 the deficit increased, as it did in 1982, and in 1983 it increased again to £2·149 billion. The figure for 1984 was 2·259 billion. It is a marginal increase, and certainly not the increase predicted by Professor Ashworth. Of course, it is a larger figure than we want, and I am not suggesting that such a deficit is desirable. I am trying to get the flavour of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks. The Ashworth report has been proved to be wrong. It forecast that by now we would be heading for a £3 billion to £4 billion trade deficit, but it has actually levelled out.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Why has the House not had an opportunity fully to debate that report?

Mr. Pattie: That is not a matter for me. The hon. Gentleman will have to raise it through the usual channels.

Mr. Randall: We did, but our request was turned down.

Mr. Pattie: The hon. Gentleman knows that that is not a matter for me. He will have to raise it with his Chief Whip, who is carefully listening to the debate. He is a man of enormous influence in the House.

I used my best shorthand to try to take down what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said—that the notion of Government non-involvement in research and development was absurd. We are often pointed towards Japan and the United States, yet in Japan 74 per cent. of all research and development is carried out by private industry, not by the Government. So, at one moment we are told that all research and development must be done by the Government, and then we are told that it must all be done by industry.

Mr. John Smith: I am concerned not about the precise size of the information technology trade deficit—I accept the Minister's figures—but about the fact that, even on the Minister's information, there is a deficit in excess of £2 billion that appears to be persistent, regular and likely to be maintained, even if the figure does not rise. What do the Government say about that and about the £4 billion trade deficit in manufactured goods? What do they propose to do about it?

Mr. Pattie: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has brought me back to the figures, which I do not mind. The reason for the levelling off of the deficit has been a tremendous increase in our exports, from £4·024 billion in 1983 to £5·530 billion in 1984. When the deficit occurred, the campaign to promote awareness of information technology had been extremely successful. My predecessor initiated that campaign in 1982 and many companies decided that they would have to invest in information technology products to improve their manufacturing processes, and, therefore, their competitiveness. In all too many cases they discovered that the necessary products were not available in the United Kingdom, so they had to import them.

[Mr. Pattie]

Much as I deplore a trade deficit in information technology or anything else, if the price of avoiding such a deficit is that our manufacturing industry does not modernise itself, I would rather that it went out and acquired the necessary equipment from wherever it was available, so that Britain's capacity in the information technology industry improved.

The increase in our exports that I have mentioned—and I will not weary the House with the figures again—means that in our view we have turned that particular corner. However, at the time when manufacturing industry became aware of the need to modernise by using equipment of this sort, it had to go out and get it from wheresoever it could.

Where we part company with the Opposition is over the conclusions that are reached about how to improve industrial performance. We do not believe that the answer lies in bringing everything under state control, either through outright nationalisation or through the encroaching tentacles of a national investment bank, about which we have heard yet again. The suggestion is that we must have a national investment bank because we obviously have an investment gap, yet, if one looks at the investment gap which is computed on the bases of gross domestic fixed capital formation, in 1981 the figure was £38·675 billion, in 1982, £40·645 billion and in 1983, £42·348 billion, which does not seem to indicate that there is any form of investment gap. What we are seeing is the doctrinal obsession of the Opposition in saying, "Right, we had better have a national investment bank." We have tried it all before—it does not work.

We do not believe that the answer lies in pumping taxpayers' money willy-nilly into industry. There is ample evidence that such policies do not work, and simply hurt the efficient. We do not believe that the answer lies in preventing overseas investment, building some kind of wall round the United Kingdom, in restricting dividends or in denigrating profit. We do not believe that protection is the answer. I would have thought that even a casual analysis of the economic performance of the world's protected economies clearly demonstrated the inevitable links between protection, lack of competition, lack of incentives, inefficiency and low growth. We certainly do not believe in taxing industry through such ingenious devices as the national insurance surcharge to restore its international competitiveness.

It is instructive to look at industry's historical development. The development of manufacturing industry is particularly well documented. Manufacturing's decline is not a recent development, as right hon. and hon. Opposition Members would have us believe. There has been a relative decline over many decades. It is not so much that manufacturing's share of total output has been falling, since that is common to many industrialised countries. There has been a very long decline in manufacturing's productivity relative to our competitors. Our share of main manufacturing countries' world exports of manufactures has declined steadily from 20 per cent. in 1955, to 15 per cent. in 1963, to 9 per cent. in 1979 and to 8 per cent. now. Slowly but surely this relative decline has turned into absolute decline.

I will again have to disillusion right hon. and hon. Opposition Members by telling them that the absolute decline did not coincide with the election of this Government in 1979. The absolute decline started in the early 1970s. The volume of manufacturing output fell 4 per cent. between its cyclical peaks in 1973 and 1978. With lower productivity than our competitors, a falling share of world trade and continual balance of payments crises, our manufacturing growth rate was only a shadow of what was achieved by other developed countries. It is to reverse this long-term decline in industrial economic performance that the Government policies are tailored.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I have listened carefully to what my hon. Friend has said about the long run decline in manufacturing. Is he about to make the point, in relation to the classification of industrial activity, that what has also happened recently is that a number of activities which previously would have been classified as manufacturing are now classified as service activities and that is partly responsible for the relationship between these two sectors?

Mr. Pattie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That is an important point, and he is exactly right, as always.

The analysis of our industrial decline reveals shortcomings in both price competitiveness and in a host of other factors such as quality, design, reliability and delivery, which it has become fashionable to call non-price factors. The heart of our strategy to restore industry's price competitiveness has been the reduction of inflation. That remains the heart of our strategy. Through a policy of sound money and responsible control of public expenditure, we have created a climate in which business clearly prosper and in which enterprise can flourish.

Mr. Sheerman: If the Minister is so right in that analysis, what does he say to the people living in west Yorkshire who woke up yesterday morning to find that the Philips factory—a main manufacturer of tumble dryers and washing machines, and one of the biggest producers in the country—had closed with the loss of 600 jobs? When does this fine theory about reintroducing enterprise into the country work through to real jobs in real industries?

Mr. Pattie: Obviously I sympathise with the local news that the hon. Gentleman has, because of the personal difficulties that it raises for the individuals concerned. However, I would say to him that the decision is obviously taken in the light of the competitiveness of the company, and it is precisely the factors that I have been describing that take quite a while to turn round. The point that I have been making—I hope clearly—is that nothing new has begun since 1979 in terms of this decline.

As the memory of Labour's hyperinflation fades, so the lessons of its consequences are being forgotten. But let there be no doubt that the benefits of this policy are indispensable to industrial recovery and renewed competitiveness. It is a lesson we have learnt from bitter experience as British companies have been priced out of both domestic and overseas markets by high inflation. Perpetual devaluation of the exchange rate proved to be no answer. Low inflation is the best service that we can give industry in its efforts to increase output and jobs. And yet, as memories fade, we are once again hearing the old calls to pump money into the economy. Are our memories so short?

"Higher inflation followed by higher unemployment. That is the history of the last twenty years."

Those are not my words, but those of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan).

"Inflation is the mother and father of increased unemployment."

Not my words, but those of the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor, Lord Wilson of Rievaulx.

"We believe that unless we keep inflation under control, all other economic objectives will fail."

Not my words, but those of the righ hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley).

We have achieved considerable success in the fight against inflation, but more still needs to be done. Our inflation rate is still well ahead of several of our major competitors. In the 12 months to March, prices rose by 2·5 per cent. in West Germany, by 3·7 per cent. in the United States and by only 1·6 per cent. in Japan. In particular, if industry is to continue to recover competitiveness, the rise in earnings must continue to abate. With average earnings in recent years rising by 3 per cent. a year in real terms, much of the benefit of the recovery has been taken by those in employment. Although, by historical standards, industry's unit cost increases have been moderate in recent years, they have still been well ahead of our main competitors, the United States, Germany and Japan, where unit costs have actually been falling.

There has been much discussion recently about the relationship between real wages and employment. I believe that the arguments are now well understood, but I will make one point in relation to experience in the United States which I know that right hon. and hon. Opposition Members are fond of quoting—at least, fond of quoting those bits which are selectively appealing. Between 1970 and 1980 real earnings per hour in the United States fell while employment rose by 25 per cent. Conversely, in Europe real wages continued their substantial upward rise over this period with a marked increase in unemployment. There can be no clearer lesson than that.

Responsible control of public expenditure has also allowed room to remove——

Mr. John Smith: Before the Minister leaves the question of incomes and earnings, as I think he described it, presumably the lesson that he is trying to teach people is that they should not ask for wage increases. He must be aware, as I think all hon. Members are, that the largest increase in remuneration in recent years has been in top management in industrial companies, who have voted themselves huge increases in salaries and often large capital appreciation through share option schemes. Does he have the same strictures for them as he has for the industrial worker?

Mr. Pattie: Some of the more spectacular examples have been geared to the performance of the company. If a company has performed well, that seems to be a fair response by the person with executive responsibility.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): The Minister has criticised the general level of pay increases. If they are leading to an increase in inflation, a loss of jobs and a lack of competitiveness, what do the Government propose to do?

Mr. Pattie: The Government certainly do not intend to introduce an incomes policy, as proposed in the alliance amendment. We have been down the incomes policy road before. We have a policy for our employees in the sector that we can control. We shall continue to urge manufacturing industry in the private sector to keep wage increases within close limits. The consequences of not doing that are there for all to see.

Responsible control of public expenditure has also allowed room to remove or reduce other previously imposed Government costs on industry, such as the national insurance surcharge, which was costing private industry about £3 billion a year. That was introduced by the Labour Government.

When the House listens to the demands for changes in economic strategy by the Opposition parties it would do well to remember the sort of taxes that destroy industry and jobs and that are necessary to finance their pet programmes. The measures that we have taken to create conditions conducive to business and enterprise go far beyond the control of inflation. Industry cannot get on with the job if burdened with unnecessary Government regulations and controls.

Since coming to office we have abolished price controls, factory building controls, dividend controls, hire purchase controls and foreign exchange controls. We have introduced a wide range of measures over the past six years to encourage entrepreneurship, risk-taking and self-employment. Many of those measures have remedied tax disincentives to enterprise and hence to employment generation; and yet those are precisely the measures which the Opposition so mistakenly dismiss as tax benefits to the rich.

Nothing could be further from the truth. The evidence is plain to see. In 1983 the net increase in the number of firms starting up over those going out of business was over 42,000—the highest figure on record and double the level for 1982. Altogether, in the four years from 1980, the net increase in new businesses was 112,000, which means that net starts were averaging over 500 a week during this period. The numbers of self-employed are at record levels.

Industry now is much more capable of competing on price; but while that is an essential prerequisite for improved performance, the so-called non-price factors are more intractable. Unfortunately, the Government cannot legislate for improvements in performance. Much of the task must lie in industry's own hands. It is firms, the producers, which must adopt efficient production methods and working practices. It is firms which must research markets to discover customers' requirements. It is firms which must design products to customers' specifications and adapt to change, and it is firms which must adopt the new technologies.

However, the Government accept that they have a vital role to play in the transformation that is needed to regain international competitiveness. One area vital to future competitiveness is research and development and innovation. Science and technology is central to wealth and job creation. I stress that innovation and adoption of the new technologies are as essential in the traditional as in the more modern high technology industries.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Will the Minister consider the innovation in my constituency? A famous food firm, Heinz, which makes baked beans, has had to bring machinery from Switzerland because of the rundown in high-grade technology equipment production in Britain. The material that the firm requires for innovation cannot be found here. Surely public investment would have cut the need for tremendous import charges and perhaps prevented the 600 redundancies in an area where unemployment has quadrupled in the past five years.

Mr. Pattie: That is yet another tragic example for the people involved of what happens as a result of inadequate investment. The hon. Gentleman makes a false analysis because public investment is not involved. The hon. Gentleman suggests that Government money can force companies to produce certain products. There is no evidence of that.

I stress again that innovation and adoption of the new technologies are as essential in the traditional industries as they are in the more modern and high technology industries. Innovative exploitation of science and technology provide the driving force for internationally competitive products.

Technology is now an essential ingredient of improved product performance, quality and reliability. We cannot afford to stand still because we can be sure that our competitors will not. Yet industry has not devoted sufficient resources to this vital area.

I am glad to say that I believe we are now making progress. The revival in profitability has brought with it increased industrial interest in R and D and innovation. An arousal of interest has been fostered by the Department of Trade and Industry's assistance to innovation and the adoption of new technologies. This is an area where the Government have been very active, to match the speed of progress in the new technologies themselves. Since 1978 we have more than doubled in real terms our financial assistance for innovation to over £300 million a year.

Under the last Labour Administration, the maximum scientific and technological assistance provided by the Department of Industry in any one year was £139 million in 1980 prices. This is less than that for any year under the present Government, and less than half that of £294 million at 1980 prices for 1984-85.

One of the main aims of the Department has been the promotion of innovation. We have done this by increasing awareness, and by encouraging and assisting where it is appropriate to do so. Our record has been impressive. Since 1979 we have quadrupled expenditure in support of industrial R and D, innovation and technology transfer.

We keep our policies under review to ensure efficient use of funds and value for money. Since the launch of the support for innovation programme the Department has offered nearly £400 million to more than 3,100 projects. The number of applications dealt with by the Department under this Administration grew rapidly. In the last year of the Labour Government the Department handled some 400 applications for this form of assistance. By 1981-82 the number had more than doubled. In 1982-83 it reached 1,500 and in 1983-84 2,500—I am talking of actual cases of people receiving assistance.

There are many elements of our support for innovation promotion. Following my review of the Department's general industrial support for R and D which was occasioned by the very rapid growth of applications, there will be some changes of emphasis in the direction of assistance. The House will be aware of some of them. A larger proportion of assistance will be devoted to advisory services, to encouraging best practice, to improving the supply of key skills and to collaborative research. Support in these areas should help to improve the capacity of a wide range of companies to exploit technological opportunities.

Correspondingly, a smaller proportion of assistance will be devoted to near-market project support, which can now be more readily financed by industry with the increase in profits and liquidity in the past few years. Our aim will be to concentrate project support on innovative projects which represent a significant advance for the industry or sector concerned, taking into account the degree of innovation, the degree of technical and commercial risk involved, the potential for market exploitation, and any wider industrial benefits. Within these general arrangements for project support we will continue to emphasise certain key technologies and their application, such as microelectronics, fibre optics and computer software.

The Department's assistance to encourage the application in industry of microelectronics has achieved substantial success. In 1977 only 5 per cent. of manufacturing firms were using, or planning to use, microelectronics in their products or processes. By 1981 that figure had risen to 30 per cent. and by last year it had reached 50 per cent.

Another area where we have achieved considerable success is advanced manufacturing technology. Success in manufacturing results from the transformation of good design into high quality products through efficient manufacture. The three elements are inseparable and mutually dependent. Yet for too long production has been the poor relation of manufacturing industry. In many firms production strategy was rarely considered important enough to merit board room consideration.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): If the Government's policies in the promotion of research and development in manufacturing industry have been so successful, will the Minister explain why actual expenditure at 1975 prices fell from £1,512 million in 1978 to £1,465 million in 1983?

Mr. Pattie: Is the hon. Gentleman talking about all research and development?

Dr. Bray: I am talking about intramural research and development expenditure in the whole of manufacturing industry, financed from whatever source, including private as well as Government finance.

Mr. Pattie: According to the figures that I have, taking 1975 as the base year, expenditure was £1,340 million in that year. In 1983 it was £1,564 million and in 1981 it was £1,661 million. We reckon, on the basis of the high increase — [HON. MEMBERS: "But there has been a reduction."] Indeed — I have just given the figures. However, judging by the applications that we have had for the SFI programme, the 1984 figures will be up on those for 1983.

Our support for advanced manufacturing technology began with the robot support programme, launched in 1981. That was followed by CADCAM — computer-aided design and manufacture. Later we expanded to embrace computer-aided production management and flexible manufacturing systems. Through all those programmes we have already laid a firm foundation of user experience.

To date there have been over 200 consultancy, development and installation projects under the robot support scheme. I was at the robot exhibition in Birmingham yesterday, and met representatives of a company called Unimation which, with Government assistance, has seen its work force grow by 30 per cent. and production space increase by 500 per cent. In the past 12 months, more than 300 robot technicians have been trained at that company's facility. It has also sold over 500 of a product called the Puma 560 robot, which has been developed with Government assistance. It is worth noting that 98 per cent. of the product is of United Kingdom origin.

Over 250 companies have been assisted in the development and installation of robots in a wide range of industries from aviation to pharmaceuticals. Under the CADCAM programme about 9,000 companies have made use of the wide range of facilities and services that have been offered. Under the flexible manufacturing systems scheme assistance has been offered for 114 planning studies and 43 installation projects, representing an industrial investment of more than £111 million.

The Government's help to industry, to enable it to keep abreast of the very rapid changes in technology, is very wide ranging. Design is a key factor influencing the market success of our manufacturing and service industries. We have been acting vigorously and creatively ever since the Prime Minister's influential seminar on design in January 1982.

With the help of the Design Council we ran a countrywide series of seminars in 1983 with 1,500 senior people from industry. We set up a funded consultancy scheme, which is producing excellent results for 2,500 small and medium-sized firms that have used it: 1,000 firms are expected to receive consultancies this year. We are assisting a number of bodies in the educational and training aspects of design.

In addition to the schemes that I have just mentioned, my Department has been active in encouraging biotechnology, fibre optics and optoelectronics in industry; in the development of software products and telecommunications products; in collaborative research under the Alvey programme on VLSI—very large-scale integrated circuits — software engineering, intelligent knowledge-based systems, man-machine interface and infrastructure and communications.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): Does my hon. Friend agree that if our computer and software industry is to continue to build upon the successes that it has already achieved, it is important that when the details of the British COCOM licence are established in June there should be as few restrictions as possible on our software industry, and as little red tape as possible to prohibit commercial activities?

Mr. Pattie: I agree with my hon. Friend. That must be the aim.

The Government are providing £200 million over five years to this major initiative to keep Britain at the forefront of information technology. It is highly encouraging that a programme only two years old has now approved 100 projects involving 50 companies, 40 academic bodies and five research institutions. I am confident that we can all expect substantial and exciting results from that enormous collaborative effort. There is also a wide range of advisory and consultancy services covering quality assurance, design, manufacturing efficiency, small firms and technical assistance.

One point needs particular emphasis. If we are to compete with the United States and Japan, our approach to the new technologies and innovation must not be purely national. The new technologies need the potential of a community market of 270 million people—soon to be 320 million. That is why we have taken the lead in pressing for practical measures towards an integrated market for the new technologies, as well as for more familiar goods and services. I am glad to say that the support that we have given to developing standards through the Community for telecommunications and information technology is beginning to bear real fruit. The first step to liberalise public procurement in telecommunications has been taken. The Community is on the point of coming to grips with developing standards for advanced manufacturing technology. The Government can, have, and will continue to make a contribution to creating a community framework in which enterprise can flourish.

But it is industry itself that must exploit these opportunities. The ESPRIT programme, partly funded from the Community budget, shows how co-operation can work in practice. There are encouraging examples of industry initiatives — the links between Plessey and Elettronica, and between Racal and Selenia, for instance. There is also the arrangement between Bull, Siemens and International Computers Ltd., and between Plessey, Siemens, Alcatel and Italtel. The spread of such industry-led collaboration can only be to our advantage. Support for the new technologies and their adoption across industry is not, however, sufficient in itself. The new technologies emphasise the crucial importance to industry of a highly qualified and skilled work force. In the information technology sector—the fastest growing industrial sector worldwide—there has been concern that shortages of skilled manpower were leading to a lower growth rate for the United Kingdom industry compared with our competitors. We therefore set up a committee last year, under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, to study the situation as a matter of urgency and to propose action to deal with identified problems. This IT skills shortages committee includes representatives from industry and the education sector as well as from Government Departments.

The committee's first report, published in July last year and focusing on shortages of graduates, and its second, issued in January and dealing with technicians, both stressed the importance of forging a partnership between industry and the education system. Only industry is in a position to define its skills requirements and to explain them to those who provide education and training; they in turn should respond flexibly and rapidly to industry's needs.

Industry has already committed itself to contributing finance, teaching manpower and equipment to carry forward that concept. In addition, it has set up the IT skills agency under the auspices of the CBI education foundation to co-ordinate industry's contributions to the partnership. That is a welcome and imaginative response by industry to solving the problems of IT skills shortages.

[Mr. Pattie]

For their part, the Government have responded to the requests from industry for more graduates in engineering and technology. The Government are making £43 million available over the next three years to provide additional places for engineering and technology students in higher industrial institutions. Several Departments, including my own, the Department of Trade and Industry, are contributing to the cost. That follows on from earlier moves, such as the information technology initiative taken in 1982, which is adding 5,000 extra places in IT-related higher education, and the £14 million engineering and technology programme in Scotland announced in November 1984.

In 1978 the Department estimated that each year in the United Kingdom there were only about 2,500 short course places available for updating engineers in microelectronics techniques. Studies suggested that that would be insufficient to meet the needs of industry if it were to adopt the technology as fast as the Government hoped. Skill shortage was likely seriously to inhibit take-up of the technology. Consequently grants for developing training courses became an integral part of the microelectronics applications programme. They go to colleges, universities, polytechnics and firms to develop courses on microelectronics for industrial engineers and managers. More than 30,000 such course places are now available annually compared with 2,500 short course places when the Labour Government were in office.

Therefore, the Government have a coherent and well developed policy for industry, manufacturing and the new technologies. It is not a policy to preserve every firm——

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I have listened to the Minister's speech with care, hoping to detect some spark of a realisation of the country's position. The hon. Gentleman has made careful use of figures. May I present him with four more? Has not output in manufacturing industry fallen by nearly a tenth since 1979? Has not output in production industry, despite the oil surge, fallen by nearly a twentieth? Has not investment in manufacturing fallen by nearly a third? Is not the non-oil trade deficit now at a level of nearly £12 billion? In the face of such figures, how can the Minister be so complacent?

Mr. Pattie: If he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the hon. Gentleman will no doubt develop the points that he has just made in what was virtually a speech. No doubt he too will welcome my right hon. Friend's reply to the debate.

Our policy is to create the conditions in which manufacturing and industry as a whole can flourish, to encourage and assist it to adapt and to be competitive, and to allow it to use its resources and strengths unhindered by Government restrictions wherever possible.

The policy is clearly working, because since early 1981, the trough of the world recession, the economy in the United Kingdom has grown steadily for four years. Total output is now at an all-time peak, not just in money terms but in real terms. It is some 4 per cent. above its previous peak in 1979.

Total fixed investment and total business investment are at real peak levels. Employment is responding, with over 600,000 more people employed now than in the spring of 1983, and buoyant growth is continuing. All the forecasters predict continued growth throughout 1985 of up to 4 per cent., following the end of the miners' strike. We are expected to have the highest growth rate in Europe this year for the second time in three years. But for the miners' strike, it would have been three out of three.

Encouragingly, growth is widely based, with manufacturing industry sharing fully in the recovery. Since the first quarter of 1981, the trough of the manufacturing recession, manufacturing output has grown by some 10·5 per cent. As with total output, manufacturing is entering its fifth year of successive sustained growth. Manufacturing investment is rising strongly again—up 13 per cent. last year.

There is, as the Labour party keeps telling us—and it is right—some way to go before we achieve the volume of output of the previous cyclical peak in 1979. That is a point that the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) has continually in mind in his interventions. But there are no signs, despite the doomsters' prophecies of last year, that the upturn in manufacturing is petering out. Although some hon. Gentlemen may discount it on the radio, and say that it is merely a flash in the pan, the latest CBI industrial trends survey is even more optimistic than the many buoyant surveys over recent years.

The survey shows a significant improvement in business confidence and expectations of future output growth that are better than at any time in the last two years. Most encouragingly, the steep long-term downward trend in manufacturing employment seems to have ended, with employment expected to be broadly stable over coming months.

Export confidence and orders are particularly strong. Indeed, one very encouraging aspect of the recovery in manufacturing has been the improvement in export performance. Since the end of 1983 manufactured exports have been rising strongly, and by the end of 1984 they were surging ahead. This surge has continued in the first quarter of this year. Export volumes of manufactures, excluding erratic items, are up 14 per cent. compared with the same period a year ago. We are now exporting more manufactured goods in real terms than ever before in our history. Export volumes are running at over 10 per cent. above their previous peak level.

As in all recoveries, some sectors within manufacturing have done better than others. Not all have grown; nor would we expect them to in a dynamic and rapidly changing market place. However, the growth of some manufacturing sectors has been dramatic. Output of office machinery, including electronic data processing equipment, has risen by a remarkable 170 per cent. since the first quarter of 1981, the trough of the manufacturing recession. Electronic consumer goods output has grown by 53 per cent., electronic industrial goods by 30 per cent. and electrical consumer goods by 22 per cent.

Rapid growth has not been confined to the so-called high-tech industries. The established industries have also participated, particularly chemicals. Agricultural chemicals output is up 27 per cent. on the first quarter of 1981, plastic products by 35 per cent., pharmaceutical and consumer chemicals by 21 per cent. and industrial chemicals by 24 per cent. All those sectors are now producing at record real levels of output.

We accept that much remains to be done. We must not slacken our efforts and jeopardise the substantial progress that has been achieved over the past four years. These achievements have laid the foundations for a competitive manufacturing and industrial sector. Productivity in manufacturing has risen by an average 6·5 per cent. a year for the past four years, well above the rates of our main industrial competitors, and there has been a much-needed rise in profitability. Profits of industrial and commercial companies rose by over 20 per cent. in 1984 and the real rate of return is expected to have been around 7 per cent. in 1984 for non-North sea industrial and commercial companies.

The opportunities are now there to be grasped. The rewards of success will be high both for industry itself and for the nation. It is very heartening to see industry responding to the challenge and the opportunities. For our part, I can assure the House that the Government will continue with their policies to facilitate and encourage a dynamic, adaptive and efficient manufacturing and industrial sector. I urge the House to support our amendment.

5.6 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I do not need to repeat the points made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands East (Mr. Smith) in chronicling what has happened to British industry in the six years since the Government came to office. The Minister sounded like a managing director in a difficult year. I congratulate his officials on writing the brief, though not the hon. Gentleman on reading it. At no point did he touch on the major tragedy that has occurred in Britain as a result of the destruction of so much of our manufacturing industry.

Two hon. Members intervened to say a word about individual closures such as we could all cite. The Minister said, "That is tragic, but . . ." The truth is that whole areas of the country have been laid desolate. Anyone who sees what has happened in Liverpool is reminded of Beirut. We should remember the destruction of industry, the high unemployment and the hopelessness of young people. In the mining areas, if the closures go ahead, there will be the same desolation in south Wales and in the north-east. The Minister failed to allude, except in passing, to what has happened to basic industries, such as those which other countries have invested in and developed, or to the human tragedy.

The police are now being asked to prepare themselves by increasing their numbers and improving their equipment to deal with the social disaffection that inevitably follows the implications and implementation of the Government's policies. I wonder how many people who are unemployed or face other problems, reading the Minister's speech, will feel that they are living in the same country as the hon. Gentleman.

People are now realising—this explains some of the changes in the Conservative party, to which I shall refer —that the Government are not pursuing an economic policy. I do not believe that the Government are monetarist. I do not believe that they are Thatcherite. I do not believe that the Government are wilful—despite the words of our motion — or incompetent. They are following a deliberate policy of hammering those whom, broadly speaking, the Labour party, of which I am proud to be a member, seeks to represent.

The Government are hammering young people. Young working-class unemployed people are being put through a youth training scheme that is an absolute fraud. The scheme provides free labour for the employers. We are told that the Government cannot intervene in industry, but the Government give thousands of young people to employers, without charging them a penny, and call it training. Many of the young people receive no proper training at all. They are not protected for health and safety purposes. They are substitutes for adult labour.

Mr. Robert Atkins rose—

Mr. Benn: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. Experience shows that his interventions are not related to the argument.

The youth training scheme involves giving free labour to employers; it is designed to get wages down and to get people accustomed to low wages. In many cases it replaces apprenticeships, does not come under the protection of the trade union movement and is a substitute for adult labour.

That low wage policy was enshrined in the Budget. The Chancellor said to employers, "If you pay low wages, you will pay lower national insurance." Just the other day I met someone on a train who works in a hairdresser's shop. She has suffered a cut in wages since the Budget, because the employer said, "By cutting your wages, I shall be able to pay less national insurance." That girl could not find another job because of high unemployment in the area in which she lives. The abolition of the wages councils and the ending of shopping restrictions, which we shall discuss on Monday, are designed to create a low wage economy, and that means mass unemployment.

Mr. Leigh rose——

Mr. Benn: I shall not give way as I want to be brief. When I have made my point, other hon. Members can follow it up.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is famous for his phrase, "On yer bike." He got it wrong, because he meant, "On yer knees." His intention was to create mass unemployment, which is the real economic policy that the Government are following. Unemployment keeps real wages down, and, when assisted by Government measures, lowers real wages. If one lowers real wages, one boosts profits, and the employers do not necessarily plough such profits back into the industries in which they are made.

I asked the Library to undertake a corner shop economics calculation to determine the export of capital per head of population. That shows that £1,097 of capital per head has been exported since the Government came to power. Therefore, if people tighten their belts in response to Government pleas and employers make larger profits, such profits are exported to places where wages are lower.

Unemployment not only boosts profits and lowers wages; it also undermines the strength of trade unions. It is a marvellous form of import control, because a person out of work does not buy Japanese videos, French cars or American tobacco, and all this has nothing whatever to do with the argument advanced by the Cabinet.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South) rose——

Mr. Benn: I am seeking to keep within the 10-minute limitation on speeches. I shall be able to do so only if there are no interventions.

If full employment were to return, the Government's whole strategy would be undermined because the unions would be stronger, wages and conditions would be improved and there would be a demand that the dole money saved should be channelled into health and education.

[Mr. Benn]

When people read this debate in Hansard, I suspect that they will perceive my comments to be more relevant than those of the Minister. If the Government continue to pursue their present policy—I think that I share this view with certain Conservative Members—we shall see the destruction of the Tory party at the next election. We were told that Conservative policy would result in a strengthened economy—coming phoenix like out of the ashes—but the one that is now pursued will create such a powerful public reaction that the Government will never be re-elected. Lest anyone be in any doubt, I need only say that the Government's prospects have changed sharply since the end of the miners' strike, and that their brutality towards the miners has resulted in a powerful counter-reaction.

The second alternative which is occasionally put forward by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and the Centre Forward group is to return to the policies of the last 40 years. That is advocated by Mr. Peter Jenkins in The Sunday Times, who I was told was paid a transfer fee of £115,000 to join that newspaper. The idea is to go back to what were essentially SDP-type policies, which were followed by the previous Conservative Government as well as the Labour Government of which I was a member. It is argued that that will solve the problem.

Incomes policy is at the heart of that approach. We now have an incomes policy which is known as unemployment, yet the Liberal party and others favour an incomes policy as an alternative to monetarism. Having served in Cabinet for 11 years, I know what incomes policy means—centralised wage bargaining in the hands of Ministers.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: No.

Mr. Benn: Of course it does. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has ever been involved in ministerial discussions, where one talks about who will get an increase and the use of Government sanctions if there is disagreement. An incomes policy runs absolutely counter to everything that the alliance says about not having statism. It is the most statist policy that one can have. If, in addition, we adopted the European monetary system, under which we would join a federal Europe, we would lose control of our currency. Therefore, if we were to adopt the proposals advanced by the Liberal party, we would have the most authoritarian form of central Government control possible.

I can understand why some Conservative Members want to follow that policy. They believe—I think that they are right—that the present Prime Minister will be the first woman but the last Conservative Prime Minister this century. They think that the party can be salvaged by returning to the patrician ingredient of certain noble politicians who became Prime Minister. They also think that prospects can be improved by returning to the absolutely rigid, bureaucratic centralism of the previous Conservative leader. I must be candid and admit that much of it was followed through by the Wilson Government.

Neither of those policies can work. The policies of earlier years contributed to the decline that we have witnessed. The policies pursued by the present Government have catapulted that decline into such acute decay that, when the oil runs out, this country will be faced with mass unemployment and mass emigration, with nothing but a little bit of tourism to keep us going. That will not worry business, because by then it will have invested its money in other countries where it can achieve a sufficient return, whether or not there is manufacturing in Britain.

My mind goes back to the period which confronted us after the war. I am one of the five Back-Bench survivors of the Attlee Government, and I vividly remember the task assumed by Mr. Attlee when he came to power in 1945. At that time our industry had been neglected because we concentrated on the war, but at least there were 3 million or 4 million service men ready to be demobilised so that those industries could work again.

The damage that the present Prime Minister has done to British industry is far greater than that achieved by the German bombers, because our industry is now gone. There is no industry. Equipment has been sold abroad, much of it with Government money. Industry will not exist. Instead of 3 million or 4 million service men waiting to be demobilised, we shall have 4 million demoralised unemployed, many without a skill because of the cuts in the education and training provision which is so necessary for high technology industry.

The policies supported by the alliance, which began in 1940 under Churchill and ended in 1979, are not adequate. Nor is the alternative economic strategy which was initially advocated by me in 1974. I have little doubt that the electorate will reject the present Government, but the Prime Minister may be hard to move, even with the help of her former colleagues.

We shall have to plan much more carefully. We shall have to ensure that the export of capital stops. We will have to plan our trade to prevent industries from being destroyed as we rebuild them.

We will have to assume far greater responsibility for the banking and financial institutions—if the Prime Minister has not nationalised them before we get there, as Mussolini did when faced with the collapse of the financial institutions in Italy in the 1920s. Anyone who thinks that the world banking structure is altogether safe may be living in a dream world. It is normal to laugh at people who carry out their function to warn that what will be required is a radical policy and more than just a little reflation, a little more public expenditure, a little adjustment to the PSBR or appeals for higher productivity.

The country has been ruined by this Government, and it will have to be rebuilt by another Government using methods of planning comparable to those that are necessary to win a war. These arguments are penetrating to the public and will be understood. I do not think that the Government are following an economic policy. It is a political policy for the destruction of working people, their services, their jobs, their unions and their ballot box. The country will not be saved by a lot of consensus politicians trying to revitalise the policies which were tried by honest men and women but which failed.

We will have to rebuild. It will require an effort of will, a sense of purpose and instruments for planning and greater democratic involvement than we have yet contemplated in this Chamber. That is the point that I want to make in the debate.

5.21 pm

Mr. James Prior (Waveney): I am glad that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) made that speech. It has made me feel much more comfortable sitting on these Benches. The people who feel uncomfortable because of the right hon. Gentleman's speech are those on the Opposition Benches.

One of the sad things for the right hon. Gentleman is that there was a time when he could fill the Chamber when he made a speech. Now he is isolated and neglected even by his former friends. That gives some idea of how utterly barmy his views have become. There is no other word that one could use because he is so far removed from the politics of the present, let alone the industrial circumstances of today, as to make himself rather a sad character. He, like me, does not speak often in the House. When he speaks, he thinks he has to bring in everything. We have listened to the whole range of political and industrial matters in a quarter of an hour. He does his party and his own record an enourmous disservice by the sort of speech he has just made.

Mr. Benn: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell me from his own long experience how to be influential with his own leader?

Mr. Prior: I did not catch all that the right hon. Gentleman said, but I cannot believe that he will be influential—I hope he will not be—with his leader with the sort of views that he has put forward today, although I fear he may be.

I want to describe briefly what it is like when one moves from Government to the Back Benches and perhaps from Government to industry, and what Goverment begins to look like from the point of view of someone who has moved into industry.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The right hon. Gentleman has four jobs already.

Mr. Prior: A few years ago I made the great mistake of saying that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) was the Brian Clough of the House of Commons. I now know what an insult that was to Brian Clough. I have been longing to tell the hon. Gentleman that.

Manufacturing industry is absolutely vital to the future of this country. I do not believe that we can have a prosperous service industry unless we have a strong manufacturing industry behind it. That is a very important lesson that we have to take on board.

We have not measured up yet to the problems of international trade and the enormous competition there is now in overseas markets, particularly for major capital projects. Such projects can be won only by large British companies which will use as subcontractors the small and medium-sized companies which help to make up the British economy. When a large British company gets a major contract, about 30 per cent. of the work will go to that company and 70 per cent. will go to a range of smaller companies. We need large British companies of an international scale if we are to compete with large companies elsewhere.

We look upon ICI as a large company, but in terms of the chemical industry there are four or five world companies that are larger than ICI. My own company, GEC, in which I declare my interest, is regarded here as a very large electrical company, but there are six or seven electrical companies throughout the world that are far bigger. General Electric in the United States is twice as big, as is Siemens.

Many companies with which we have to compete in overseas markets are bigger than British companies. Therefore, the important lesson for us all to learn is not so much that we need to make certain that there is competition within companies in Britain but that we must compete with international companies which are far stronger than most British companies.

If we are to do that successfully in the great world markets, we must compete on equal terms. I went on the Young mission to China. One of the messages from that visit was that France, Japan and other countries are granting long-term cheap credit. The French were commonly reputed to be giving 30-year credit at 3 per cent. We know what the Japanese have been doing all round the world. Many other countries have been doing the same. If we cannot compete with those countries, we are not in a position to do business.

The Secretary of State must run trade policy and must be our champion on trade policy. That means that we have to take a different attitude towards aid and soft credit, aid and trade provision in particular and bilateral aid.

In 1983 our bilateral aid was $850 million. In France, one of our main competitors, the comparable figure was $3,145 million. Again, our ATP budget has been about £66 million but we have only once in the last five years come up to our budget.

One of the best ways that we can help manufacturing industry and, therefore, our overall level of employment and prosperity is by ensuring that we get a fair share of overseas contracts. There again from my experience in government I think that the Treasury have far too much control over the Export Credits Guarantee Department and over ATP. The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has nothing like enough control.

Much nonsense has been circulated. The Byatt report contained the shibboleth that there was no follow-through business when a great contract was obtained. That is utter nonsense. It has been refuted by an unpublished NEDO report, which I hope will be published shortly. The NEDO report makes it plain that there is a great follow-through from the obtaining of large contracts overseas. If we obtain a contract for an airport, a railway, a signalling system or a telecommunications system, we are likely to be called upon to provide spares and there will be further work for many years to come.

I do not say that manufacturing industry will employ much more labour, but it will employ much less unless we get things right. If we provide it with the right conditions, manufacturing industry will create prosperity for service industry, where growth in employment is probable and where it must come.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): As I think the House knows, I, too, have an interest in the chemical industry. Contractors are attempting to secure contracts to build large chemical plants abroad. On average, these contracts are worth £50 million to £100 million. The contractors are being required by ECGD to pay premiums for tender-to-contract cover which are almost prohibitive. Sometimes a contractor will have four or five tenders out at one time and will have put down about £500,000, which will be lost if the company does not obtain the contracts. This is an example of Government intervention being unhelpful rather than helpful.

Mr. Prior: I agree with my hon. Friend. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is listening carefully to the views that are being expressed by his right hon. and hon.

[Mr. Prior]

Friends. A fresh assessment must be made of ATP and our bilateral aid. We need mixed credit and soft loans. We do not need to give 100 per cent. grants. A much smaller grant and a greater spread of the money would achieve a great deal more.

I urge my right hon. Friend to bully the Treasury and the ODA so that he gets his way and they do not get theirs. Over the years, the Treasury has been allowed to obfuscate what we wish to do, and that should be stopped. The Secretary of State should take charge and the Treasury should not be allowed to examine every individual contract in the way that it has been doing in recent years. I hope that some of the frustrations that have built up over the past few years can be removed. There is nothing more frustrating when a company goes to enormous efforts to win a large contract and finds that the problems of getting ECGD cover, or ATP, have delayed the decision so long that the contract goes elsewhere although it could have come to the United Kingdom.

The provision of the appropriate machinery to assist companies to win large contracts is much more important than research and development. The Opposition are wrong to concentrate their attack on the need for greater investment in research and development. There is no real shortage of research and development effort. We are short of the money to market and to sell our goods. That is much more important than R and D.

Dr. Bray: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why his own company, GEC, has doubled its research and development expenditure over the past four years?

Mr. Prior: That is our money. We put a vast amount of money into research and development, but it is our money. We research and develop the goods that we think we shall be able to sell. That is a decision that should be left to the company. It is much more important that the Government should help with the selling of goods in overseas markets where we meet intense competition rather than on the research and development side, where we can manage matters for ourselves to a much greater extent.

Viscount Cranborne: I have lived and worked abroad and I have had the experience of working for a foreign company. Most of what my right hon. Friend has said about the lack of support from the ECGD and the other Government agencies is true, but does he accept that time and again good British investment and good British products are frustrated by poor salesmanship? We often see 40 Japanese selling over three years while one British agent is working part time in selling a large product. Is it not true that British industry could put much more energy into its sales efforts in supplementing any soft loans that might be available?

Mr. Prior: I do not doubt that that is right. I am not defending British industry and all that it does. There is a great deal wrong with British industry and there is a great deal that needs to be put right. British industry is constantly trying to improve, and there have been remarkable improvements in the past few years. However, many of the goods that we sell abroad still do not come up to standard. There are shoddy goods that are not delivered on time or are not of the right design. I acknowledge that we have a great deal more to do. I do not believe that it is lack of research and development that holds Britain back. The greatest problem lies in the large infrastructure capital goods market overseas.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Tebbit): My right hon. Friend will understand that I do not want to pick a quarrel with him on what he has said, but I think that he should take into account the fact that in 1979-80 the ECGD had a cash inflow of £50 million and that last year there was a cash outflow of about £470 million. It is clear that ECGD and the taxpayer are carrying a heavy load. I emphasise that they are cash flows one way and the other, but they are very considerable sums of money.

Mr. Prior: I am not as critical of ECGD as I am of the Government over ATP and on bilateral aid. I think that the ECGD needs to respond more quickly. I was more critical of the Byatt report and the attitude of the Treasury towards the ECGD, but I was concentrating my fire elsewhere.

I want to turn to purchasing policy, whether it be public purchasing policy or that of large industry in Britain, whether it be nationalised or a private monopoly. I believe we shall not have a great export market unless we have a strong home base. I am worried that not enough account is being taken by some of our large consumer industries at home of the need to help British manufacturing industry in what the overseas markets require.

My firm has a great interest in the telecommunications industry. The automatic exclusion of 20 per cent. of the home market by British Telecom—this has been given to Ericsson—will result in a loss to GEC and Plessey of about 3,000 direct jobs and a further 2,000 to subcontractors. The effect of giving 20 per cent. to Ericsson will be to create a few hundred extra jobs in this country, but it will do nothing to help technology because all of the research and development and all of the training will be carried out in Sweden. This makes it much more difficult for Britain to sell its exports because it will be said, "Your own telecommunications industry is not buying your products." We shall have less ability in research and development for new systems because we shall not have the necessary money, and reduced ability, especially in information technology, which is at the core of British industry.

The answer must be for the Government to do all that they can, by means of their purchasing policy and the influence that they can bring to bear upon others, to ensure that large consumers in Britain buy British goods and give support to British industry wherever they can. That applies also to competition. The breaking down of trade barriers and our membership of the European Community is bound to lead to greater competition between companies throughout the world. There will then be less room for the kind of competition between companies in this country that we thought was necessary until a few years ago.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim: My right hon. Friend has drawn to the attention of the House the fact that British Telecom proposes to buy 20 per cent. of its digital exchanges from Ericsson. Jobs will be created in Britain through the assembly of those exchanges, but I suspect that they will be few in number. Is not the situation made worse by the fact that the Swedish PTT totally refuses to countenance the purchase of any British equipment to the extent that last year the Swedes exported £22·9 million worth of telecommunications equipment to Britain, while we in return were able to export only a derisory amount?

Mr. Prior: My hon. Friend helps me with my point. These matters need to be considered very carefully. We can do certain things to help ourselves without extra finance being involved.

One can argue about the base year which ought to be adopted for the output of manufacturing industry. Should one take 1973, 1979 or 1981 and work out from that how well or how badly one has been doing? Although Britain's manufacturing performance has improved remarkably during the past few years, it faces enormous problems. I should not want the Government to think that their efforts during the last three or four years or that the growth in manufacturing output during that period will carry Britain through when North sea oil begins to run out. We have to use this period to ensure that British industry becomes as competitive as possible. That is why I urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to fight very hard in Cabinet for a change in the bilateral aid policy, in the aid and trade provision, and in the attitude of the Treasury. The "crawling over" of these figures that goes on time and time again delays decisions and frustrates so much of British industry.

Vast numbers of British industrialists want to support the Government. They believe that the Government's industrial relations policy has resulted in the tightening up of manufacturing production generally. They want to continue to support the Government. They believe, as I do, that the time has come to look again at some of our overseas trade policies.

When the Prime Minister was in Indonesia during her tour of the far east, which she regarded as a market into which Britain ought to be getting in a big way, she found that we were almost totally excluded from Indonesia because we are unable to match the soft credit and other packages which other countries are able to supply to that market. Yet it, together with China, is one of the most important markets that we ought to be developing during the next few years.

Contrary to what has been said, when she goes overseas the Prime Minister does a remarkably good job by sticking up for British industry and getting orders for Britain. However, she would be the first to agree that, if Britain is to win orders, our policy on bilateral aid and ATP, and to a certain extent the way that it is manipulated within Government, has to change. I have not suggested a figure to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. That would be silly. To suggest figures would immediately give to our opponents and competitors abroad the chance to "up" their figures as well. All I want to do is to ensure that Britain has a fair chance to obtain orders. The rest is up to industry.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I am pleased to follow the right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) because, not for the first time, I agree with much that he said about the rather narrow policy area with which he dealt. However, I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman, to his right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) and to their colleagues in the newly formed Centre Forward group that if they wish changes to be made to Government policy they must understand, as I am sure they do, that Governments take notice only of votes—either votes in the ballot box or votes in this House. I believe that there are sufficient right hon. and hon. Members belonging to the Conservative party to join with some of those on the Opposition Benches who strongly disagree with many of the policies to which the right hon. Gentleman addressed his remarks to bring about the change in Government policy that the right hon. Member and his right hon. and hon. Friends seek to effect. If they are prepared to follow up their speeches with their votes, that could be so.

I am also pleased to follow the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). It is a pity that the right hon. Gentleman has not learnt, as all hon. Members need to learn, a little more humility from his experience in Government, politics and industry than he demonstrated in his speech. One of the lessons that he might have learned from the period 1939 to 1945, which he praised as a very successful period for this country, was that we then had a sense of direction and purpose which has not existed for other than the very shortest periods since the war years. That, rather than the other factors to which he referred, led to this country's success during that period. Some of the alliance members believe that that kind of success will never again be achieved in the industrial and manufacturing sectors and by the economy of this country until there is a broader degree of agreement and consensus between the parties instead of absurd and exaggerated arguments being waged over the declining body of British manufacturing industry. We have witnessed such exaggerated arguments in this debate.

It is just as absurd to suggest, as it was suggested by the Opposition Front Bench spokesman, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), that the Government are doing nothing to help industry and are leaving everything to market forces as it is to suggest, as the Minister for Information Technology suggested in his opening speech, that everything should be left alone and there should be no Government intervention. As was acknowledged by the Minister in the second part of his speech, the reality is that this Government, like every other Government, are involved in industry.

In the second part of his speech the Minister catalogued the way in which the Government are intervening in the market, helping industry and associating with it in the many ways which he outlined. My criticism is not that the Government are not intervening in industry, because they are, but that they are not intervening in the right way and are providing insufficient resources to help to prevent the decline in manufacturing industry, which is the subject of this debate.

There are many matters, with which I cannot deal this evening, that the Government might consider doing, not only by means of the revenue from North Sea oil, which amounts to about £12 billion or £13 billion, but by means of the enormous revenue that we now learn the Government will receive from the sale of British Gas. What will the Government do with the £6 billion to £8 billion that they will receive from the sale of British Gas? Perhaps they will listen to the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders and remove the tax on the automotive industry with part of it. If the tax on the car industry were removed, there would be a good return for British industry. The tax is regularly criticised by the motor industry because it puts it at a disadvantage when compared to other countries. In any country the motor industry is a generator of jobs and wealth.

The revenues received from North sea oil and the sale of public assets, such as British Gas, could be ploughed back into many sectors of industry to provide the seed corn and investment for the creation of future wealth.

After six years, the Government's policies are failing. The decline in the contribution of the manufacturing industries to the economy has accelerated dramatically. I take no pleasure in recording that fact. There has been a structural shift away from manufacturing towards services in all the developing countries, but the scale of the shift in the United Kingdom was not inevitable and should not have been so great.

Twenty five years ago, 38 per cent. of our work force was employed in manufacturing. Today, the figure is 27 per cent., which represents 5·5 million jobs. There are 3 million fewer jobs. Under this Government, 1·76 million jobs in manufacturing have been lost. At 20·9 per cent., the contribution of United Kingdom manufacturing to the GDP is lower than that of any country other than the United States. That is a bad state of affairs.

The Minister pointed out that the manufacturing sector has been in terrible decline since the early 1970s. Between 1979 and 1984, however, manufacturing investment fell by 30 per cent. in real terms. Despite the past year's recovery to which Ministers have referred, manufacturing output is still 10 per cent. below the 1979 level.

This country, which was once the workshop of the world, fell in 1982 into deficit on manufactured goods for the first time since the Napoleonic wars. In 1984, the deficit was nearly £4 billion. That was a major contribution to last year's horrendous non-oil deficit of £11·4 billion. The contraction in manufacturing was pointed out graphically by the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour) in his article in The Observer in which he said:

"Net investment in manufacturing has on balance been negative since 1979; in other words the measured stock of plant at the disposal of manufacturing industry is actually lower than it was six years ago."

Those of us with constituencies in the north, Scotland and Wales can see that. We can see the open spaces where the factories used to be and the empty buildings standing around as the tombstones of our industrial past.

The sharp contraction in our manufacturing base owed much to the unprecedented 50 per cent. loss of competitiveness between 1979 and 1981. It was the result of a deliberate policy of allowing sterling to appreciate against all major currencies, and the inflation stoked up in the Government's first year of office as a consequence of the naive monetarist belief that pay increases could not affect the level of inflation. Caught by that cruel vice, manufacturers had no choice but to embark upon a savage round of closures and labour shake-outs to stay in business. Many, of course, went out of business during that period. Our manufacturing competitiveness has still not returned to the level of 1976 and 1979.

The Government have made much of the contribution of the service industries to the so-called economic recovery. All the employment growth that has taken place since the trough of early 1983 has been in the service industries — financial services, distribution, leisure services — and in self employment. The "improved optimism" of the CBI survey mentioned in the Government amendment is based on the interpretation that manufacturing employment will stop falling. That belief may not be unreasonable. It is borne out by my chamber of commerce's survey of local manufacturing firms. However, much of that optimism will melt away when the results of the Government's tightening of monetary policy since February this year feed through and the brief export recovery that we have seen is aborted by the appreciation of sterling.

The net increase of some 480,000 jobs between March 1983 and September 1984, about which we have heard so much from Ministers and Conservative spokesmen, includes 318,000 part-time jobs for ladies. Welcome, though those opportunities are to many, such as married women, who left the unemployment register during the recession, they mask the fact that during that period full-time employment fell by 162,000.

It is ironic that the Government's anxiety to massage the figures in 1983 by changing the basis of the register now results in the fact that the return of many unregistered unemployed to work means that the latest figures for the registered unemployed are still rising, despite the increase in employment, because the people becoming employed are not on the register. The Government's excuse, that the labour force is still increasing, takes no account of the fact that over the past 10 years the United Kingdom has had a lower working age population growth rate than almost all the major industrialised countries. It was Keynes, I think, who remarked that we should remember that for every pair of hands there is a mouth. The increase in the working population provides the opportunity for increased consumption and increased production. Increased population provides us with an opportunity for economic growth and not for the stagnation that we have seen in recent years.

The manufacturing sector, as an engine of wealth creation, remains crucial to the economy. Half the value added in all our exports of goods and services comes from manufacturers and one third of the remainder comes from the service industries interdependent upon manufacturing exports — transport, shipping, finance and insurance — and nearly two thirds of exports of goods and services are derived from manufacturing.

As the director general of the CBI said recently in his speech to that other Conservative splinter group — Conservative Action to Revive Employment:

"if anyone thought services could replace manufacturing in our exports, they must remember that if they did our service earnings would have to be three times as big as they are today."

That is an inconceivable change, and I do not believe that anyone would seriously suggest that it could happen.

As the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East said, the Government have no industrial strategy. They have now entered their seventh lean year and there are few prospects of any fat years ahead. The Government are relying on the increases in the special employment measures contained in the Budget to contrive a reduction in the employment figures before an election in 1987 or shortly after.

The Government ridicule people, such as Lord Weinstock of GEC and the chairman of ICI, John Harvey-Jones, and suggest that they are out of their tiny Chinese minds when they call for a clear exchange rate policy and are sceptical of the suggestion that services can fill the gap left by the decline in manufacturing. It is a pity that that type of attack is directed towards the leaders of some of our more successful industries, which contribute to so many parts of the country and so much to the national economy.

This year's public expenditure White Paper revealed the extent to which the Government have savaged spending on jobs and industry. In the five years up to 1987-88 they will have cut the budget of the Department of Trade and Industry by half in real terms. Spending on regional development grants, which has already been halved in three years, will fall by a further 43 per cent. in cash terms over the next three years. The only advantage of the Government's scorched earth policies is that they make it possible to embark on an entirely new strategy of constructive intervention, working, as we should like to see, with the grain of the market.

For industry, this depends on getting the right framework of macroeconomic policy. We have debated that issue on previous occasions and we shall, no doubt, debate it on many future occasions. We have in our budget proposals a modest fiscal expansion of £4 billion, which would cut unemployment initially by 0·5 million and in 1987 by 900,000 below the forecast levels, and cut increased borrowing by £1·9 billion. Unlike any other packages on offer, our policy has a credible anti-inflation element in the form of a firm monetary policy, within the framework of the European monetary system, helping to stabilise the crazy interest rate and exchange rate see-saw that has taken place since the winter.

In February the Chancellor rejected the advice of his chief economic adviser and the enthusiastic support of the CBI and industrialists, as well as the technical opinion of the governor of the Bank of England, and spurned the opportunity to join the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS at a competitive rate against the Deutschmark and a basket of European currencies.

Mr. Tebbit: Is the hon. Gentleman in a position to say whether the two industrialists he named—I will not ask him about any other—Lord Weinstock and Mr. Harvey-Jones, are enthusiastic advocates of the alliance policy of taxing away pay rises which are judged to be excessive? It would be interesting to know whether those two gentlemen support that policy.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: They, like many other industrialists, on looking at the policy that my colleagues and I have proposed, will realise that a decentralised incomes policy of that sort is better than not having the growth in the economy that would help their companies to grow more rapidly than they have done in recent years.

The difference between ourselves and Conservatives or Socialists is that we in the alliance are at last prepared to confront the problem, which is more than can be said of Ministers. All that we get from them, as we got from the Minister earlier, is sheer exhortation, with complaints about the level of income increases and the effect that that is having on our competitiveness, inflation and the economy generally.

From the Government we get nothing but exhortation and from the Labour Benches we get only a refusal to face up to the consequences of pay increases. At least from the alliance there is a recognition of the problem that confronts the country, and we put forward solutions for dealing with it.

Mr. Prior: Many people have quoted in defence of their cases words that Lord Weinstock is reputed to have used. As he is the managing director of GEC, perhaps I should remind the hon. Gentleman that it would be wise for people to wait to read the evidence, when it is published. I have read it and I assure him that it does not necessarily conform to what the hon. Gentleman said, to what my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) has said or to what was said by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith).

Mr. Wrigglesworth: The remarks of the managing director of GEC were widely published when they were made before the Select Committee. The right hon. Gentleman should not believe that I and other hon. Members have not read them with great care and did not draw the obvious conclusion, that he was being most critical of the policies of the Government. I appreciate that from my contacts with industrialists, because his remarks bore out what I have found is the feeling among those in a broad spectrum of British industry about Government policies in recent years.

I move from the general macroeconomic issues to the question of the high technology industries and innovation. We must acknowledge the findings of a number of investigations that have been made. The Ashworth report last autumn showed that Britain's growth rate in information technology, at 12 per cent. between 1970 and 1982, was slower than that of any of our main competitors. In Japan it was 23 per cent.; in France, 19 per cent.; in the US, 18 per cent.; and in West Germany, 15 per cent.

It also showed that our share of world output in information technology fell from 9 to 5 per cent. and that our balance of trade had deteriorated from parity to almost £1 billion, with import penetration accounting for more than half of the market.

In biotechnology, the British Technology Group could find few British backers for its Agricultural Genetics Corporation, and Celltech has had to go into partnership with an American company, Air Products, to develop its new product.

While the application of microelectronics grew in the United Kingdom by 60 per cent. between 1981 and 1983, only 10 per cent. of those companies were using microchips as part of their product ranges. Recent published studies by the Policy Studies Institute and PA Technology show that we lag behind competitors such as West Germany and the United States. About 19 per cent. of the firms in the PA survey reported a high impact of information products at 16 per cent. of processes. That compared with 44 and 38 per cent. in West Germany, and 42 and 34 per cent. in the United States. That is a clear indication of the way in which we are falling behind.

The PSI survey showed that Britain's continuing failure to innovate owed most to inadequate training and a shortage of professional engineers, which the Information Technology Committee, under the chairmanship of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, estimated at 1,500 now and at over 5,000 by 1988.

It is estimated that employers are spending £2·5 billion on training — on average less than 1 per cent. of turnover — and are failing to fill the gap left by the collapse of apprenticeships in recent years, down from 100,000 in 1979 to 40,000 in 1983, coupled with the abolition of most of the industrial training boards.

[Mr. Wrigglesworth]

We believe that there is need for a considerable increase in investment in education and training. As I have said from these Benches before, one way in which we could help to co-ordinate and improve training in Britain far more than we are doing now is to bring together the training side of the Department of Employment and the education and training side of the Department of Education and Science, and have a department of education and training.

Many people are getting increasingly worried about the enormous growth of the MSC and all the work that it is doing, and about the way in which it fits in with the work of the further education colleges and other training institutions which are run by the local education authorities, basically under the auspices of the Department of Education and Science.

I hope that the Government will consider bringing those two much closer together, getting a better use of the resources and turning the YTS, which we fully support, into much more of a training module that will help the young people taking part in it to go on to further qualifications. It is not as good as it should be. It should contain a bigger training component, and it is important that the scheme be developed with more resources. We on these Benches would like to see various types of action being taken in those areas. There is need for a larger general programme to upgrade and extend maths and science teaching in the schools. The Secretary of State for Education and Science is doing a number of good things in that connection, but we need to do more, more rapidly, with more resources being applied. We need crash programmes to provide more people qualified in electronics and more teachers qualified to teach maths, science and technical subjects. This must be a matter of the highest priority. I am not saying that the Government are not aware of this or that the Secretary of State is not doing anything. He is, but the Government must give a higher priority to, and put more resources into, this whole sphere.

The science budget should be increased by £50 million to restore the recent cuts that have been made. It is appalling that, in this period of our history, that budget should have been cut. The Minister did not say that the £43 million that was being injected in this area was being taken out of existing budgets, so that it did not represent an increase in real expenditure.

We also believe that there should be an increase in expenditure in support of innovation. The Minister explained how much the Government were doing, but more needs to be done. Expenditure on this aspect was frozen by the Government at £185 million, with a complete moratorium imposed on applications, as the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East pointed out. I know how much that has hit many firms because one such company is in my constituency. I hope that the Minister will pursue that case following this debate.

The Minister recently wrote to that company — it makes industrial robots — congratulating it on what it had achieved. At the same time, his hon. Friend had almost brought the company to the verge of bankruptcy by the moratorium and by withdrawing support for a flexible manufacturing system on which the firm was embarking. I hope that the Minister will investigate that case. I am certainly willing to send him the correspondence. The effect of that moratorium was extremely damaging for firms in the very area in which this country needs to expand as rapidly as possible. More money, not less, is therefore required.

We also need a far more effective programme than the Alvey programme. It is staggering that only £40 million has been taken up from a budget of £350 million. It might meet the Government's prejudices if the programme became rather more market oriented, along the lines of the German microperipheral support programme, which relies far more on decisions on products and marketing for the small, high-tech companies involved. I hope that the Minister will also consider that.

The right hon. Member for Waveney tends to write off the need for more money for research and development. I know that his company and many others spend a great deal on this, but many sectors of industry spend nothing like as much as they should. That being so, in addition to giving grants the Government might consider working with the grain of the market and using the tax system as a carrot to encourage firms to invest more in research and development.

We propose also that the Government should introduce an industrial credit scheme. The capital markets in the City have many excellent features but for a very long time the City has lacked a market in fixed, long-term bonds. Efforts have been made to try to get such a market off the ground but they have never worked. Press reports in the past 24 hours have shown that American operators are now moving into this area of the London market to try to create a real market in stock of that kind, but I do not believe that that will be enough. Firms need a means to avoid the high rates of interest that they now have to pay on such loans.

An industrial credit scheme — rather like a domestic ECGD — would help to direct investment towards research and development and other development programmes on which companies wish to embark by providing a fixed rate of interest over a period, supported by the Government. We believe that that, together with small firms investment companies, would be of enormous benefit in helping companies to increase their investment. It would also be a highly cost-effective way of working through the market and the banking system to provide a subsidy on interest rates for approved schemes. For instance, a subsidy of £100 million per annum over five years would allow £1 billion to be made available in loans at 10 per cent. below market rates, or £2 billion in loans at 5 per cent. below market rates. That would be of enormous benefit to companies and I hope that the Government will consider it most seriously together with the proposal for small firms investment companies which we, the CBI and other organisations have suggested.

I have covered the major areas in which we want action to be taken. If my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) catches your eye later in the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he will expand on some of the other areas which are covered by our amendment and in which he has taken a close interest. I hope that the Government will recognise far more than they have so far that there is a desperate need for action in the whole area of manufacturing industry and high technology. If the Government do not move quickly, the boat will have gone and we shall be left high and dry if North sea oil runs out and we do not have the manufactures that we need on which to base our service industries to create wealth and jobs for the future.

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) invariably engages our interest. I followed his speech today with interest and agreed with some of it. So often on these occasions, however, we each have our own template that we apply to the British economy—and probably our own version of the economy that we apply to the template—and then comment on the parts that do not fit. My right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) did very much the same. The common feature is the attempt to wash the problems with money. It is always a beguiling and plausible argument. Many problems can be washed with money, sometimes successfully and sometimes not.

At present there is a cornucopia in the North sea. The latest manifestation concerns the proceeds from British Gas, but hon. Members on both sides seem to think that that money can be spent twice. I have never been persuaded that that is so. Unless one hypothecates it—an argument that the Treasury has rightly resisted for a very long time—the money goes to the Treasury and reduces the Government's requirement in terms of borrowing or taxation to meet their total commitments, but that money cannot be spent twice. If we hypothecate it, allocating some or all of the North sea revenues to these very desirable projects or even adding £2 billion to ECGD, either the money must be found elsewhere in the system or other projects have to be abandoned or curtailed. I have never heard a satisfactory explanation of how that can be avoided, so I am not persuaded.

If those who use that argument could say where they proposed to take the money from or what they intended to curtail—or, more significantly, how they proposed to increase GNP by X per cent. and to spend that real increase when it became available—I should have infinitely more sympathy with the argument for increased research and development, more support for the semi-conductor industries, of which I approve, or more assistance for overseas companies. In that context, we could learn a great deal from the extraordinarily interesting example recently written up in the greatest detail in a fascinating OECD report on the way in which the great Japanese trading companies operate.

I take issue with the claim of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) that the Government do not believe in Britain as a manufacturing economy. We are having difficulty in this debate about the definition of the term "manufacturing." In the United States, the total employed in what is defined there as manufacturing—their definition is not dissimilar to ours—has, I believe, declined from about 26 per cent. to about 11 per cent. in the past 10 years and is still declining. So far as I have observed, however, that decline has not been associated with any decline in the real wealth or economic performance of the United States.

The number of people employed in the United States service sector has risen to such an extent that nearly 60 per cent. of the employed population is now employed in that sector. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East implied that the British Government were trying to force people into service industries so as to create a low-wage economy. That is poppycock. Those employed in the service sector in the United States are among the most prosperous people on earth. We should consider that example if we, too, want to prosper.

The facts are obvious. One does not need to get into a space shuttle, as a United States senator recently did, to grasp those facts. One has only to consider modern manufacturing technology in those areas of the world where it is at its most successful and prosperous. Some are in the United Kingdom, some in other parts of western Europe, many in the United States and, regrettably, a very large number in Japan. The very small segment of the employed population whom we used to describe as employed in the manufacturing sector, because we recognised that they were doing something with their hands—standing at a lathe and handling products—has decreased in the most outstanding cases to less than 1 per cent. of the total work force, but it is supported by a vast tail of extremely skilful, sophisticated people supplying services which that sector requires to compete and to achieve its legitimate and important industrial objectives. We would be unwise to lose sight of that essential fact.

As I have argued before in the Chamber and will argue again—not least because some months ago in Japan I witnessed the many changes that have occurred over almost five years—there is no escape from this direction of movement. It will happen in Britain, western Europe and throughout the developed world. If it does not, many of the difficulties that we fear will come to pass. There will be serious unemployment and loss of wealth and capacity. Our relative position will continue to decline.

Another point on which I take issue with the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East concerns IBM. I declare an interest, because of the large IBM plant in my constituency. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that we must consider and help only our industry. I do not want to delve too much into the merits and demerits of this case, but I must point our that, in the information technology sector alone, IBM is the largest single contributor to our balance of payments. It employs 12,000 or more British citizens. How can we define information technology firms as "ours" or "theirs"? The old definition is obsolete. We cannot look intelligently at this aspect if we look through our spectacles in terms of what is inside or outside a national frontier.

From where does ICL derive its semiconductors, much of its software and, recently, some of the most interesting developments in advanced computer technology? The answer is Japan — and good luck to ICL. That is probably the right policy. ICL is still, however, "our" company. I hope that it will make an even larger contribution to our information technology balance of payments.

A much more fundamental point concerns what our strategy should be. The Opposition are fond of the word "strategy." I am not so fond of it, because in many cases the results of strategies adopted by Governments have been singularly uninteresting and unsuccessful and, in some cases, disastrous. If we look at "strategy" in this context, we must recognise that we have no alternative but to go for restructuring. Total world semiconductor output is $29 billion, including $2 billion from western Europe as a whole, $18 billion from the United States and $8 billion from Japan.

Dr. Bray: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not wish to mislead the House in referring to contributions by companies to our balance of payments. IBM claims that its exports equal its imports. Therefore, it makes a net nil contribution to our balance of payments. That is a great deal better than other American companies in the United Kingdom which have much higher imports than exports.

Mr. Lloyd: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman could make a very effective point on this, but I still say that Britain would be substantially poorer, our information technology as technology would be less and our economic performance would be substantially reduced if, as a result of what is said here today, IBM said, "No more investment in Britain. We shall wind our business down and take it out of Britain. They do not regard us as their company any longer."

Mr. John Smith: The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) appears to have been directed by a point in my speech. My point about IBM had nothing to do with investment. I raised the problem of companies like IBM sending letters to all the people who had bought their products, reminding them of some sort of obligation to observe United States law. I pointed out that when we are dependent on companies such as IBM, that is not a sound strategic position. I hope that the companies concerned defy the invitation contained in the letters. That was all I said about IBM. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will accept that and tell us what he thinks about the problem that I have raised.

Mr. Lloyd: I am glad to accept that invitation. I appreciate the dilemma of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, the Government and IBM. IBM must follow the dicates and sense of its Government. That Government pretend and say that they have at the centre of their policies the interests of the defence of the West as a whole. These are severe and serious paradoxes, to which I do not pretend to have the solutions. I would not say that tomorrow the United States Government must abandon this policy and let all technology flow without restraint into the Soviet Union. Equally, the imposition of severe commercial constraints outside the jurisdiction of the United States Government raises considerable problems which we should address more seriously.

The most offensive part of the Opposition's motion was the reference to "wilful neglect". I find that hard to accept. Of course, it can be argued that there has been neglect. I would have been less concerned if the motion had referred to "mistaken", "misjudged" or "serious" neglect. I do not believe that either the Labour Government or the Conservative Government have shown "wilful neglect" in solving those problems. They are often much larger and more complex than people realise. All Governments make mistakes, but I believe that we have made fewer mistakes throughout the 20 years during which I have been arguing in the House that we should have a larger, more prosperous and more successful information technology industry.

If our information technology industry is insufficient, what is the reason? Why has Europe as a whole—not just the United Kingdom — failed to surf on this enormous industrial surge which can be seen on an examination of almost all the statistics? The answer—I do not claim any originality for this—is that we do not have a Silicon valley or a Tskupa science city, which are two ways of building an information technology industry. Both those ways have been highly successful; our way has been less successful. We must learn where we can and adapt the successful lessons to our circumstances. Above all, we must adapt them in our strategy. We must choose where we shall be excellent and successful. The Government, the private sector and everyone else involved must do everything in their power to achieve that objective.

Two perspectives are missing — technological and entrepreneurial. The Government have been doing everything in their power to give a positive stimulus to the creation of an entrepreneurial culture, and I support that entirely. I shall give one example showing where we have failed and others have succeeded.

Recently, I attended a conference in France at which a presentation was made by a four-year-old American company. I shall give its name because I should like hon. Members to know what it is doing. The company is called Birdview Satellites. In 1981, the company had a turnover of about $700,000. This year it expects a turnover of about $100 million. That is what the company has done in only four years. That company has discovered that there is an extremely important and interesting market for the supply of domestic satellite receivers to the private individual in the United States. Nearly 1 million have now been supplied, and the company has been supplying about 10 per cent. of that total. The company expects to grow bigger. It is extremely successful commercially.

Why have we not done the same? We have not done so because our whole regulatory framework and attitude is one of fear. We are terrified of what may happen if someone can tune in a television receiver and get a direct signal from a satellite. The United States Government had exactly the same fear and probably went through the same arguments, but eight months ago they gave the green light, with the result that the company is now employing 800 people. It is making things which have never before been listed in the manufacturing handbooks. In my judgment, it will soon be a very substantial company. It has not happened here because we lack the technological imagination at all levels of our society and the entrepreneurial attitudes which follow that imagination.

We have done partially what we set out to do. One is reminded of the examiner's report, "Could do better." All Governments could do better. I do not think that any Government have an exemption in this context. The technology that we have to apply is undoubtedly all-pervasive and is sweeping into every aspect of our society. There is no point in any of us being under the illusion that by opening up the taps and the hoses of public expenditure we can go back to the days of 1972 or 1968, and that the old factories will be filled with old chaps doing the old things. That has gone, and it will never happen again. We have only one road before us—and that is forward. We can take it only if we support adventurous, skilful, but essentially carefully chosen, policies. That is the main point that I want to make.

We shall fail completely if we divert too large a proportion of our resources to attempts to maintain old industries in old places. With new information technology, new computer-aided design and manufacture, some firms in some industries may be helped to survive. If we know that, through information technology, the standardised technologies have migrated to the Third world — and they have been encouraged and assisted to migrate by some of the Japanese trading companies to which I referred earlier—all we shall be doing is pouring good money after bad. We shall be wasting our national resources on an unforgivable scale if we continue to subsidise industries which we know perfectly well cannot ever recover. We must help them and the communities which were employed in them in every possible way to change direction and to move forward. If we do that, we shall regain our national prosperity.

6.33 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) took exception to the use in the Opposition's motion of the term

"wilful neglect of British manufacturing industry".

I am happy to see the word "wilful" in the motion because I think it is rightly there. The Opposition see the Government as having one idol before them — the market—so that everything the market wants must be right. From that point of view, the Government wish to disengage themselves from interfering in industry and from helping industry in any way. That is why the word "wilful" appears in the motion.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): The hon. Gentleman must understand that the Conservative party has always been an interventionist party. If we had simply left it to the market place, there would not be a motor car industry, a shipbuilding or a ship repairing industry in Britain today.

Dr. Marek: I am afraid that there is not much of a motor car industry today, and there is not much of a shipbuilding industry either, so I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman.

It may well be that the real Conservative party is an interventionist party. Unfortunately, it has been hi-jacked, and the present Conservative party is a completely different creature. Therefore, I stand by what I said—that the word "wilful" is in the motion because the present Conservative party believes that anything the market wants is right. The market wants to have freedom to go abroad for its investment, or to stay here it can get enough profits.

The Government have in many ways got rid of all the possibilities that Governments used to have in developing vital industries in Britain. In addition, the Government have been proclaiming that there has been a recovery, that there is record investment in manufacturing, a record growth of exports, that employment is at an all-time high, and that unemployment is about to fall. The Government have put their case cleverly because it disguises the truth about what is happening to the nation.

The Government forget that 1979, 1980 and 1981 were three disastrous years for the industrial areas. Industry was decimated. It is no wonder that after the disastrous record of 1981 and 1982 the Government can point to some sort of recovery or increase in investment. It comes as no surprise that productivity has increased after the horrors that the British people had to endure in the first three years of the Government's first Adminstration. There is some recovery, but in many ways it has not yet brought us back to where we were in 1979, certainly in manufacturing. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) said that manufacturing output was about 10 per cent. below the 1979 figure. He said that investment in the United Kingdom is 33 per cent. below what it was in 1975. My figure is 25 per cent., but I will not argue about it.

We have seen a series of disasters. The money supply figures for April were awful. As a result, we shall see high interest rates continuing. No doubt the "month-on" figures will show that inflation will drop towards the end of this year and early next year, but City economists are now expecting inflation to rise after that.

Mr. Baldry: The hon. Gentleman is carping about what he regards as a series of disasters. Does he include the announcement yesterday from his constituency that Sony is to double its employment, with the expectation of adding several hundred more employees in the next two or three years?

Dr. Marek: It is not Sony but Sharp. Naturally, I am very pleased about the announcement, but it should be recognised that it has happened because the Wrexham borough council went to Japan and got the contract by talking to Sharp. I have had a detailed account of how the contract was obtained. Wrexham borough council used ratepayers' money to secure industrial development. The Welsh Office does not "disregard" that money and it is liable to grant holdbacks. Wrexham borough council, against the desires of the Government and Conservative Members, went out and obtained a deal so that microwave equipment will be made in Wrexham instead of West Germany or France — countries which understand manufacturing and the business of getting investment.

The Government are following a disastrous policy of lowering the industrial base of this country. Unemployment is increasing, and there are no signs of it decreasing. The underlying trend is still high. It is telling that the Minister argued with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) whether the unemployment figure was 3·2 million or 3·8 million. It is a sorry state when the figure is over 1·5 million — its level when the Labour Government left office. It is now at an all-time high. The Government claim the figure to be 3·2 million, but in reality it is well over 4 million. Many of the jobs that they include in the figures are part time and low paid. The figures when the Labour Government were in office related to head-of-household jobs—people who worked to support their families.

It is true that Sharp will provide 190 jobs in Wrexham — indeed, I hope that eventually the figure will be higher. But three or four weeks ago Courtaulds announced that 510 jobs would disappear from Wrexham. The workers were not told about that, yet the chairman put his name to an article saying that companies should always tell their workers their plans and not spring surprises upon them. The Courtaulds action is an example of something that I do not regard as good company practice. Without any warning, it has taken away 510 head-of-household jobs. They are well-paid and skilled jobs. We do not know why Courtaulds is doing this, but we suspect that it will transfer the work to its factories in Barcelona and Russia. The other Courtaulds factory to be closed at Greenfields will transfer its production to Grimsby. However, it is common gossip that the Grimsby factory will also close and the production transferred to India.

If I am carping, so be it. I and my hon. Friends are indignant about this matter. It is time that the Government faced their responsibilities and took action. Instead, they say, "Let us see how it goes. We have £40 million for this and a few million for that. We will rejig the figures. Just trust us and everything will be fine." I do not believe that. Many Conservative Members now recognise that and are making the same criticisms about Government policy that the Opposition continually make.

[Dr. Marek]

The Building Employers Confederation said in its June publication:

"While a further modest growth in building industry output this year is indicated by responses to the current Building Employers Confederation State of Trade Enquiry, enquiries for new work remain flat and less than one-third of firms questioned are working at full capacity."

Similar items have appeared in its previous bulletins during the two years that I have been a Member of Parliament. Not one article has suggested that the building industry can look forward to an upturn in new building and employment.

When Conservative Members make ritual noises about not wanting unemployment and pretend that they are sorry about it, they say, "We are going through a bad patch. Do not blame us; there is a world recession. We are trying to do our best." I question their sincerity when they troop through the Lobbies day after day supporting Government policies that lead to high unemployment.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): They shed crocodile tears.

Dr. Marek: Precisely. Conservative Members do not place a high priority on reducing unemployment.

I find it frightening that last year, for the first time, there was a trade deficit in our manufactured goods, and as an exporting nation that is a danger to our survival. I could never support a Government who pursued policies that resulted in a deficit in our manufactured goods.

There is also a growing deficit on the non-oil trade account. The hon. Member for Yeovil mentioned a figure of £12 billion. It is true that non-oil exports have risen by 1 or 2 per cent. since 1979—something upon which the Government seize—but, unfortunately, non-oil imports have also risen, and not by 1 or 2 per cent. but by more than 4 per cent. Surely that worries the Government. They tell us the same old story of exports being at record levels, and say that industry needs to be left alone to produce the goods and make the profits. They should be worried that non-oil imports are exceeding non-oil exports by a factor of four to one. Perhaps the Minister will tell us whether he is worried about that. It certainly worries the Labour party.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): Of course Conservative Members are worried about the deficit in manufactured trade. Will the hon. Gentleman explain the Labour party's policy of leaving the EEC, with which most of our manufactured trade takes place? How can such a policy help to increase our manufactured exports?

Dr. Marek: I do not want to delve too much into that aspect of Labour party policy—[Interruption.] I did not support Britain's entry into the EEC, yet I have always believed that we should follow the treaty to the last letter. But as the other EEC countries do not adopt that view, we only harm ourselves if we pursue that attitude. I regret that I have reached a view that we should take a sceptical attitude to many of the EEC regulations.

Hon. Members have mentioned Japan, and I agree that it is a world leader in the way that it organises its industry. I have no connection with Japan and, indeed, have never visited it, but I have spoken to people who have been there. They say that Japan organises its main manufacturing industries in an efficient manner with new high technology. I understand that one can walk about factories in Japan without seeing any workers other than one or two controllers. All the work is done by robots. However, the Japanese Government ensure that their people are employed. For example, one might use a bank card in the high-technology system outside a bank, but inside there are armies of clerks looking after one's affairs. There are many people in the service industries.

That is the difference between the attitude of the Japanese Government and the attitude of the British Government. We need investment and the most modern high technology for our manufacturing industry, and we cannot survive without it. But we must consider the people that technology displaces. The Government have thrown them on the dole queue and told them that they have no future. Young people, after two years on a youth training scheme, are trained only for a life on the dole. That must be changed. I recognise, as hon. Members have said, that we are changing over to more jobs in the service industry because all the developed countries have been doing this.

As an example, let us take the railway system. Instead of trying to cut down on the services available on platforms and in the trains, if the Government said that people should be employed to provide a decent service, and a degree of comfort, those engaged in the industry could take a pride in running an efficient railway system. If the Government took that view and at the same time insisted on having the highest technology and the most modern system of production in our manufacturing base, we would have much more of a one-country feeling and more unity of purpose with a sense of going somewhere as a developed country. I am sorry to say that at present that unity of purpose does not exist.

I do not believe that the people of Japan are more inventive than the people of this country. The people of this country are second to none in their inventiveness, creativity and ability to do front-line research and in enabling technologies so that front-line research can be put into action. Not much thought is given to this by the Government. It seems that the only thing that the Government can crow about is the fact that small companies are mushrooming and bringing forward new technology, but big companies have to be looked after as well in terms of research and development.

The Government have an interventionist role to play to make sure that the creativity of the people of this country can be put to good use, but this is the problem that the Government fail to recognise.

Let us take universities as an example. Since 1979 universities have been worried about whether they will retain the same numbers of people in their departments and whether the students will be forthcoming. This must have an affect on teachers in their researches and in their teaching. Indeed, I know that this is happening in universities, because I was at a university until 1983. Almost any university teacher in the country, when asked, will speak of the lack of morale. People wake up in the morning wondering whether there will be some new announcement by the chancellor or the principal that another 20 or 30 jobs must be cut because of the Government's plans to cut 5 per cent. for the next five years. This cannot be the way to run a country or to ensure that we become a developed nation again.

To give one example, I quote from an article in this week's Economist entitled "The Thin Way to Faster Chips" on the subject of low dimensional structures. The stage has now been reached where the chip is so small that problems arise if one wants to make it any smaller. We must now consider whether there is a future in molecular electronics as opposed to the current well-known standard microchips. The article says:

"The British Government is so impressed by the potential of low dimensional structures technology that it is considering spending up to £20 million on a five-year research programme to co-ordinate the work of universities and private companies. One spur for this initiative is the British contingent's dismal performance at a conference on low dimensional structures held in Oxford in late 1983 when few of the research papers came from British universities."

That sums up the present state of our technology. Everybody is worried about whether there will be enough money and whether their research, teaching or company job will exist in three or four years. They do not have the time to spend on such matters as low dimensional structures technology which may be of crucial importance in five, 10 or 15 years. Make no mistake about it—countries like West Germany, France and Japan do not follow these lines. If there is a possibility of technological advance, the money is provided, and there are no half measures about it.

I should like the Government to do an about-turn. The Government should realise that they have an interventionist role to play in regard to industry and technology.

Although the right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) spoke about something slightly different from me, I agree with what he said about support for industries from the Export Credits Guarantee Department and better bilateral aid. Again, we can learn from the French, the Germans and the Japanese, but I am sad to say that we seem not to be learning.

The Government must get rid of their obsession with medium-term financial strategy and grocer shop economics. There are important questions to be considered about fifth generation computers and enabling technologies, and we still have time to take some action. I hope that the Government will realise the error of their ways. If they do not do anything about it, the next Government will.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I should tell the House that the 10-minute rule will apply from 7 o'clock.

6.55 pm

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): I shall endeavour to put up the productivity of speeches and be rather briefer than other hon. Members.

I have listened to some of the speeches of Opposition Members, in particular that of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). I can tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman—I do not know whether he will be pleased or disappointed — that manufacturing industry in my constituency is doing very much better than the Opposition's motion or the right hon. and learned Member's speech would suggest.

I suggest that there are two reasons for that. The first lies in the fact that we have nurtured and encouraged new high-tech industries. In addition, in our older industries we have been applying high tech to the traditional products and to older methods of production. I know that some of my hon. Friends in the aspirant part of the Administration, Parliamentary Secretaries, who have visited my constituency, have seen evidence of this.

I have a personal reason for intervening in the debate. I am fundamentally an industrial animal. I came into the House 30 years ago from industry. I still retain a modest working connection with industry. Indeed, I find this helps me to keep closer to economic reality. I still feel more at home on the shop floor than on the Floor of the House.

British industry is doing better than the Opposition make out, but it is not doing well enough. I believe that we have a long way to go before we can with confidence face the future in the knowledge that we have a sound enough base to deal with the challenges of the future, particularly those that my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) pointed out, and upon which we can build a freer, more responsible and more prosperous society.

What is wrong with British industry? As a Back-Bencher, I will not detain the House on a detailed answer to that question; it would be beyond my proper station in the House to endeavour to do so. I shall content myself, therefore, in proof of this proposition, with a short quotation from a discussion paper produced by the CBI in which it identifies three significant problems:

"The structure of UK production and trade is very down-market in relation to UK cost levels and, hence, is highly vulnerable to competition from low-cost producers. Despite success in improving productivity, UK costs are rising relative to those of competitors. We are still losing market shares (both in goods and services)."

In support of this analysis by the CBI, I should like to draw to the attention of the House the amount of foreign machinery that is used in our factories today. I am sure that hon. Members, when they visit factories, observe the type of machinery that is being used and, above all, look at the nameplate showing where the machinery was made. It is depressing that so much of it is foreign made.

My own professional institution, the Institution of Industrial Managers, recently conducted a survey of the machine tools used in many of the factories in which its 23,000 members work. It found that a depressing number of machine tools were foreign made. When it asked why members were using a foreign machine, it received answers which gave the clue to the basic structural weakness in British industry and in our society. The first question was:

"Is it because the type required is not made in the UK?"

A total of 93 per cent. of the managers using foreign machines gave that as the first reason. The second question was about foreign machine tools having more advanced technology. A total of 78 per cent. said that that was the reason. A total of 57 per cent. said that foreign machine tools were more reliable, and 57 per cent. said that they were cheaper, but cheapness was not the principal reason. The principal reasons were non-availability of machines with the level of modern technology required and the fact that foreign machines were more advanced technically. These reasons are telling. They have nothing to do with whether machines were cheaper or whether delivery was better.

The answer to our industrial weaknesses does not lie principally in the manner in which this Government, or any other Government, manage the macro-economy, although obviously economic management matters. I believe that the answer is to be found in our anti-industrial culture, in our prevailing social values, and, above all, in the low esteem which we place on engineering. In short, we place engineers too low in the pecking order and reward them too poorly.

[Sir David Price]

We have suffered far too long from the unholy alliance of the aristocratic Right and the intellectual Left in the proposition that industry is a dirty business and is not for us. Of course, the need for industry is reluctantly accepted as an intellectual proposition by the alliance, but it is emotionally, culturally and socially scorned.

Mr. Tebbit: I agree with what my hon. Friend has said about the intellectual arrogance of the aristrocratic Right and the political Left, but when they are combined in the same person in an arrogant and extreme Left aristocrat it is worst of all.

Mr. Benn: The Japanese, with a national income of much more than twice ours, spent 1 per cent. of their national income on defence when we spent 6 per cent. It is no wonder that the world's shops and showrooms are crammed with Japanese cameras and videos and that all we can sell are missiles to the dictators whom the Secretary of State loves so much.

Sir David Price: I disagree profoundly with the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). He is talking about the difference between 1 per cent. and 6 per cent. and I am talking about the cultural attitudes of the United Kingdom towards its engineers and those who get their hands dirty in industry.

I shall illustrate my point from Government. The Treasury is the greatest of the economic Departments. I am told that it is staffed by the cream of the intellectual elite of our Civil Service. Who in the Treasury has managed a factory? Who in the Treasury has supervised a building site, built a bridge, designed an aeroplane, or won a contract in Japan or Texas? In the world of wealth creation, the Treasury is an economic eunuch, as are many in the media who criticise and lecture us about industry.

The House may think that I exaggerate, so I shall quote from a much under-studied and under-read report by Monty Finniston and his colleagues called "Engineering our Future". It states:

"It is internationally acknowledged that Britain is a country rich in inventiveness and creative talent. Yet, with some eminent exceptions, these inventive talents have not been harnessed effectively by manufacturing industry because, compared with Continental Europe and the large part of the world which has followed its lead, there have been neither the cultural nor the pecuniary rewards in this country to attract sufficient of the brightest national talents into engineering in industry. Great prestige is attached to science, medicine and the creative arts, so that to be associated with their activities is to share in that esteem, but there is no cultural equivalent in Britain, and hence no basis for according similar esteem to the European concepts conveyed in German by 'Technik'—the synthesis of knowledge from many disciplines to devise technical and economic solutions to practical problems."

Over the 30 years that I have sat in the House I have become aware that Britain lacks that "Technik". We do not respect our engineers. What happened to the Fulton report about engineers and scientists in the Civil Service? How many such people have become permanent secretaries?

Until we give the engineer and the industrial manager a proper place in our society we shall not realise the full potential of our people and of our economy. I say to the House, "Come back Telford; come back Watt; come back Brunel. All is forgiven." If any hon. Members thinks that I am preaching a purely materialistic culture which lacks spiritual values, I remind him of the wise saying of Dr. Samuel Johnson:

"that words are the daughters of earth and that things are the sons of heaven."

I remind the House that, to be caring and compassionate, it is not necessary to be inefficient.

7.8 pm

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I am sorry that the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) is no longer in the Chamber, because his speech contained many interesting comments with which I agree. In particular, I agreed when he said that the Government had neglected the information technology industry. He said that the neglect was not wilful. I think that he was wrong.

One reason for the neglect is that the Government have not accepted the remarkable change in the industry. Many of the statistics used by the Minister, comparing this Government with the last Labour Government, were invalid because we are now on the vertical part of the graph and the rate of change is remarkable.

Mr. Hayward: The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) is not being fair to my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd), because he said that Government had neglected the industry in certain circumstances. He did not relate his comments specifically to the present Government.

Mr. Randall: The hon. Member for Havant implied that he was talking about this Government, because he referred to the NEDO report in which strong comments are made about the Government's role in the information technology industry. The report says that the information technology industry is in crisis, so one cannot be other than alarmed about what is happening in that crucial industry.

I was particularly disturbed when, in February, having asked the Leader of the House during business questions whether the Government would be prepared to put aside some time to discuss that report, I drew a blank. That shows the Government's lack of interest, and their complacency towards the industry.

The industry is important. We must draw important conclusions from the current balance of payments situation. The industry has gone rapidly into a balance of payments deficit. The reason is that there is so much import content in many of the products that we sell, and our own industry has not been able to respond to the intense competition from many of the foreign-owned multinationals.

However, the industry is growing fast. The figures in the NEDO report show that in 1983 world demand for IT products was about $50 billion, going up to about $150 billion by the early 1990s. By any measure, that is a rapid rate of growth. The problem for the United Kingdom industry is that it is not getting its fair share of the cake. What is happening in the British IT industry is reflected in the national economic situation. We know that the Government have devastated British industry. The facts are there. Only a fool would argue against that. What the Government have not done for IT is part and parcel of the economic and industrial disaster that has been wrought in this country. Our information technology industry is dying before it has had the opportunity even to blossom.

What have the Government done? I shall be positive about it. They had their 1982 IT programme. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary was influential in that programme. One must accept that the Government were successful in improving awareness in this country of what information technology is about. The decisions made by the Government on ICL were accepted as being basically good for the country. Otherwise, I am sure that ICL would have gone to the wall. Such things must be encouraged.

The Government have a broad range of schemes. The Minister touched on them during his speech. There is the support for innovation programme, the microelectronics application programme, and all the others. People in the industry tell me that that there is a wide range of schemes, but it is too wide. It is baffling for the small firms. The complexity of applications turns away many small companies, and results in an automatic "No." I hope that the Minister will take up that matter, because I believe that there is a genuine requirement for simplification of many of the present schemes.

Mr. Pattie: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary with responsibility for small firms, the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), repackaged about 64 schemes into four separate schemes to meet that very point.

Mr. Randall: I am glad to hear that. My point was the result of discussions that I had with people with knowledge of the industry.

I should like to refer to the 21 pilot projects. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary and I debated that subject in an Adjournment debate that I introduced just before Christmas. The projects are good stuff, but the scale is too modest. Because the rate of change is so rapid, because international competition is so fierce and because the United States and particularly Japan are consolidating their positions, it is tinkering with the matter. We must think about it on a far grander scale.

We have Alvey, which is to be encouraged. However, there are administrative problems and unknowns about the final outcome and how we convert it into a real product that will enhance the industry and create jobs. Similar things can be said about ESPRIT.

What should the Government do about information technology? I feel that the Government should play a much stronger role as a customer rather than a sponsor. There should be a coherent and powerful procurement policy in the public sector. I should like to see all Government Departments, including the Department of Health and Social Security, the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Defence, take up the use of information technology to a far greater extent. I go further and say that we should have a really big scheme, with the objective of creating the best public administration systems in the world. I get tired of our always having to match the competition. We now have the opportunity to go ahead and do more.

If I were a Minister, I would bring in the permanent secretaries and say, "Draw up plans that will totally transform your Departments." That would be important for the country and good for public administration. It would also be good for the morale of the Civil Service, which is very low at the moment because of all the cuts that have been taking place for a long time. We must think far bigger. I would adopt the Kennedy style. He said that the Americans would have a man on the moon in the 1970s. I would say that we shall have the best public administration systems in the world by a certain date.

If we did what I am suggesting, there would be a marked improvement on the demand side of the industry. Many of the policies are on the supply side — for example, restructuring and research. That must go on, but much needs to be done on the demand side. If any Conservative Member is prepared to tell me that if the next Labour Government were to do that it would be an irresponsible use of public money, I shall sit down and give way. Of course it would not. It would be eminently sensible. I hope that when the Labour party forms a Government in two years' time, it will do just that.

Mr. Baldry: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Randall: I shall not give way, because I am running out of time.

In the short term, there would be a boost to the IT industry as a result of such a policy. The industry would then be able to respond to large projects. It would be able to deliver on time and with far better quality products. That is what happens in the United States. Public money goes into such projects there. I could quote numerous examples of the way in which the Americans have done that, but I do not have the time. That is what we should do. Even our local authorities have a role to play. For example, the Greater London council——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Member has exhausted his 10 minutes.

7.18 pm

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): I am pleased to be able to take part in the debate and to support the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister, as well as what was said by my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology.

I was amazed by the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). Its content was pure, red-blooded Socialism. If his policies were carried out, they would have a devastating effect on our industry. I was disappointed by the comments made by the alternative Opposition — the alliance. The constructive comments in the debate have come from Conservative Benches, which is encouraging.

My constituency of Erith and Crayford has suffered a major change, with the decline of the heavy manufacturing industries and the development of the new technological industries. We must accept such a change. It brings less employment, but it is exciting in many ways because it represents the future. It is the future that we should discuss, not the past and the solutions that come from the past. We have seen them too often.

I remind Opposition Members that historically our industry and our entrepreneurial spirit made our country wealthy — not Governments, politicians or more and more money pumped in by the taxpayer, but the initiative and entrepreneurial spirit of the industrialists. That is what we must generate today. That is what we must recover. I was impressed by the fact that my hon. Friend the Minister not only listed the Government's efforts to encourage industry but described how they are trying to instil a new spirit into industry in connection with the new technology. [Interruption.] Hon. Gentlemen may laugh. They are not, like us, interested in creating more wealth for the country.

I totally support what my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) said about the lack of status accorded to scientists and engineers in the past. I hope that that regrettable attitude will change within the next few years.

[Mr. David Evennett]

Education and training are vital. I was disappointed that the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) did not develop that theme. It is vital that we should consider education, training and cost. Those are major factors in meeting the demands of the new, high-technology products. We need good, educated workers trained to produce and utilise the new equipment. I believe that the Government have shown that they are willing to play their role in that area, and, indeed, that they have done so successfully. Without the necessary skills, we would be unable to compete in the production of modern technology or to make the best use of its many and varied applications.

A wide range of skills is required. We need to train people in basic keyboard skills so that they can operate computers. We also need graduate scientists, technologists and engineers to carry out innovative research and to develop commercially viable end products. We must create products that people are willing to buy on the world markets and at home.

Much is being done to encourage the learning of such skills in schools. Many pupils are learning to operate micro-computers, many of which are provided with funds from the Department of Trade and Industry. Further changes in tuition in mathematics, sciences and craft subjects mean that pupils receive an education that is better fitted to the needs of modern society. In addition, schemes such as the technical and vocational education initiative ensure that pupils are well prepared and able to compete in a rapidly changing world. Beyond school, the Government are encouraging more students to take degrees in technological subjects to meet the needs of the sunrise industries.

We have heard too often of the shortage of skilled people in industry. That shortage is regrettable. It must and will be made good.

As well as the educational initiative in the schools, universities and polytechnics, there is a need to encourage training to meet the changing needs of industry. The Government have made clear their wish to see the training provided by the Manpower Services Commission made more relevant and adaptable to the needs of industry. That positive move is to be welcomed. It is especially important to retrain those employed in dying industries. We must accept the fact that some industries are dying. The Opposition, when in government, wanted to pump more and more money into dying industries. That is why, in the past 20 years, we have not been able to release resources for the dynamic new industries.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow) rose——

Mr. Evennett: I am sorry, but time is short.

We must retrain manpower from the dying industries to take up the challenge of the new industries. That is the only way in which we can create more jobs.

The Government have some role to play, but it is distressing to be told that only the Government have a role. That is what the Opposition Front Bench tells us all too often. When Opposition spokesmen say, "The Government must do such-and-such", they are talking about taxpayers' money. Employers have a major role to play. They must take more responsibility for training. Many of them are keen to do so. They must make use of the facilities offered by the Government and build upon them.

One of the strengths of many of our overseas competitors is the extent to which they are involved in training and retraining employees within the firms. Employees, too, and the unions that represent them have a crucial role to play. They must be willing to move away from outmoded and wasteful training methods. Mention has been made of the trade apprenticeships, which seem to me to be more concerned with the time served than the skill and confidence gained. That is not acceptable.

If greater training is to be provided by employers, those receiving that training must adopt a more realistic attitude to the costs and other burdens that such training imposes on the employer, and must therefore be willing to accept a lower rate of pay during training. They will benefit in the long term.

The cost of training cannot be ignored any more than any other cost in industry. Ultimately, costs determine the price at which the goods can be sold on the market. If the customer will not pay the price, there will be no industry and no goods for sale. We are competing in international markets where products are keenly priced. Unless our costs are kept as low as possible, we will not succeed in capturing an increased share of the world market.

Despite recent improvements, our costs, especially labour costs, do not compare favourably with those of our competitors. That is worrying. The Opposition will not accept the fact that trainees should be paid at a lower rate. When inflation was running riot, it was acceptable for workers to want higher wages; they did not know what next year would bring. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, memories are short. In the 1970s, inflation ran riot. Nowadays it is under control and we need realistic wage settlements. We should congratulate the Government on their efforts. For the first time in 20 years of decay, we are looking to the future and the new industries. That is to be applauded and not criticised. We could all, of course, make many suggestions about slight improvements, but the basic principle is what we are discussing today. We are looking for an improvement across the board in our economic performance. We therefore need more investment in the new industries, much retraining, and changes in education.

The Opposition claim that industry cannot rely on the Government. They are completely wrong, as usual. This is in fact the only possible Government to which the country could look to encourage our industries and our future. The Opposition would look backwards to the dying industries.

Industrial success demands a sound economy. We are on the right course. We would like to see a few alterations, and we will discuss them at length in future in debates on particular subjects. However, to a greater extent than for many years, we are looking forward, and that is a great improvement.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): My hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) has outlined the attitude of the alliance to the present situation and said what it would seek to do about it.

I should like to concentrate on a single topic that was raised, towards the end of his speech, by the hon. Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett). He talked about the importance of a free trade system for our technologies. As has been said, the new technology industries are fundamental to our future. A fair system of trade to allow our high technology industries to operate normally and to export effectively is therefore crucial.

However, our high technology industries are now being severely inhibited from exporting effectively, not because of the laws of this country, but because of constraints placed upon them by our principal ally, the United States. I shall show how the United States has sought and continues to seek to impose United States laws on British firms operating in Britain in a way that not only prevents them from trading effectively, but effectively undermines the sovereignty of Parliament.

I have spoken before in the House about the now infamous IBM letter of 22 December 1983 which required purchasers of certain IBM machines to ask the permission of the United States Government before moving those machines, even within the United Kingdom. I asked the Government to intervene in the matter to protect British firms and British sovereignty, but they have done nothing —or at least nothing effective.

The IBM letter still stands unrescinded, and it remains operative. But, worse than that, other American firms have now joined IBM in similar actions. A more recent letter which was sent to United Kingdom firms by Texas Instruments has come to light. It states:

"We seek an assurance from you, our customer . . . that your Company will not, without prior authorisation, export technical data to any destination or country which is prohibited under the laws of the USA."

That includes countries, such as Austria, Sweden, Switzerland and Spain, with which the United Kingdom has perfectly ordinary trading relationships. The letter goes on to define technical data in terms which make it clear that software is included, and even data—to quote the company's coy phrase—of "an intangible nature". That relates to data held in people's heads. In other words, anyone with such information in his head must presumably ask the permission of the United States Government before travelling from Britain to one of the nations prohibited under United States law. Similar letters have been sent by other United States suppliers, including General Instruments and Microelectronics.

The high technology industry is international. Almost every high technology item manufactured in Britain and elsewhere contains components made in other countries. Indeed, it is calculated that non-United States manufactured high technology goods are 60 to 80 per cent. dependent on United States-produced components. In effect, therefore, as many as 60 per cent. — perhaps more — of British manufacturers must seek a licence from the United States before exporting their goods to many destinations.

I should make it clear that these conditions are placed on British firms, not as part of their contractual requirements with their United States suppliers. That at least would be understandable, if difficult to enforce. No such contractual terms have ever been required. Therefore, these are impositions placed directly on United Kingdom firms by the United States Government bypassing the United Kingdom Government. Is that not an infringement of our sovereignty?

What are the Government doing to protect United Kingdom firms and industry from such action? The Government have gone through the ritual motions of protest, but none of the Secretary of State's wringing of hands has had any effect, as I shall seek to show.

I accept the need to place restraints and controls upon the export of items, especially high-tech items, which, if they fell into the hands of an enemy or potential enemy, could prejudice security. But surely it is for the United Kingdom to decide on such controls, not for the United States to impose them unilaterally on British firms over the head of our own Government.

It is apparent that the United States Government are prepared not only to impose the writ of their own law on British industry, but to back up what they see as infringements with heavy sanctions — again directly imposed on British firms in Britain for infringements of United States law, not British law.

The most famous recent example relates to the Leeds-based company of Systime, until recently a wholly-owned British firm. Systime fell under suspicion of being involved in trading from Britain with countries of which the United States disapproved — Iraq and Pakistan — although they are nations with which Britain has perfectly normal trading relationships. The company was subsequently threatened by the United States Department of Commerce—without an opportunity to put its case—with total denial of all supplies of components from the United States. In effect, that would have meant the death of Systime. Systime agreed to negotiate terms with the United States Government, believing, as a result of talks at the highest level with the Department of Trade and Industry, that our Government either would not or could not effectively come to its aid. It is a matter of public record that the company has now agreed to pay the United States Government a "fine" of $400,000, and it is likely that it will have to accept terms and conditions which will include giving details of all United Kingdom customers to the United States on a regular basis.

I repeat that at the time those sanctions were imposed Systime was a wholly-owned United Kingdom company, operating in and from the United Kingdom. It had broken no United Kingdom law. In the absence of effective action by the Department of Trade and Industry, it had no option but to accept the United States fine and conditions or to go out of business.

I have several questions for the Minister. Why in this matter has the Minister abrogated the sovereignty of Parliament to the United States? Is this an appropriate way for an ally to act? How can he pretend to be interested in encouraging exports from high-tech industry when he will not act to stop the imposition of restraints on those imports by other, more powerful, nations?

Unhappily, Systime is not an isolated case. Even ICL, Britain's foremost computer company, has been similarly affected. It has been fined $15,000, and its exports have also been made subject to United States control. Here again, it was exporting to a nation with which Britain has normal trading relationships, but of which the United States Government disapproved.

United States export licences are now often required by British firms exporting British manufactured goods to EEC countries. In some cases, those goods contain as little as 2 per cent. United States-made components. Such constraints on inter-EEC trade clearly infringe EEC laws. That matter is currently being investigated in Brussels. Why are the United Kingdom Government not taking similar action?

[Mr. Paddy Ashdown]

It is now clear that the United States Government are prepared to back up their investigations and action by using United States Government officials within Britain but without the British Government's permission. That much was admitted to me in a parliamentary answer on 19 December 1984, in which the Minister agreed that a United States official, Mr. Jack Lacey, had visited and investigated a British firm without any reference to, or permission from, the British Government. There have been other similar incidents.

In a speech in Palo Alto, California, in April 1984, the then director of the CIA said that the CIA had a list of 300 black-listed firms in Europe. Shortly after that speech, I telephoned the CIA in Washington, and it confirmed that British firms were included in that black list. Is that the appropriate action of an ally? How did those British firms get on that list? Perhaps the answer lies in a conversation that I had with Mr. Richard Perle earlier this year, following a television debate. I asked him how on earth the United States could use its Customs and Excise to enforce its regulations abroad. He said that in his view this was a job not wholly for Customs and Excise, but also for the intelligence services. Is that how this information on British firms reached the CIA's black list?

There is one further twist to this saga. The United States has now decided that the limitations on the export of intangible assets—the assets in people's heads—entitles its Government to place restraints on open scientific conferences. A recent open conference on optoelectronics held in the United States was summarily closed by the Pentagon. Foreign scientists, including, I believe, British ones, were excluded from meetings, and the United States scientists who were allowed to attend were required to sign control forms.

I understand that the British Computer Society has already written to the Minister expressing its deep concern over this matter, but that it has yet to receive a reply. I also understand that tomorrow it will be making a statement expressing its concern on the matter. Given the previous action that I have already mentioned, will we now see United States pressure to exercise similar action to control the movement of people, as well as hardware and software, in Britain?

The high technology industry uses a buzz word to express what it fears most. It is referred to as FUD—fear, uncertainty and doubt. The Government have allowed such a climate to prevail over high-tech exports —fear of unilateral extraterritorial action by the United States against British firms operating in Britain within British law; uncertainty about what, if any, action the Department of Trade and Industry will take to protect them; and doubt about what to do next.

The Minister can paint whatever rosy pictures he wishes about our high-tech industries. He can call on them to export until he is blue in the face; he can institute as many export for jobs seminars as he likes; but unless he and the Government are prepared to stand up for British high-tech firms which wish to export, he will find that Britain will become just another technological satellite of the United States and that the trading laws under which our industry exports are those which come not from Ashdown house but from Washington.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): In a week or so the eyes of the world's motor racing fans will be centred upon a world famous spot which stages the oldest motor race in the world, the Indianapolis 500. There will congregate many aspirants for the coveted prize, the richest prize in motor sport. This year 79 cars have been entered for the 33 start places. Not many Japanese cars will be found there. In fact, there will be none. Not many French, German or Italian cars will be there; again, there will be none. There will not be many American cars; in fact, there will be four. The remaining 75 entrants are all British-built racing cars.

The same happened last year. Of the 33 starters, 29 were British-built March cars. All 14 finishers were British-built. Sometimes we are our own worst enemy. We spend our time criticising ourselves instead of complimenting ourselves on some of the great attributes that we have as a country.

In formula I racing car design we are world renowned for our expertise. Our engine technology has been unsurpassed, with the Cosworth engine having powered almost all the formula I winners for nearly 15 years until it was superseded by later designs. Robin Herd, one of the chief designers of March racing cars, has just received the 1985 Duke of Edinburgh award for design for the excellent work he has done overseas. That was a well-deserved award. In the design of racing cars, surely the highest form of vehicle transportation, we are pre-eminent.

In many ordinary bread-and-butter car designs we are also pre-eminent. Lotus, Jaguar and TVR—three British manufacturers—have announced record sales. Lotus has announced substantial profits. Those are motor engineering companies with a world renowned reputation; they are building products wanted by the market not just in this country but overseas.

I cannot help but be depressed when I hear Opposition Members, and in particular the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition, no doubt crawling around for county council and shire county votes in the recent election, telling the workers in my constituency, who have built up a good record of reliability and product quality, that 5,000 jobs are likely to go, that no more money is coming from Government and that the whole industry is likely to fall flat on its face. They were refe.ring, of course, to the so-called corporate plan of BL and principally to the future of the plant at Longbridge in my constituency.

The facts do not fit that argument. In the last three months a 10-year record has been achieved by Austin Rover. A total of 142,507 cars has been built, with a 19·3 per cent. penetration of the United Kingdom market. The Austin Montego is ahead of the Ford Sierra in sales; that has been achieved through very hard work. The new Rover 200 series built at Longbridge has also reached the top 10 and accounts for 2·2 per cent. of the United Kingdom market.

The Austin Rover group is running at 98 per cent. of capacity — an unprecedented level for any British automobile company. That means that if it wished to increase output or to start assembling Honda cars on its assembly lines it would have to take on extra workers. In regard to workers, it is useful to point out that because of the quality of the products Longbridge, far from getting rid of people, has taken on no fewer than 1,365 new employees since the beginning of January last year, so a great deal has been achieved.

When one listens to the Opposition one would imagine that no investment had taken place at Longbridge. At the same time as Opposition Members talk about 5,000 jobs being lost, a new gearbox line has been installed to build the Honda gearbox and a new O series diesel engine line has been prepared for the diesel engine being produced in conjunction with Perkins. That is reckoned to be of an advanced nature and acceptable for today's modern motoring style.

We know about the new S series engine which powers the Maestro and the Montego, and the new O series turbo engine which powers the fastest saloon car currently available at under £10,000. Much work is being undertaken at Longbridge and no one should go around spreading doom, gloom and despondency.

When it comes to new investment in the A series replacement engine one cannot take the requirements of Austin Rover in isolation. Ford and Fiat have decided to get together to produce another generation of cars. Those are Europe's two largest manufacturers, which account for 27 per cent. of the European market. If they find it necessary to form a partnership to develop the next range of cars, surely it makes sense for Austin Rover to look beyond itself for a new generation of engines for its smaller saloon cars. It is hardly surprising, therefore, that the management has decided to review the corporate plan in line with the requirements that it envisages the market will want and what it can afford over the next few years. The partnership with Honda, which is essential for the well-being of the company, has produced good news recently. It can be developed much further so long as it is not a screwdriver job but a joint working venture.

We look forward to increased sales afforded by the entry of Austin Rover to the United States, where it is aiming to sell 20,000 cars in 1987. One must look with dismay at what is happening in Spain. This year some 90,000 Spanish cars will come to this country, yet we are allowed to send only 3,500 Austin Rover cars to Spain. The market is there. The company has just exhibited at Barcelona with one of the largest stands in the show. It could sell 20,000 cars in that market but it is not allowed to do so because of the import limitation. That is where jobs could be found. I have already mentioned that the company is operating at 98 per cent. of capacity. If it could gain access to the Spanish market that would almost inevitably lead to the creation of extra jobs.

It is not necessarily the Government but the customer who buys the product who will provide the investment. We have just heard today about the demise of the Philips washing and drying machine industry in this country. I have just bought a Philips drying machine because I believe in buying British and because it is good equipment. How many Opposition Members have bought Philips drying machines and washing machines? They prefer Candy, Zanussi and all the other foreign manufactured machines. If we want manufacturing to stay in this country, if we want products to be built in this country and if we want the investment, we must support those products by buying British, because they are the best quality and the best price and give our people the best opportunity for their future.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I can claim two credentials for speaking in the debate. First, I represent the constituency of Burnley in which people depend heavily on work in the manufacturing industries. Secondly, until I was elected a Member of Parliament in 1983 I worked in manufacturing industry on the continental shift system, changing shifts every three days. I was also a shop steward in the Mullard group, part of Philips, to which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) has just referred.

I know how the work force was reduced in that factory from 3,500 to 1,200 during the 10 years that I worked there. New technology and new methods were introduced. Obviously it was an extremely difficult period, but that industry survived because of the great understanding between the unions and the employers. One point that should emerge from today's debate is that we should give every encouragement to management to involve the work force more in the decisions that are taken. Many of the problems in industry arise from the failure to have adequate communications with the work force. If that consultation takes place and if the work force knows what is going on, it will co-operate with change, however difficult that might be. It is better to have job security for fewer employees than to have no job security at all. The trade unions and the employers have a mutual interest in that respect.

I recognise that if we are to compete in the world's market places we must accept that new technology must be introduced into our industries. If we are to compete on equal terms, we cannot adhere to old-fashioned methods and equipment.

As I have said, I was employed by Mullard, which is part of the Philips group, before being elected to this House. The company manufactured cones that were used on the back of television tubes. As a result of co-operation between the management and the unions, we were able to make them so efficiently and so well that we could make in about six to eight months all that we needed for a year. That was all well and good while we were allowed to export the surplus cones, but suddenly the parent company in Eindhoven decided that Mullard would no longer export the cones and that the export trade would be left to the Aachen glass factory of the Philips group. As a consequence, the section of the Mullard work force producing the cones had to be made redundant. Every cone that is incorporated in a television set that is made in Britain has to be imported from the continent.

That is an example of one of the difficulties that many British industries face when they are part of a multinational group. The group's decisions are not taken in Britain's national interest, and nor are they taken in the best interests of British workers. The multinational group decides where it wants to make profit or where it wants the job to be done. The decisions of multinationals can be contrary to the best interests of Britain.

I have lived and worked in an old textile town that had to accept transformation in the early years after the second world war from textiles to new industries. I am well aware of the adaptability of the work force, especially in my part of north-east Lancashire. The area has seen the appearance of new industries. Lucas Aerospace is at the forefront in my constituency. It supplies many of the world's major aerospace companies but every company overseas with which it is in competition receives far more Government assistance than it receives from the British Government. There is no doubt that the management and work force at Lucas Aerospace at Burnley are first class and that they produce first-class products. However, if they are to win contracts and survive, they must be able to compete on an equal basis with their competitors from abroad. The Government should give more consideration to that factor.

There is a new industry in my constituency which has been formed by two people who went to school in Burnley. Their company, AMS, will soon move into a new factory in the Burnley enterprise zone. The company makes excellent audio equipment which is exported throughout the world. The average age of the employees is less than 23 years. Unfortunately, there is little of that sort of work in Lancashire and the regions. Most of the industries of that type are concentrated in the more prosperous south-east. The company happens to be in Burnley because the two people who run it were born and educated in the town. The company has, for the second year in succession, won a Queen's award for industry this year. That is a sign of the way in which people in a constituency such as mine are prepared to accept new types of job if they are given the opportunity to do so.

The Government have failed to capitalise on many of Britain's leads. One example is our ability to make substitute natural gas. We could gain a world market in our capability to produce the necessary equipment for the production of substitute natural gas if the Government were to instruct British Gas to initiate a programme of conversion. I accept that the need for substitute natural gas may not be with us, but it would be in the best interests of our energy policy if we were to start the conversion now. We could gain tremendous world markets if the Government were to give the go-ahead to British Gas for that project.

Britain has a lead in cable and satellite television broadcasting. The Minister who was responsible for the industry accepted that that was so when I asked a question to that effect two years ago. However, because decisions have not been taken in time, we are allowing the rest of the world to catch up with us. Ultimately we shall be overtaken and the rest of the world will enjoy the advantage and not our industries.

In my constituency the unemployment rate is slightly over 13 per cent. Most of my constituents, whether they are employers or trade unionists, believe that the Government have no policy for industry and that they are not interested in manufacturing industry. That judgment can be arrived at from the answers that Ministers have given to our questions. They suggest that a trading deficit on manufactured goods is not of great consequence. They refer to invisible exports and say that we must view the picture overall. I accept that invisible earnings are important to our financial well-being, but we are a manufacturing country. We have depended on manufacturing industries in the past and our future will similarly depend upon them. If we are to survive, we must ensure that our manufacturing industries are able to compete. If we do not recognise that, there is a danger that we shall become a satellite of other countries.

In the car manufacturing industry, for example, there is a danger that we shall end up with only an assembly industry and that the development of new cars will not be concentrated within Britain. If that is followed by a further recession in the motor trade, Britain will suffer the major blow and not the countries that are involved in development work.

I have a great fear—I know that it is shared by many of my constituents—that when North sea oil and gas are depleted, and when the Government have no more assets to dispose of, those in work will enjoy an improved standard of living and all those who are unfortunate enough not to be in work—the unemployed, the retired, the sick or the disabled—will see a fairly rapid decline in their way of life. We are already moving in that direction. When announcements are made on the future of the welfare state, I am sure that they will prove my predictions to be right. However, we have shown in the past an ability to develop new schemes. The Government should encourage both sides of industry to ensure that we go forward.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): There is a word in the Yiddish language which defies straightforward translation into English but which is relevant to the nature of the debate. The word I have in mind is "chutzpah", which, loosely, means barefaced nerve. An American authority on the Yiddish vocabulary once illustrated its meaning by the story of an armed mugger who cried "Help" while beating up a defenceless person. In moving the motion the Opposition have provided the House with a classic illustration of chutzpah when we consider the permanent damage that was sone to industry under the Labour Government.

Over the past six years a vast amount has been accomplished to restore the foundation of Britain's industrial welfare and prosperity and to create the necessary conditions for future growth. The fundamental weaknesses that were allowed to develop in the middle and late 1970s mean that it will be some time yet before all the structural changes that are taking place in industry are completed and before the transition from a predominantly traditional manufacturing base to one that is fully reliant on new technology is achieved.

In spite of the fact that this country's economic growth rate is among the highest in Europe, that productivity has improved, that company profits are increasing and that hundreds of thousands of new jobs have been created in the private sector, there is no denying that industry still has visible scars from the recession that began in 1980. One has only to travel to the west midlands to witness the effects of that recession upon the industrial landscape. But the savagery of the recession's impact there has to a very considerable extent been the result of the Labour Government's policies for industry in the latter half of the 1970s. I am not suggesting that that Government were solely to blame for what happened. Management, trade unions and previous Governments have to take their share of responsibility, too.

Not only was inflation allowed to soar in a manner that priced British goods beyond all hope of competitiveness; there was the iniquitous tax on jobs and the absurd bureaucracy of the Price Commission. Even the measures introduced by the then Chancellor at the end of 1974 in his emergency Budget—and welcomed, it has to be said, by management at the time—to provide stock relief and improved capital allowances for industry had an inflationary effect. Either that Labour Government did not understand or did not want to face up to the problem that was eating away at British industry, which was that pay increases were far outstripping productivity so long as the inflationary spiral continued unchecked.

Hon. Members are more than familiar with the events that followed, but the effect of Labour's approach to industry in the 1970s meant that when the recession emerged at the back end of the steel strike early in 1980 a great many manufacturing companies were overloaded with stocks of finished goods, carried on their shelves at inflationary prices that simply could not match foreign prices in the competition for market share that intensified as the recession grew worse. That situation called for large cutbacks in the number of employees, in stocks and in capital equipment and the closure of many factories which it will take a great deal more time to replace.

There is little doubt that inflation made much worse what may, anyway, have been an inevitable process as this country moved towards a second industrial revolution with the advent of microchip technology. For a generation or more management had not done nearly enough to secure new markets with new products in order to replace what had been the comfortable captive markets of the old empire and commonwealth and even for a short time, immediately after the war, the virtually captive markets of Europe. Nor had management or successive Governments paid nearly sufficient attention to changing technology.

The roots of the decline go deep but inflation greatly exacerbated an already difficult situation. Therefore, in 1979 there were no soft options left. There are still no soft options. In order to give industry the best chance of recovery, there needed to be a radical reform of the structure of our economy and of our attitudes to work.

During the past six years a great deal has been done. Inflation has been brought down. Public spending is under control. It is at record levels, but it is nevertheless under control. Each year £55 billion is spent upon capital investment, £22 billion of which is investment in the public sector, on top of which another £5 billion is spent upon maintenance. Unnecessary controls have been abolished. There have been tax reforms, national insurance changes, incentives for small companies, privatisation, wider share ownership, legislation that has brought flexibility to the trade union movement and training incentives and moves that will suitably revolutionise our approach to education for the computer age that lies ahead. All of these bold and constructive measures have helped to create the climate without which industrial recovery could not have begun. It has begun and it will continue step by step, provided that the essentials of the present policy are maintained and properly understood by the public.

What else, if anything, can be done to speed up the process of industrial regeneration? I would suggest to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that a number of practical improvements could be made which do not involve a change in strategy and do not call for a greater injection of public money. Rather, they call for a change of approach on the part of those who participate in the industrial scene. I except for the moment the trade union movement, because changes have already taken place there. Changes are required elsewhere as well.

I turn first to the role of big companies. It is not generally recognised that the relationship between big companies and their smaller suppliers is crucial. It is a symbiotic relationship that works well in some instances in this country—for example, at Marks and Spencer and at the Ford motor company, with their various component suppliers. However, it does not work well in all other cases. One finds that it works very well in Japan. If one goes where most foreign visitors do not tread—that is, to the component suppliers of the Japanese automotive industry—one finds a very different scene from that which pertains in the big automotive factories. The small companies work to a very strict regime in which wage scales are much lower. They work to a tight schedule, with deliveries twice a day.

The same sort of pattern applies much more generally in the United States. Those conditions did not apply during the recession at British Leyland. It may be that the then chairman of British Leyland did a great deal to change attitudes among the trade union membership as to the future of that company and to change the public perception of that company. What was not achieved was any improvement in middle management, particularly in buying management. It let down many smaller companies which might otherwise have survived and come through the recession.

While I am dealing with management, it is fair to say that management has taken a terrible beating in the debate about industry during the last few years. However, it should also be recorded that the old style of management, starting with chargehand, foreman and shop manager all the way through to works manager and production director, has been swept away—and rightly so. There is good, young management in its thirties and early forties in British industry, and it should be given a chance. I suggest to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and to other members of the Government that they should go beyond the list of the great and good when they are looking for extra management talent. It is available. I find all too often that hon. Members, as well as those in the City and in the media, tend to be dismissive about management and that those who are dismissive about management have never employed anybody, or made anything, or made any money at all, as was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price). Therefore, British management ought to be given a chance. It ought to be brought alongside officials in Government, not in any dirigiste way, not in any corporatist way and not to replace officials but to inject a practical flavour.

There is plenty of money in the City of London for industry. There is plenty of money for the bigger companies, which can produce a sophisticated case. There is also plenty of money for the smaller companies, but I am not convinced that it always reaches them. The most practical way to reach those companies is through the high street banks. The managers of high street banks have directed a great part of their funds towards shoring up companies which have been in difficulties, and towards looking after individual banking accounts when those individuals have lost their jobs and found themselves financially stretched. Despite some of the advertisements, I believe that the banks are timid about approaching smaller companies, but small beginnings today will make the large companies of tomorrow. It is not the chap who walks into the City with a pat argument who will be successful but the chap who goes to see his bank manager in the black country and says, "All I want to do is to buy a piece of second hand machinery, carry out a finishing operation and pass it on to the next chap down the road."

[Mr. Charles Wardle]

There is a prevailing portfolio approach to investment. It is an asset cover and balance sheet approach. It has got little to do with competitive advantage and the dynamics of industry which the Americans, the Japanese, the Germans and even the Swiss demonstrate so effectively.

Finally, research and development will remain crucial. We have an excellent record. The Government have ensured a fourfold increase in research and development investment, but the gap is still huge. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will keep this in mind. It is a gap that must be bridged. These are practical aspects within the framework of existing policy which will do much to regenerate British industry and allow small beginnings to grow extensively.

8.9 pm

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): I owe you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the House an apology for not being in the Chamber throughout the debate. The reason is that today I received word that 1,200 jobs are to be lost in the British Rail Engineering Limited workshops, the only major employer left in my constituency. During the next two years the work force is to be reduced to about 460 personnel, both salaried and wage staff. It is a blow for any hon. Member to receive such news. It is harsh in any community which has suffered a great deal from redundancies, because there have been several closures in my constituency since the turn of the year. Many of the closures and redundancies are due to changing technology.

Productivity at White Horse Distillers Ltd., the whisky company in my constituency, has increased. Industrial relations were second to none and sales were on the increase, but the company was able to obtain a grant of £8 million from the EEC and it built a massive plant on the other side of Glasgow. It was then able to produce White Horse whisky there. Only a few of the jobs in the old plant were transferred to the new one.

It is difficult to accept that taxpayers' money—that is what EEC grants are—is being handed to companies to enable them to throw people aside like rusty nails. Those people were loyal to the company for many years. Some of them have worked in the company since they were boys and girls of 14 years of age. They are now being thrown on the scrap heap, not because there are no orders but because the Government are handing out money for new plants. They are putting money into multinationals without giving any thought to the social consequences.

To return to BREL, 30 years ago my constituency was famous throughout the world for its railway engineering facilities. In its heyday, Springburn had about 10,000 skilled people employed in railway engineering. Within the next two years there could be as few as 460. I fear the worst, because 460 people cannot sustain an engineering facility. If British Rail invests in new engines—I do not dispute that it should—those new engines will not need the same maintenance and repairs as the old ones. The Government cannot then bury their head in the sand and say, "That is it. The facility will have to close. We shall not put anything else in its place."

This Government, like any other, when they go to the electorate always promise jobs. Why do they start to make excuses when they get into office with the majority that they want? They are well aware of the social consequences of unemployment in a constituency such as mine. In a country as small as the United Kingdom one can get into a car in London and reach any part of the country within 24 hours. There is therefore no excuse for saying that the areas with the old industries cannot have new industries. If we can create new towns and enterprise zones in areas which only a few years previously were virgin sites, we can replace the industries which are in decline in the old communities.

If the Government forget about those old communities, they will have the problems which exist in Springburn and most urban areas—crime, drug addiction, vandalism and despair. The Tory party—the law and order party—keeps telling us that it will reduce crime. One of the ways in which it can do that is by giving young people hope for the future.

The main problem of the police in my community is vandalism. We can reduce vandalism by giving young people a worthwhile job which keeps them off the streets because they have to get out of bed early in the morning.

I have often heard the Minister say what a great thing YTS is. If our industries are declining and our young people cannot obtain work in the traditional industries and have to move away from the communities in which they were brought up, the least we can do for them is to give them a skill that they can take to another part of the country or abroad.

The building industry has three-year apprenticeships. There are four-year apprenticeships in the engineering industry. If the Government are serious about training, why do they not have YTS schemes that last for three years where an employer can take a boy or girl and give them a proper training? They would then at least have a skill.

When I was a young apprentice, a boy was sacked when he reached the age of 21 in some shipyards in Glasgow. That was not good, but at least the boy had a skill. That is all he was asking for. He had something that he could take to another part of the world. The Government are throwing away a golden opportunity by failing to examine our training schemes and by not allowing the good employers—there are many of them—to take on young people to give them the skills that they need.

Like many other hon. Members, I often go to seminars on information technology. I hear all the talk about floppy discs, megabytes and all the other jargon. In the Tea Room all Members can talk about is their computers and word processors. They are of no use to a company unless it has orders on its books. A company which employs one man and a dog does not need a computer to work out its wages bill, to order its material or to keep stock. All the fancy technology is useless unless we can obtain orders and have the industrial base that can use the technology. The only way that we can do that is by protecting our heavy industries.

The Minister should hang his head in shame, because we are frittering away our opportunities in the North sea. He knows as well as anyone that in the British sector of the North sea the ratio is about eight Scandinavian supply vessels to two British. It is the opposite in the Norwegian sector. The Norwegians look after their own. We do not protect our contractors, even in the North sea. There are small companies in my constituency employing 10 or 12 people which work for the North sea. I am told that when they get——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Member must conclude his speech.

Mr. Martin: Certainly, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

It is time that the Government did something to help the community and the work force in companies such as BREL in Springburn.

8.20 pm

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): I hope that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) will forgive me if I do not deal with the subjects to which he referred. There are a few points on which I shall concentrate in the short time available to me.

It is worth reflecting that prosperity and wealth are largely created by what people do, be they managers, entrepreneurs, trade unionists or workers. While the Government can and should help, their job is to create an environment in which business can flourish. Unfortunately, there are many cultural and historical reasons why we do not seem to be a productive and businesslike country. There is much evidence to show that that is changing, but it will take time to do so and, in the meantime, the job of the Government is to encourage change and, as I say, create an environment in which business can flourish.

The Government have had some success in doing that, but we have some serious fundamental problems, some of which have received attention in today's debate. For example, our share of world trade continues to decline, to a level which is now very disturbing indeed. The deficit which has developed in manufacturing trade should worry us greatly. All of that has combined in a pattern of relative decline, where the British economy has consistently grown at a rate less than the growth rate experienced by most OECD countries. Whereas in 1970 our GDP per head was about 7 per cent. above the OECD average, it is now about 10 per cent. below. That is what relative decline means, but at some point there must be a serious danger of it turning into absolute decline.

Those problems of world trade and a deficit in manufactured goods are associated with manufacturing industry. It is obvious that many jobs may come in the services sector of the economy, but we need a strong manufacturing sector, because our economy cannot survive on services alone. They may provide the jobs, but they will not provide all the wealth.

Much of the expansion that has taken place in service sector employment in the last 20 years has occurred in public services. That is unlikely to be repeated. In any event, the service industries need something to service. They need a domestic manufacturing industry to service, because there is not enough for them to do simply servicing imports or tourism. They need a domestic manufacturing base. That is illustrated by the fact that in the south-east of England both manufacturing and service industries have been successful in recent years. The service industries in that area have been successful because they have had relatively successful manufacturing industries to give them work.

Above all, we need manufactured exports to take the place of oil when it runs out. What shall we use to pay for manufactured imports when we no longer have exports of oil? I think, therefore, that our future lies in having a high wage, high productivity, manufacturing economy, producing and exporting sophisticated goods and services. I shall suggest two areas in which Government policy can be not only influential but important in promoting the success of British manufacturing industry.

One is in the area of competitiveness in industrial costs. A substantial element of industrial costs is wages. Therefore, the need to keep wage rises in line with increased productivity is extremely important. The real wage argument does not demand that people's real wages should come down but that the increases in those real wages should reflect the increases in productivity that are taking place.

A substantial non-wage cost of employment is national insurance contributions paid by employers. I should have thought that there was an overwhelming case for reducing those across the board, or on a selective basis if the cost of doing so across the board was considered too high. Perhaps it could be concentrated on manufacturing.

One of the biggest cost barriers facing industry today is high interest rates. Those are largely caused by the United States deficit, although they are to some extent caused by the enormous expansion that has taken place in personal borrowing in the United Kingdom. One cannot help wondering whether we can continue a situation in which the interest rates that must be paid by British manufacturing industry are caused by two factors such as those. We should examine whether we can have some control over those factors.

The area of Government involvement in helping manufacturing industry in Britain is in the sphere of trade policy. While I am basically a free trader — if not something of a fair weather free trader — I accept that we do not live in much of a free trade world. All of the trade of the Eastern bloc and the Third world, and most of the trade of the middle eastern countries and Latin America, is managed and conducted, if not by their Governments, by Government agencies.

We also have trade practices by some of our major OECD trading partners — such as Japan, the US and France — which are far from fair in terms of free trade. Thus, the British Government must be involved, too. We need a partnership between the Government and industry to ensure that British industry beats the foreign competition. Nowhere is the role of Government in that connection more important than in trade policy.

One area in which we could be more active is in trying to reduce non-tariff barriers in the EEC. The fact that, 30 years after the Common Market came into existence, 27 forms are still needed for a lorry to go from Holland to Italy illustrates the point.

From our point of view, what may be more important are the national restrictions that are placed on the expansion of certain industries in which we happen to be particularly good, such as banking, insurance and airlines. The expansion of those into Europe is seriously restricted by national institutions. I should have thought that our net contribution to the common agricultural policy would be a small price to pay for the freedom of those successful industries to expand in the EEC.

The unfair trade practices from which we suffer are also practised by OECD countries. Many instances have been given concerning France, and we have an extraordinary arrangement with Spain under which it can export cars to this country through a 4 per cent. tariff barrier, whereas British cars exported to Spain go through a tariff barrier of about 60 per cent.

[Mr. John Maples]

The real offenders in this scenario are the Japanese. We heard at the Bonn summit of yet another warning being given—a reading of the Riot Act—to the Japanese. I hope that it was not a ritual warning and that we shall be assured that on this occasion we told the Japanese that we mean to stop putting up with their nonsense. It is absolutely unacceptable that we should continue to have manufacturing industries in this country destroyed by their managed trade practices in circumstances in which we cannot do the same to them and their national regulations prevent us from exporting to them.

An area which I should think is ripe for action is the current expansion in the City involving Japanese banks and security companies. It is well within our power and that of the Department of Trade and Industry and the Bank of England to put a stop to that quickly. That should be an extremely soft point at which to exercise leverage on the Japanese. We cannot continue to play fair in a trading world in which everyone else cheats.

Services are undoubtedly vital to the country, to our standard of living and to our future employment, but they are not enough. We also need a strong manufacturing sector, and in today's world that means Government involvement in industry, but particularly in trade. Without that, we shall not have a high paid, high productivity economy, which is the only way forward to give us the standards of living and public services that we want.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I must at the outset apologise for my absence from the Chamber earlier in the debate. Hon. Members will agree that my absence was out of character. It was brought about by circumstances beyond my control.

I agreed with the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) when he said that the economy needed a strong manufacturing sector and a thriving services sector. We must acknowledge that manufacturing in Britain has been in decline for some decades, and nowhere has that been more clearly experienced than in Scotland.

Scotland was pre-eminent for generations in shipbuilding, marine and heavy engineering, coal mining and textiles. Indeed, the textile industry was, and still is to some extent, a major employer. Everywhere there has been decline, and I concede that, because that decline has been taking place for three or four decades, it cannot be said to have started in May 1979. The picture is complicated, and mitigated to some extent, by the growth in Scotland of the information technology industry, by growth in the services industry and by the development of the offshore oil and gas industries.

Nowhere are the opposing tendencies of growth and decline more clearly seen than in my constituency. The traditional industries of shipbuilding, ship repairing and marine engineering have been in decline for a considerable time. Similarly, the cane sugar refining industry has experienced such a dismal decline that there is now only one refinery. On the bright side, however, there is the continued expansion of IBM—a company mentioned earlier in less complimentary vein by the Liberal spokesman, the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). National Semiconductor is also in my constituency and information technology is now the biggest employer in a traditional shipbuilding and marine engineering area.

The recent announcement of some 600 redundancies by Scott Lithgow was a further dismal blow to the Greenock travel-to-work area, which has a scandalous 24 per cent. male unemployment. The Secretary of State and I have exchanged comments about Scott Lithgow on previous occasions. I fervently hope that in the very near future Scott Lithgow will win Ministry of Defence and offshore orders. I am certainly not begging for orders or pleading for social security for the company. I believe that Scott Lithgow can win orders in both areas on merit. I certainly hope to see it building conventional patrol submarines next year.

The offshore oil and gas industry has saved Scotland from almost complete economic devastation, providing scores of thousands of jobs both directly and indirectly. Even there, however, mistakes have been made both by industrial organisations and by the Government. The chairman and managing director of one of our most successful companies in this type of activity, Mr. Ian Wood, recently said:

"There is a strong belief in the United Kingdom fostered by both this and the previous Government that UK industry has done well in the development of North Sea oil. I personally believe that this is a dangerous myth.

Far too many of the successful North Sea performers are the incoming international companies who simply operate a local UK base to cater for North Sea oil. They are not building up genuine UK technology and know-how to be supplied in further expansion overseas."

Mr. Wood, one of the most successful Scottish business men in the offshore industry, went on to say:

"Any present realistic assessment of the number of UK companies who have the know-how, technology and manufacturing skills to expand into the offshore industry worldwide would provide a pitifully small number nowhere near the level of presence and influence that should have been achieved from our privileged frontier starting position."

There are thus two main areas of policy objectives for the Government in the offshore oil and gas industries—the expansion of Scottish and United Kingdom involvement in the North sea and assistance for United Kingdom companies to compete more successfully in the international offshore market.

A further complication, to which I alluded in my opening comments, is the shift from manufacturing to service industries. No economy can grow simply on an expanding service sector when manufacturing industry is in decline. Both sectors are important. Manufacturing industry must be revitalised, which will lead to continued growth in the service sector. What is needed is home-led demand for the manufacturing industries and more direct Government influence on investment. That requires the development of economic and industrial policies which have as their object a successful manufacturing industry.

8.35 pm

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): I do not agree with every aspect of Government policy on high technology, but the Government are rarely given sufficient credit for their achievements in the past few years—the great success of the micros in schools programme, the aid for innovation, the expansion of training, and initiatives such as Itech. High technology training cannot be geared up overnight. First, we must have qualified trainers, of which there was a desperate shortage. The Department of Trade and Industry has helped selected companies. The Alvey programme in the United Kingdom and the Esprit programme in Europe are not perfect, and almost every pundit in the industry thinks that he or she could run them better. Nevertheless, a huge amount of taxpayers' money and Government effort has gone into high technology.

Much of the greatly over-publicised gloom and doom about our information technology industry is unjustified. The recent NEDO report referred to huge deficits but entirely ignored microchips, of which this country is now Europe's largest producer. The report also failed to acknowledge that many imported components, which appear in the trade figures as part of the balance of payments deficit on our high-tech trading account, are incorporated in electromechanical equipment such as machine tools and re-exported but do not reappear on the positive side of the high-tech trading account because those exports come into another sector. The much-quoted high-tech deficit is thus somewhat misleading.

Recent figures have been relatively encouraging. In 1981 our deficit in the information technology sector was £1 billion. By 1983 it had risen to £2 billion, but preliminary figures for 1984 suggest that it has stabilised at that level. Indeed, 1984 production figures for the electronic and electrical engineering sectors show an increase of 12 per cent., data processing products an increase of 39 per cent. and components production an increase of 21 per cent.

This country is not alone in having a high-tech trade deficit. The United States, supposedly a high-tech high flier, had a $6·8 billion deficit in information technology products last year. Europe has not done much better. France had a £750 million deficit last year on computers alone. It is not surprising that many western countries are running larger deficits in the information technology sector because this is the main growth sector in most western economies.

Having expressed my support for what the Government have done so far, I believe that in some areas they may change their emphasis and do a little better. All too often, inward investment strategy is not sufficiently selective and we rush headlong to create jobs in problem areas, often supporting the entry of overseas companies into our markets to compete against British firms.

Recently, Micro-Image Technology, in my constituency, which is a company owned by Laporte and has developed a good market in specialist chemicals for the microchip industry, and invested heavily in a non-development area to expand into reprocessing of scrap silicon wafers. No sooner had the company announced its investment plans than it heard that the Department of Trade and Industry was about to subsidise two American rivals to come to Scotland to compete against the company on its home market. That is somewhat ludicrous.

As international divisions of labour intensify and as it becomes difficult for any one country to have national champions for every product area, we should be trying to concentrate on areas where we can excel. Where we can excel we should not subsidise foreign competition, allowing it to come to this country. Where we cannot excel, it is to our benefit to import products as cheaply as possible—possibly incorporating them in products that are re-exported—or to encourage foreign firms to set up assembly operations in Britain.

To date, there has not been a clear direction of this sort in Department of Trade and Industry policy. We could excel in home and business computers, custom chips, some types of equipment for telecoms and certain components and software. We are unlikely to excel, because of the nature of our industry, in mainframes, commodity RAM chips, most areas of consumer electronics, computer printers, photo-copiers and typewriters.

Another problem affecting the industry is the issue of reciprocal access to overseas markets. Since the 1981 and 1984 Telecommunications Acts, our market has largely been opened to imports of foreign telecommunications equipment. Most of us agree that free trade is an excellent policy—but only if everyone follows it. Our policy has been a high risk one of opening our market, while no country, apart from the United States, has opened its market in return.

I could cite many examples, but I shall refer only to the key telephone systems sector. The overseas suppliers comprise two Ericsson systems from Sweden, NEC from Japan, AIOP from France, Panasonic from Japan, the Blick Alcatel system from France, Siemens from West Germany, DTWE from West Germany, TIE from the United States, Nitsuko from Japan and MITEL from a United States plant. The only British manufacturers in that market are Philips, GEC and Plessey, which assembles the Nitsuko system. All the cellular radio equipment on the market comes from Sweden and the United States. British Telecom recently agreed to buy Ericsson digital exchanges and Mercury is buying Northern Telecom exchanges from Canada.

The result is that in the year to February 1985, we imported £36·2 million worth of telecom equipment from Japan and £22·9 million worth from Sweden. In return, we sent just £400,000 worth to Japan and £4·1 million to Sweden—hardly "free trade" in the true sense of the term.

The answer to the problem is not nationalisation or the ludicrous dirigiste policies proposed by the Opposition. Those policies have been discredited and have failed in France. In 1982, the Socialist-Communist Government in France produced the grand plan filière électronrique aimed at creating 200,000 new jobs and a £2·75 billion trade surplus for the French IT industry. Instead, the nationalised electronics companies in France have notched up vast losses, the French deficit in IT products has increased by leaps and bounds and employment has decreased.

Grandiose schemes dreamt up by politicians and bureaucrats are not the answer. We need only look at our example of Nexos, which was dreamt up by the last Labour Government as a United Kingdom rival to IBM. In its three years of operation, it succeeded only in importing Japanese facsimile machines at way above cost through a middle man. When it went bust in 1982, £2 million worth of its facsimile machines were sold back to the same middle man for just £1. Through National Enterprise Board policies of giving cost-plus contracts to other NEB companies, Nexos ended up losing a total of £36 million of taxpayers' money — so much for grandiose schemes dreamt up by politicians and bureaucrats totally out of touch with reality, but with a hand deep in the taxpayers' pocket.

I often feel that politicians are arrogant in thinking that they succeed in creating jobs by waving a magic wand when experienced business men cannot. I especially feel that many Opposition Members are arrogant when they have no business experience, having been full-time politicians, academics or journalists.

[Mr. Phillip Oppenheim]

At the end of the day, the best way of helping high-tech industries — [Interruption.] Mr. Deputy Speaker, I believe that an Opposition Member wishes to intervene.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The debate will not continue for much longer. The hon. Member should draw his remarks to a close.

Mr. Oppenheim: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker. At the end of the day, the best way of helping high technology is by creating a strong and flourishing economy through lowering inflation, through incentives and by encouraging venture capital. We have some way to go——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. Member's time has expired.

8.46 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): I hope that I shall not keep the House long, but I wish to concentrate on education and training for the new technologies. I have heard many Conservative Members talk about improvements and the light at the end of the tunnel. I find that difficult to believe, as a Member from the west Yorkshire area and having heard only yesterday the chilling news that another large, modern factory would close in the Brighouse area. That is not in my constituency, but I have a constituency interest in it because many of my constituents work in that factory. I heard that 550 jobs have been lost at the factory of Philips, an important manufacturer of washing machines and tumble dryers. I understand that that factory will be closed because it would have been more difficult for the company to close its Italian factory. What will the Secretary of State do about that? Will he intervene to save those 550 jobs? Will he ensure that the Government make an effort, not with grandiose schemes but by encouraging Philips to stay in this country and produce appliances using high technology?

The motion refers to investment, research and development and education and training. Sadly, on all three counts, this country is in a parlous position. The more I look at the research and development failure of our industry, the more I see that this is paralleled by our failure to train and educate people in high technology.

If we are to have a proper training policy for high technology or, for that matter, any kind of technology, it is about time the Government took a lead, recognised their mistakes and returned to a system of industrial training boards — perhaps a modified system — and either a training tax or a training levy to ensure that training is provided. The Government should step in and provide training for the future if industry cannot afford to do so.

During this debate we have talked a little more sensibly than we did during the days of one of the predecessors of the present Secretary of State when we were sharply divided between the need for sunrise and sunset industries. Most of us have known that all industries are a mixture of both. The older, more established industries—such as the textiles and engineering industries in west Yorkshire —depend for their future and their order books, both at home and abroad, on investment in the latest technology. Some companies have done that, but some companies need help and incentives from the Government. Often, firms that are not in the industrial development regions lose out to foreign competitors and competitors in the industrial development regions.

I wish to concentrate on the infrastructure of training, which seems to be disappearing. The infrastructure of education and training for our engineering and textile industries is reaching such a low point that one cannot find departments in the polytechnics or technical colleges that sufficiently support local industry.

The report of the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology, which was published only at the end of last year, points out the real deficiencies in education and training for the new technologies. The first paragraph of the summary of conclusions and recommendations says that

> "Technological progress in the UK is being hampered by failure to develop its human resources. The UK's competitive edge in international trade is at stake. There is no more serious challenge than the adequate provision of people properly qualified and trained to exploit new technologies as they emerge."

As the report so starkly points out, the situation that we face today is one in which our polytechnics and universities have been run down and, even more important, the morale of the people responsible for education and training in our polytechnics and universities has been reduced to an all-time low. If the Government are to do anything about the problem, they must first put money into the polytechnics and universities, so that there can be an expansion programme instead of a decline. The people who man the polytechnics and universities must be told that the Government believe in them, and that they want to give them a future and to pay them a proper rate for the job.

8.51 pm

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): I commend to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) for bedtime reading the report by the Institute of Manpower Studies on conflicts and competition, in which he would find that the British Government spend proportionately as much on training as our competitors, West Germany, Japan and the United States. The difficulty is that we need to get British industry to spend more money on training.

To ensure a truly caring society it is necessary for us as a community to create sufficient wealth. Indeed, it was the shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who, very pertinently, once said:

> "We must persuade people that job creation is the key to creating jobs in the caring industries like the hospitals. Socialists must interest themselves more in the creation of wealth and not just in the redistribution of wealth."

To create wealth we need to have a competitive trade policy, and there are three points on an agenda for action to which the Government need to address themselves. First, they must try to achieve some stability in the exchange rates. At one moment the pound is riding high; at the next it seems to be heading for a fall. Uncertainty and confusion are a nightmare for exporters. One of the most destructive aspects of high inflation rates is that it is very difficult for industrialists and business men to predict the future. A similar situation arises when there are wildly fluctuating exchange rates. Therefore, there is a desperate need for stability in exchange rates.

I urge the Government to give serious consideration to the need for us to work much more closely together in the European Community. That means the United Kingdom joining the European monetary system so that Europe as a community can begin to acquire a more powerful and co-ordinated voice in the world economy once more.

The second point on an agenda for action is related to the first one. There is a need to keep on bludgeoning Japan into the realisation that Japan, more than any other country, is dependent on there being free trade in the world. It is nonsense if a sweet manufacturer cannot export sweets to Japan without the Japanese complaining about the colour of the sweets, or if it takes eight days to import goods into Japan—one to clear customs and the other seven to clear document control.

It is not only Japan that is involved. If countries such as the United States start to take retaliatory action against Japan, there will be a danger of Japanese automotive, mechanical and telecommunications goods being dumped in Britain. The world international community as a whole must keep on making it clear to the Japanese that their behaviour and their actions are wholly and completely unacceptable, and that in addition they actually endanger Japan's long-term prosperity as much as that of the rest of the free world.

The third point on the agenda for action was eloquently articulated by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples). In looking around the world, we can see many places in which there is free trade. Increasingly, Governments are involving themselves in their industry on a selective basis. I choose one random example from a recent report by Hawker Siddeley, which concluded that British exporters are being gazumped by foreign Governments in the international bidding for big contracts with developing countries. The report concluded that the generosity and flexibility of France, West Germany and Japan, our competitors, in offering soft loans and tied aid in support of their own exporters' tenders helped them to win world contracts.

I am not suggesting for a moment that we should allow ourselves to be sucked into a subsidy quagmire, but there is a clear need—particularly against the background of our recently losing the Bosphorus bridge contract—to consider how Governments can more selectively assess British manufacturers to win the increasingly few high prestige contracts. This is not subsidy but selective partnership between Government and industry. If we can achieve that sort of agenda for action—we can do it if we do not lose our nerve, and if we do not panic and endanger what has already been achieved—we can start to win back for Britain an increasing share of world trade.

In the past few weeks much has been made of the views of the CBI and its attitudes towards Government policy and the broad strategy that the Conservative party is following. I draw to the attention of the House—I do not think that it has had a wide enough press — a statement by Sir Terence Beckett when he spoke to a Committee of the House in the week before last. He said:

"There is profound confusion, in the national debate, between the level of unemployment, attended by the feeling this encourages that our present policies are failing, and the progress that we are actually making with those policies in improving the effectiveness of the economy. Those policies"——

by that he meant our Government's policies—

"represent the best hope we have for the future prosperity of the country, and for dealing with unemployment in the best possible way."

I believe that, providing we can with vigour turn our minds to how we can ensure a competitive trade policy not only here but throughout the rest of the world, and how we can help British industry by stabilising the exchange rate, there is no reason why the boom that we are now witnessing, with our GDP growing this year by 4 per cent., cannot be a continuing boom which will bring back the wealth that we as a society need if we are to be a truly caring society.

8.58 pm

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): The Secretary of State is not, I suspect, someone who wastes a great deal of time reading his speeches in Hansard. But he might at least ensure that those who draft Government amendments read his press releases. The Government congratulate themselves on the recent substantial increase in manufacturing output, but it is only just over half way back to the level that they inherited in 1979. They congratulate themselves on the sharp rise in exports — which, unfortunately, has been exceeded by an even sharper rise in imports. They congratulate themselves on major gains in competitiveness, which has been caused by a fall in the pound that panicked the Chancellor into raising interest rates to exorbitant levels. As to the optimism of the CBI about business, it has not yet recovered to its level of a year ago, before the miners' strike. That is not a pleasant picture of our industrial scene.

The Minister catalogued the measures taken to stimulate research and development in British industry, but admitted that the net effect has resulted in a small fall in real terms—of £2 million from £1,566 million—in intramural research and development in industry between 1978 and 1983. He said that he thought matters would be better in 1984, but he will never know because his Department has run down the statistical service and in 1984 will not collect any returns from industry about research and development.

The right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) rightly stressed the role of manufacturing industry as essential to our economic recovery. As chairman of a great company, he naturally observes the closing stages of negotiations of major bids. He should talk to his technical director. Even if GEC does not need the money to compete with other British firms in research and development, it has always been forward in claiming whatever money is available —quite naturally—and also in complaining that if there is not a lot of money to support research and development it is at a disadvantage compared with its overseas competitors. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will discuss that with his very competent technical director.

The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) stressed the need for a properly designed industrial strategy, but he did not offer us any niches in which we could survive the rigours of this Government's policies. My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) described how his local authority, against all the odds, attracted to his constituency — as much in need of jobs as all our constituencies—the Japanese calculator firm Sharp.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) has seen a loss of jobs in his constituency, although he did not mention that. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) dwelt on that at some length. It concerns the effect of the running down and closure of railway workshops. There is a loss of 1,200 jobs, which can be ill afforded, in Springburn and 400 jobs in Eastleigh.

With the decline of the old, there is an absence of the development of the new. My hon. Friends were right to say that when the Government can see years ahead the effects of technical change, they should provide support for alternative development.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) stressed the need for the right sort of support for the electronics industry, which, unfortunately, it is not getting.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) spoke with knowledge and insight of the need to protect British firms against interference from American suppliers under American law, which is a monstrous intrusion not only on our freedom of trade but on our legal independence.

My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) spoke eloquently of the co-operation between management and workers needed in handling technical change—a co-operation that the Government have sought to whittle away by their attack upon the trade unions. He argued that new technological developments offered new industries that could bring relief to areas of high unemployment, such as his constituency.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) has a unique combination of the old and the new in his constituency. In the care that he exercises over both, we see the kind of work being done by hon. Members on both sides of the House to cushion their constituents against the appalling rigours to which the Government's policies have subjected them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) spoke of the closure of the Philips washing machine plant in his constituency, which was announced today. He made an eloquent plea for the training that is absolutely essential to industrial recovery.

The hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) called for stability of the exchange rate, which I fear he will not find while the Government cling to their medium-term financial strategy, which specifically excludes stabilisation of the exchange rate.

We are concerned with the products that people want to buy in the shops and the showrooms, with the processes by which they are produced and, above all, with the people we need to produce them. The Government's record is catastrophic.

It is symbolic that nationally we are compulsive video viewers. We have been reduced to that — perhaps because the Government have left us so little to do—but we have not the wit to make video players for ourselves.

In 1979, we had a surplus of £2·7 billion in the balance of trade in manufactured goods. In 1985, that had turned into a deficit of £3·8 billion. The shift, some £6·5 billion, represents 13 per cent. of our imports in 1984. The decline in trade performance, measured by exports as a percentage of imports, has spread across the board.

I commend the Secretary of State to read another of his own releases, the publication "United Kingdom trade with European countries", which states:

"Crude balances can give a misleading indication of relative trading performance over time so we also give the ratio of exports to imports."

In motor vehicles, electrical and electronic and data processing equipment, exports, already only 91 per cent. of imports in 1979, had fallen to 71 per cent. of imports by 1984. Even in the strongest class of goods, chemicals, exports fell from 132 per cent. of imports in 1979 to 126 per cent. in 1984.

What is alarming is that there is a tendency for the fastest growing industries to suffer the greatest decline in their trade position. Two industries in which I have a constituency interest, steel and mining machinery, illustrate the point. In steel, despite all its difficulties, the ratio of exports to imports has increased from 106 per cent. in 1979 to 138 per cent. in 1984. Mining machinery has the unique distinction of maintaining the ratio of exports to imports at just over 700 per cent. with scarcely any imports able to compete against the thoroughly efficient firms of Anderson, Strathclyde in my constituency and Dowty. Pharmaceuticals, a growth industry, fell from 242 per cent. to 204 per cent. in the ratio of exports to imports, and active electronic components, which includes micro circuits, fell from 106 per cent. to 70 per cent.

If one reads through some of the industries in which the improvement in the ratio has been more than 10 per cent. and contrasts those with the industries in which the deterioration has been more than 10 per cent., one observes the pattern. The improvement has come in the extraction of minerals, the steel industry, leather and leather goods, food, drink and tobacco and non-ferrous metals—not exactly the most buoyant growth industries of today. The deterioration in the trade balance has come in electronic data, man-made fibres, pharmaceutical products, timber and wooden furniture, industrial electrical equipment, non-metallic minerals, instrument engineering, rubber and plastics, motor vehicles and parts, food, chemical machinery and active electronic components. It is a devastating picture.

With the increase in exports and imports of manufactures up to 1979, British industry is now highly integrated with that of other industrial countries particularly in the European Community. The flows of exports and imports are now about equal to the value added in manufacturing industry and to home consumption of manufactured goods. In other words, trade is not peripheral. Trade is as large as home production and as large as home consumption. The export market is as important as the home market. As a source of supply of goods, imports are as important as home production, so shifts in trade have a major impact on home production. The same integration that exists over the economy as a whole is also to be found in individual firms, with few major establishments today able to survive without their overseas suppliers and customers.

The 13 per cent. widening in the manufactures trade gap has been reflected in a 14 per cent. fall in manufacturing output between 1979 and 1981 with manufacturing output now still 6·8 per cent. below the 1979 peak.

If the oil wealth were used to modernise and re-equip British industry, it would be reasonable to expect a surge of investment and a flood of imported machinery, but investment in manufacturing dropped by a disastrous 35 per cent. between 1979 and 1982, and in 1984 it was still 25 per cent. below the 1979 level.

Not only has investment fallen below the replacement level needed to maintain capacity, but a fall of 14 per cent. in manufacturing output between 1979 and 1981 has knocked out swathes of existing manufacturing capacity in all our constituencies. Nothing like that has happened before in Britain since the war; nor has it happened in the past 10 years in any other industrial country.

We must consider price and technical competitiveness together. We cannot create an overall competitive industry by a shift in the exchange rate, but we can quickly destroy it. The Government destroyed overall competitiveness and industry itself in a massive way between 1979 and 1981. Industry will take many years to recover from that destruction.

To the Chancellor none of this matters. To him manufacturing industry is a bore. He sees Britain's future as a jumbo-sized tax haven—another Channel island. When the second oil price increase knocked out the Channel islands' tomato-growing industry, the young people flocked to the tax-dodging Channel island banks which were growing explosively. The Chancellor seems to think that that can happen in Britain—in Barnsley, Greenock and Port Glasgow — with the growth in services making good the decline in manufacturing.

The Chancellor does not care about jobs. But look at the balance of payments. As one right hon. Member argued recently,

"manufacturing industry provides about 25 per cent. of our GDP and 25 per cent. of our jobs. It also provides 75 per cent. of our visible trade exports. If we were to replace the contribution by manufacturing industry to the balance of payments we would need to increase our exports of services by between £60 billion and £70 billion a year. To do that we should have to increase our share of world exports of services dramatically from under 10 per cent. today to over 50 per cent. That is really a wholly impossible task at the moment. So without manufacturing industry Britain would not survive."

That was not one of my right hon. Friends; that was the right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), the Minister for Local Government, from his previous perch as Minister for Information Technology, in evidence to the Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology. Britain cannot hope to increase its share of world trade in services fast enough to earn the foreign exchange needed to bring Britain's millions back into employment.

The Thatcherite solution is to cut Britain's overheads, by cutting social security and the real wages of workers. By these means they hope to price Britain back into work as a low-wage, low tech, low growth, low skilled economy.

Mr. Randall: The Hong Kong of the west.

Dr. Bray: That is not the nature of Hong Kong—which is the place where I was born—and it would never tolerate this Government's policies.

Thatcherite Britain is condemned to a tightening vortex of high interest rates, high interest costs, low investment, low technology, low skills, low growth, high cost, deteriorating trade, a falling pound and still higher interest rates—all with the pretext of reducing inflation which obstinately bounces along among the upper rates of inflation in industrial countries. Meanwhile, such strength as this country has left in higher education, scientific research and democratic government is being recklessly whittled away.

The industrial decline of Britain has been lamented lovingly ever since the Paris exhibition of 1867, when a Britain then producing one third of the world's manufactures was prominent in scarcely a dozen out of 90 classes of manufactures exhibited. Under this Government, that long, agonising, drawn-out decline has become a near terminal collapse. What we need now is emergency resuscitation followed by policies to reverse the long-term decline.

The three engines of growth on the supply side of a serious industrial policy are education and training, investment and research and development. The Government have neglected all three. In the earlier stages of recovery, there has to be a major increase in research and development effort on specific products and processes in manufacturing industry. That is needed to ensure that our products are in demand and up to date, that our training is in relevant skills and that investment is in competitive plants and processes, not in the obsolete plant of yesteryear.

Research and development expenditure in manufacturing industry is about £4 billion a year. There has been no increase since 1978. In no industry has it kept Britain's trade performance in balance with the competition. It is unevenly distributed. Research and development expenditure in the three research-intensive industries — chemicals, the electrical and electronics industry, and aerospace — is about £2,500 per worker per annum. Much of the research and development in electronics and aerospace is for defence purposes, paid for by the Government and lacking civil application. Research and development expenditure in the rest of the manufacturing industry, with 80 per cent. of total manufacturing employment, is, compared with the £2,500 per worker in the research-intensive sector, £250 per worker. Thus there are two sectors—the research-intensive sector and the low research sector.

In aerospace, with a strong element of defence support, research and development expenditure is £4,700 per employee, and much of it is on development. In Imperial Chemical Industries, with the longest and strongest tradition of civil research and development, expenditure is £3,400 per worker per year. Motor vehicles have come up well. They are in an intermediate position, pulling up with £840 per worker. The British Steel Corporation, after the MacGregor cuts, is now down to £220 per employee. BSC is rapidly becoming a technological vassal of Japan. Textiles and paper, printing and publishing—mostly our beloved newspapers—are spending as little as £40 per worker per year. In footwear and clothing, expenditure is £17 per employee.

Mr. Baldry: Would not greater progress be made in the newspapers if the unions were more co-operative about introducing new technology? Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can have a word with Sogat.

Dr. Bray: There is some justice in what the hon. Gentleman says. However, it is a chicken and egg argument. Had there been proper consultation with workers when the technological revolution in printing began, there would be a different picture today.

With the imbalance that we have in research intensity between the two sectors of the economy, if any increase in research and development expenditure were concentrated on the research-intensive sector, the great mass of manufacturing industry would rapidly become less competitive. If, on the other hand, the research-intensive sector were denied further support, it would continue to fall victim to foreign competition, and we would lose possibly the most effective research and development in terms of potential gross domestic product per pound of additional research and development expenditure. An optimum distribution of support would lie somewhere in between.

The only principles guiding the Government's policies are that the market will provide, and that, where it does not, expenditure must be cut. The trouble is that there is no inherent competitive incentive in a market economy to public or private commercial organisations to undertake pre-competitive research, and the Government are starving such research of resources. Basic science and pre-competitive applied research, including research in enabling technologies and in public concerns such as health, safety and the environment, must be financed by the Government.

Sometimes pre-competitive research may be essential to the survival of an industry, but, because the benefits of the research cannot be used to strengthen one firm against its competitors, firms may not undertake that research on their own. That may be one factor lying behind the collapse of shipbuilding in this country.

Competitive research and development aimed at specific products and processes may also be neglected by firms if they have suffered from low profits and have had to concentrate simply on maintaining cash flow, if they have no confidence that profitable times will continue for long enough to enable them to reap the benefits of research, or if they always have to pitch their profit and loss accounts at maintaining a higher share price in order to frighten off the big bad takeover wolf.

All those conditions have applied in recent years and they have reached a new intensity under the present Government. United Kingdom research and development, and its fruits in manufacturing competitiveness as reflected in trade statistics, are now rapidly falling behind other industrial countries. We need to pull up rapidly and to pull ahead in research and development to make good the oil revenues that will now decline. The position is moving so fast that international comparisons at a point in time are no longer an appropriate guide to action.

Faced with the need for research and development, the inadequacies of the Government's actions make one weep. In the past, Britain has been pre-eminent in basic science, which is the necessary foundation for a healthy, advanced industrial economy, as Japan is discovering. Today, at a time of seminal growth in many branches of science, the Government's advisory board on the research councils has told the Government that their present plans will lead to a decline of 25 per cent. in the basic science budget over the next 10 years.

Already, whether measured by Nobel prizes, citations in the science journals, registration of patents or just common observation at any international scientific conference, Britain is falling behind in basic science. In the initial surge of research and development needed in manufacturing industry, the emphasis must be on fairly short-term developments and on updating products and processes. The aim should be for industry effectively to review and, where necessary, to develop and design anew all the products and processes of United Kingdom manufacturing industry.

We should not be too highfalutin about what constitutes development. The OECD Frascati definitions strike the right note in distinguishing research and development from investment and other activities by the element of novelty or innovation. What may be development in one industry may be standard practice in another. Thus, the use of computer-aided design and manfucturing systems may be standard practice in aerospace, but its introduction would be development in most general engineering.

An early step must be technological reconnaissance internationally. The purchasing and testing of competitors' products and their licensing, improvement and redesign must be seen as development and supported as such. But what do the Government do? They cut the staff of the Department of Trade and Industry engaged on such work, and make no provision for its takeover by industry. Today, a medium-sized industrial economy cannot hope to develop all its own technology. Most of it will come from abroad, embodied in plant or transferred by licensing. Likewise, modern industry cannot keep up, and will not understand, unless it has sufficient of its own technology that is fully competitive in world markets. That is why Government support for research and development in manufacturing industry is essential.

The point is often made that research and development and technological advance generally are restricted by inadequate supplies of qualified technologists and scientists. That is true. But it need not prevent an initial surge in R and D to prime the pump for more effective deployment and training of qualified manpower. Today 80,000 scientists and engineers are engaged in research and development in manufacturing industry. There are 500,000 economically active scientists and engineers with the equivalent of first degree or higher qualifications working elsewhere.

In 1982, just before the Government cuts in higher education which have not been made good by the recent restoration in engineering, 35,000 technologists, engineers and scientists obtained first degrees. Therefore, there is room for a substantial, early and major increase in research and development at the sharper end of the development of manufacturing industry. But research and development alone will not restore competitiveness. There must be investment and training as well, with proper planning within the enterprise.

My right hon. and hon. Friends rightly stress the need for national planning. The need for planning within the enterprise is equally important. Indeed, the right hon. Member for Waveney will have great fun listening to the views of the lower levels of management in GEC in relation to planning, and constrasting those with the views of his managing director. A marked change is today taking place in industry, because many of our young scientists and engineers who have graduated in the lifetime of this Government have seen no future in technology and have gone into training as accountants. Therefore, a thoroughly modern point of view is available about the methods and systems that we waffle on about in this House when applied to other people, but are so reluctant to apply to our own affairs, as are the senior managers with whom we talk who are responsible for the conduct of business as a whole.

My right hon. and hon. Friends have put forward practical proposals to make the long-term funds available for investment and to create the levels of education and training that are needed. Where are the Government's plans? They have none to measure up to the task which faces the nation.

Where will the money and jobs come from? We are talking about research and development, investment and training — the basic wealth-creating resources of the country. We are talking about a payback from fairly short-term development and technology transfer which is certainly available within five years. Research and longer term development will need longer horizons, but only one tenth of the expenditure. Therefore, there should be no difficulty nationally in funding research and development.

For investment in manufacturing industry, the proposals of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) for the repatriation of overseas portfolio investment will encourage manufacturing industry to make good use of the funds which will become available—and money is much better spent on training than on having to pay unemployment benefit.

Finally and most important, what of the jobs? If we succeed in our objectives of restoring and maintaining the technical and price competitiveness of manufacturing industry, there is no reason why, over the first five years, employment in manufacturing industry should not increase. There is no limit if we are fully competitive in world markets. We can increase our share of home and export markets.

However, there is a long-term shift away from employment in manufacturing, just as there has been in agriculture for many years. Provided we maintain that competitiveness, so that there is no balance of payments constraint on the expansion of public and private services and construction, there are ample demands and needs there to absorb the one in six of our people who are denied jobs as a result of the Government's policies. True, we cannot eat our cake before we have baked it. The first priority must be to get manufacturing back on its feet, once again creating the wealth that this Government have squandered with such profligacy.

9.29 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Norman Tebbit): I owe the House an explanation for my absence at the beginning of the debate. Some months ago I committed myself to opening a British Overseas Trade Board conference on exports and jobs, so I faced the choice between talking to 200 industrialists, engaged in the business of exports, or listening to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). Out of courtesy I must at least pretend that it was a struggle, but I doubt whether anyone in the House would believe me. I am told that the right hon. and learned gentleman said that he wanted to start a great national debate. [Interruption.] I took the trouble to get reports of what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said.

Mr. John Smith: Can the right hon. Gentleman believe them?

Mr. Tebbit: I will come back to the right hon. and learned Gentleman before long. He had better save his breath.

Mr. Smith: When the right hon. Gentleman speaks again I will go to a seminar.

Mr. Tebbit: Every time I speak it is a seminar for the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He said that he wanted to start a great debate about industry. I must tell him that industry stopped the debate a long time ago and got on with the business of growing, and he has not even noticed. Of course, I am sorry about the clash between the two events today. Certainly I would not accuse the Opposition of knowingly seeking to detract from the BOTB event.

Mr. Smith: I did not even know that it was on.

Mr. Tebbit: Indeed, that answers it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is not guilty on the main charge, but we find him guilty on the lesser charge of ignorance and fecklessness. He is ignorant of what the Government are doing to assist industry and exports and to create jobs. For that he and his colleagues have a list of convictions as long as one's arm, and they are not alone in that.

The other day I was reading The Guardian, what I call the flabby end of the Fleet street heavies. A Mr. Keegan —I understand he is a financial journalist—was writing in The Guardian on Monday. He accused the Government "of raising billions and billions from selling public sector assets without pumping a penny piece back into resuscitating the declining industrial and hitech heart of Britain."
That is broadly the charge levelled against the Government in today's debate. That is not surprising. It was the charge that was made by the TUC in its document, "The Future Business". It was rehashed by Mr. Keegan and regurgitated by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East, sticking to his brief as always like the lawyer he is. Mr. Keegan referred to us raising billions and billions from privatisation. Yes, we have, £5·5 billion to date.

Mr. Smith: I did not say that.

Mr. Tebbit: I know that the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not say that bit. He did not get time to rehash all of it. The Guardian referred to the Government raising billions "without pumping a penny piece back into resuscitating the declining industrial and hightech heart of Britain."
Over the six years 1979-80 to 1984-85 my Department's aggregate expenditure on regional industrial assistance has been nearly £3·3 billion, on science and technology nearly £1·6 billion, on export promotion £180 million, and on other industrial support some £3 billion, including £1·4 billion for BL and £0·5 billion for Rolls-Royce. The nationalised industries' external financing limits over those years amount to another £14 billion. That is well clear of £20 billion all told. Not a penny piece, says The Guardian. It cannot tell the difference between a penny piece and £14 billion. Last year alone the cost of assistance to private industry was about the same as the £5·5 billion that has resulted from privatisation since 1979. It is only crass ignorance or wilful partisan bias that can cause the production of such rubbish. I believe that the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) has from time to time expressed an interest in recycling rubbish — he has certainly been at it today.

At the lower end of Fleet street we have the Star. On Monday 13 May, in an article about exports to China, it made a great deal of our lack of success in selling aircraft to that country. It spoke of a mere £25 million that has been paid for eight mini-airliners from Short Bros. of Belfast. That, it said, is all that we have achieved. Ignorance or political spite caused the Star to forget our 20 per cent. share of a $150 million order for airbuses and the $150 million order for 10 HS146s. It is that degree of distortion and ignorance that we have to combat. That being so, I turn again to the right hon. and learned Member for Monksland, East.

In the right hon. and learned Gentleman's restatement of TUC policy, presumably because the TUC thought that it had not had much coverage and asked the Opposition to give it a whirl again, the right hon. and learned Gentleman attempted to start, as he called it, the great debate. By 6 o'clock this evening there was one Labour Back Bencher and one Labour Front Bencher in the Chamber. Even the right hon. and learned Gentleman was not present for the great debate.

Mr. Sheerman: There were only two Tories present.

Mr. Tebbit: No. There has been a good Conservative attendance throughout the debate. I accept that the Labour Whips had better things to do than to sit in the Chamber. Indeed, they were outside trying to get Labour Back Benchers to participate in the debate. They got them in one at a time. The right hon. and learned Gentleman gave the TUC document another whirl. He neither added to nor subtracted from the TUC's position.

Mr. John Smith: What document?

Mr. Tebbit: The right hon. and learned Gentleman's ignorance is even deeper than I thought. He does not know that the TUC has published the document to which I have referred.

Mr. Smith: I hesitate to engage the right hon. Gentleman at the level to which he has reduced the debate. It is a serious debate and he has great responsibility to the country and to the House. As the right hon. Gentleman did not hear my speech, let me make it plain now that from start to finish I made no reference to any TUC document. I ask him to listen to my speech next time instead of listening to unreliable reporters.

Mr. Tebbit: I have already told the right hon. and learned Gentleman of the terrible clash with which I was faced. I had to decide whether to listen to him or to help 200 British exporters to get more jobs. Incidentally, I have a photocopy of the TUC document. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not seen it, I shall pass it to him at the end of the debate. It is entitled "The Future Business". It seems that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not even read it. He will get into terrible trouble when the TUC hears about that. However, I have met very few people who have read it.

I enjoyed immensely the speech of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). I suppose that it would not be within the rules of order to make it again so that those who were not present when it was delivered could hear it. What a pity that is. I am not sure whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman enjoyed it too much. After all, the right hon. Gentleman, however much we may pull his leg, represents a substantial slice of opinion in the Labour party. It is probably a minority opinion. It is certainly a minority opinion in this House, but whether it is a minority opinion among paid-up individual members of the Labour party—a pretty select band—is another matter.

When I heard the right hon. Member for Chesterfield compare Liverpool with Beirut, I wondered at his capacity for distorting reality into Left-wing fantasy, although I enjoyed his lumping into one revisionist bundle Sir Winston Churchill, Earls Attlee, Eden and Stockton, Lord Wilson, my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr Heath), Sir Stafford Cripps, Ernie Bevin, the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) and a cast of thousands. He continued with a splendid attack, which I enjoyed, on aristocrats, of which he is one, and on the last Labour Government, of which he was a member. The right hon. Gentleman ended with the astounding statement, "Industry has gone." And then, so was he. What a vision of the barmy Left, which is the visible manifestation of the nasty Left that is dominating the Labour party.

In a different way entirely I enjoyed the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior). It was a very constructive and reasoned speech, even if I could not agree immediately with everything that he said.

The hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), unlike the right hon. Member for Chesterfield's hysterical and paranoic view of impending disaster, had a sort of pale beige middle of the road, boring view of impending disaster, but I should like to cheer him up a little. He is really a very nice chap, I am told. He should not be so miserable, except when he considers the opinion polls and their implications for the alliance. I can cheer him up about Alvey. The hon. Member was looking only at the payments which have been made, which lag well behind the projects which have been approved. During the last two years about 100 projects have been approved and about three quarters of the total funds which have been allowed for Alvey have now been allocated. Similarly, his genteel gloom about the use of microelectronics in manufacturing industries was not well justified. We are just behind the Germans, but we are well ahead of France, and in European terms we are performing well.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Lloyd) made a splendid speech. He neglected only one major aspect of his proposed strategy which damages all of us very much—the lack of a European common market. One day I hope that we shall create it.

The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) was somewhat misleading. I spoke this afternoon to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. He told me that the decision by the Sharp company of Japan to increase its operations in Wrexham was taken well before the visit by the borough council, although I am sure that that visit was not harmful to the project. I believe that there are excellent relationships between the company and the council.

Dr. Marek: There is one way to decide this matter: to ask Sharp. I hope that the Secretary of State will also ask the leader and the chief executive of Wrexham borough council. I think he will find that what I said was correct.

Mr. Tebbit: If there is any doubt about the matter, I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales will let me know.

The hon. Member for Wrexham was also rather gloomy and dismissive about the number of new jobs which have been created during the last two years. During that period 613,000 extra jobs have been created. Many of them are, admittedly, part-time jobs, but at least 118,000 are full-time jobs. When the hon. Gentleman is making comparisons with other countries he ought to bear in mind that 65 per cent. of the population of the United Kingdom between the ages of 15 and 64 is in work, compared with 59 per cent. in Germany, 61 per cent. in France and 66 per cent. in the United States.

I enjoyed the speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) and for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) and the report of what my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) said and his encouraging view of the great efforts being made at British Leyland.

I must tell the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) that it is not true that Lucas has been badly treated by the Government. I cannot, of course, comment on financial support for individual companies, but for the aircraft and aerospace industry, which is vital to Lucas, the support in the past five years has been £1·28 billion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle) made some interesting points about the relations between big and small firms. One of the purposes of the BOTB conference which I attended this afternoon was to encourage large firms to assist smaller firms in their export efforts by carrying them, so to speak, piggyback into markets where they would not previously have been. I hope that that practice will grow.

Of course I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) that we want manufacturing industry, but services will provide more and more of our jobs as they do in the United States. I agree about the need for support for exporters. It is hard work removing trade barriers, especially in the European Community. As to Japan and the Japanese banks, I hope that he will forgive me if I do not deal with how we might react to the problem of reciprocity.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) was understanding of the role of the electronics industry in his constituency and his part of Scotland. I share his hopes for Scott Lithgow.

My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) was thoughtful and understanding. I think carefully about those whom we wish to encourage to be inward investors.

I share the desire of my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) for a stable exchange rate. My worry is whether we can fix the price of the dollar. That is the question that must be asked when we ask whether we can fix the price of sterling. That is a formidable undertaking. I doubt whether the Americans can fix the price of the dollar, let alone us. I share his desire to put more pressure on Japan.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, South seems to be in a bad way today. He seems to be gloomy, upset and nostalgic for those good old Labour Government days when they had a massive trade deficit. He does not talk about those days.

Mr. John Smith: Has the right hon. Gentleman heard about North sea oil?

Mr. Tebbit: Yes. I might equally ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether he has ever heard of manufacturing, banking or financial services, or any other aspect of our trade. The Labour Government suffered from chronic balance of payments problems, and for the past five years we have had a balance or better on our trade. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is oil".] So, it is oil. Goodness me, if it were coal Opposition Members would not be shouting in derision "It is coal", would they? What is the difference between coal and oil except that oil is more difficult to get out from the North sea and it is got out profitably by private enterprise whereas coal is easier to extract and we lose money on getting it out with a nationalised industry?

Mr. Smith: The right hon. Gentleman mentioned oil. The Tory Government did nothing to obtain North sea oil. They inherited a self-sufficiency of production in North sea oil when they took office in 1979. The Tory Government received a windfall. They have had more money than any Government have ever had and they have done nothing for it. They are now overproducing it to balance the books and it will run out earlier because of that. Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why the Government chose to spend all the money on paying for the extra unemployment that they created instead of investing it in British industry?

Mr. Tebbit: The right hon. and learned Gentleman talks as though it were he and the right hon. Member for Chesterfield, the former Secretary of State for Energy, who got out into the North sea, drilled the holes, built the platforms and got out the oil. It was private enterprise that did that. What is more, it was overwhelmingly those filthy, nasty multinationals that did it. Without them, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have had no industry to hand over to us.

Mr. Smith: What did the Government spend the money on?

Mr. Tebbit: I promise to return to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech. He is a glutton for punishment tonight.

I listened carefully twice today to the speech of the hon. Member for Motherwell, South. I heard it not for the first time—nor, I fear, for the last—on BBC radio this morning. We heard it again this afternoon and, no doubt, we shall hear it when he next addresses us.

Dr. Bray: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman learnt from it.

Mr. Tebbit: I did learn from it. I learnt, for example, about the extraordinary ignorance, bias and partisanship of the Labour party—[Interruption.]—but not a word came from the hon. Member for Motherwell, South about the increase of 10 per cent. in manufactured exports in 1984. Does he know that our exports of manufactured goods expanded by 10 per cent. in 1984? Does he know that they expanded by 14 per cent. in the first quarter of this year compared with the first quarter of 1984? Does he know that these figures are reaching record levels?

Dr. Bray rose——

Mr. Tebbit: Let us see if the hon. Gentleman answers my question. Did he know about those figures but preferred not to give them?

Dr. Bray: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman's knowledge of arithmetic extends to the point that if one has exports and one takes away imports, one gets the balance. The balance for visible trade in January was minus £76 million; in February it was minus £270 million; and in March it was £900 million. That is what the right hon. Gentleman describes as an improvement in the trade position.

Mr. Tebbit: The hon. Gentleman, the House will have noticed, did not reply to my question.

Dr. Bray rose——

Mr. Tebbit: No, the hon. Gentleman had his chance.

Dr. Bray rose——

Mr. Tebbit: No, no, no. The hon. Gentleman had his chance and I will now deal with the point that he raises. [Interruption.] He knows full well that we have had five years of surplus in our trade figures. He knows full well that there is a marked seasonal pattern to the trade figures in the early part of the year. He also knows that there were a number of major erratic items in those trade figures.

Dr. Bray rose——

Mr. Tebbit: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that we shall be well on track for a surplus on our trade account again this year.

Dr. Bray: Look at the figures.

Mr. Tebbit: I am amazed that the hon. Member for Motherwell, South dismissed the CBI's view of the state of industry. On BBC radio this morning he said that the CBI's view was too weak to merit consideration. I say to him that, as a scientist, he should have some ability to read the trend lines on graphs and to read more than one of them. I urge him to examine the CBI report.

Dr. Bray: I urge the right hon. Gentleman to look at the figures. I hand them to him.

Mr. Tebbit: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

In the CBI report he will find that the first question asks:

"Are you more or less optimistic — than you were four months ago?"

If the hon. Gentleman then takes the trend line, he will see a clear improvement. On page 5 the hon. Gentleman will see that in relation to the expected trend in volume of output in the next four months there is a level of optimism not exceeded since way back.

Dr. Bray: When we were in power.

Mr. Tebbit: It is always useful to look at the front page, too. [Interruption.] I will read from the hon. Gentleman's copy as he has taken the trouble to pass it to me. Page 1 states:

"Demand for manufactures continued to grow over the last few months at a rather faster rate than in the last three Quarterly Surveys. This rate is expected to continue over the next few months. Demand has also become rather less of a constraint on output . . . .

Output volume is reported to have grown faster than in the last three Surveys and its rate of growth is expected to accelerate over the next few months. The capital goods sector continued to grow rather faster than the average.

Capacity utilisation still remains broadly constant and has now remained static over the last four quarters. Given the increase in orders and output"—

[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Motherwell, South should not giggle. He should wait for the next sentence. It reads:

"Given the increase in orders and output, this must reflect rising total capacity, probably due to the increased investment.

Investment is expected to continue rising over the next twelve months, at a slightly faster rate than in the January Survey."

How can the hon. Gentleman dismiss that evidence as too weak to merit consideration? The truth is that it did not fit his TUC brief, so he did not want to talk about it.

The hon. Gentleman does not have to restrict himself to studying the views of the CBI. He can consider the views of The Economist and The Times. The Economist this week said:

"Between mid-1981 and the end of 1985, Britain's real gdp will have grown by about 2¾ per cent. a year. That is almost back to its average in the 1960s—making Britain the only country apart from America to have regained its earlier growth. More polemically, Britain had a slower growth rate than France in all but one of the 19 years 1964-82; by December, its growth will have been faster in each of the three years 1983-85 . . . Britain is at last winning back some foreign markets: in the 12 months to the first quarter of 1985, the volume of its no-oil exports . . . grew by 12 per cent., which was probably more than the growth in world trade."

What has the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East to say about that? He does not want to know because it does not fit his prejudices.

We sometimes debate curiously unreal motions, but on this occasion the divide between the Opposition motion and the Government amendment is clear. I spent the early part of this debate at a conference of some 200 industrialists and exporters. If what the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East and his hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South have said about the state of industry and Government policy is right, one wonders why those who attended that conference were so cheerful. This has been the best CBI survey in years, so who are we to believe — industry, or bitter, negative, frustrated, out-of-office politicians?

It is no use the Labour party claiming support from industry because it has no such support. One has only to consider what a Labour Government would offer to the very people whom they claim to need—the high-tech employees. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) wants to inflict taxation on the rich—on everyone with more than £20,000 per year. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) wants to stop tax relief on mortgage interest. A Labour Government would drive out of the country the very people they need to regenerate British industry. Out of office, the Labour party talks about support for industry and supports every strike, however bloody-minded and irrational. In the words of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook:

"It is an official strike and therefore it is right for the Labour Party to support it."

There is no doubt whatsoever that——

Mr. Michael Cocks (Bristol, South) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Mr. Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the recent substantial increase in manufacturing output, the sharp rise in exports, the major gains in the competitiveness of British industry, and the improved optimism of independent bodies such as the Confederation of British Industry; congratulates the Government on the measures it has taken to assist the recovery of British Industry through its support for innovation programme, support for investment, support for exports, business and technical advisory services, assistance with education and training and in particular today's Export for Jobs seminar and the commencement of Local Enterprise Week, as well as its policies to improve the economic climate in which business operates; and regrets the Opposition's willingness to support every single strike no matter what the cost, its reactionary and damaging policies in favour of increased taxation further nationalisation, and greater state intervention, its policies of deplorable fiscal irresponsibility, incompatible with the restraint of inflation and enhancement of competitiveness, and its eagerness to seek partisan gain at the expense of British industry and jobs.

Unfair Dismissal

10.28 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I beg to move.

That the draft Unfair Dismissal (Variation of Qualifying Period) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 17th April, be approved.

Under the provisions of the employment protection legislation currently in force, employees have a right to complain to an industrial tribunal of unfair dismissal after one year's service with an employer or after two years with an employer of 20 or fewer employees. The purpose of the draft order — article 3(1) — is to standardise this qualifying period at two years for all employees. The change will not affect the qualifying period of one month in respect of unfair dismissal following suspension on medical grounds, nor will it affect the right not to be dismissed unfairly at any time because of membership or non-membership of a trade union or because of taking part in trade union activities, where no qualifying period is required.

Employees who work between eight and 16 hours a week will continue, as now, to have a qualifying period of five years. This order will have no effect on the protection afforded to employees under the sex discrimination and race relations legislation.

It is intended that the order should come into force on 1 June 1985. It will apply only to employees starting to work for an employer on or after that date. We believe that, in spite of the changes we have made since 1979, the employment protection legislation, in particular in the provisions relating to unfair dismissal, still discourage firms from taking more people on. The Government are deeply concerned about the level of unemployment, but there are few simple solutions to the problem. The White Paper "Employment: The Challenge for the Nation" sets out our views on what the nation as a whole must do to create jobs and reduce unemployment.

Government cannot alone create jobs. Their key contribution is to create an economic climate in which enterprises can flourish. They can, and do, also provide direct help for those worst affected by unemployment. Government can help to improve the operation of the labour market by encouraging better training, more flexibility and fewer barriers of regulation and cost.

The changes introduced by the order are part of this strategy. I am interested in doing all we can to create the conditions in which more new jobs can be created. It is important that we should take all reasonable steps to remove the barriers that might be standing in the way. In this case the barrier relates to employers who want to take on more people but are afraid to do so because of their fear of being taken to industrial tribunals.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North) rose——

Mr. Bottomley: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not mind, but I should like to continue with this point.

I think it is common ground among us that employees should have a right to protection against unfair dismissal after a reasonable period of service. I think it is also common ground that such protection should not generally be available immediately but that there should be a period of service during which time the employer has an opportunity to decide whether he wishes to retain a new employee. The length of this qualifying period is a matter for judgment and opinions on what is right may change.

Our judgment at the present time—in the light of the paramount importance of reducing unemployment—is that two years is a reasonable period for an employer to have to decide whether an employee should be retained, while the position of employees who have demonstrated their commitment to an employer over such a period is also safeguarded. The change will also bring the qualifying period for unfair dismissal claims into line with the long-standing two-year qualifying periods for redundancy payments, maternity pay and the right to return because of absence due to pregnancy.

We believe that the change will have an important psychological effect. Employers will be more ready at the margin to take a chance and to employ people in the knowledge that they will have two years in which to see whether things work——

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister give way before he sits down?

Mr. Bottomley: I am not giving way at the moment. Employers will be more ready at the margin to take a change and to employ people in the knowledge that they will have two years in which to see whether things work out as they hope, without the fear of being taken to an industrial tribunal.

But I must repeat that the right to complain to an industrial tribunal will remain, and I make no apology for that. Employees who have invested two or more years of their lives with an employer are entitled to safeguards. Employers should look after their employees in the same way as they would any other investment and make sure that they do not dismiss them without good reason. While it is inevitable that some dismissals will end up with the employer being taken to an industrial tribunal, most employers and employees would agree that this is something to be avoided. The best way of avoiding or minimising such cases is to agree and stick to disciplinary and grievance procedures so that both management and employees know where they stand. The employment protection legislation has had the effect of making such procedures more widely available, and I think this is wholly desirable. I commend this order to the House.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): The House will have noted that I attempted twice to intervene in the Minister's speech because I realised that he had an extremely short speech. Probably that was because he is ashamed of the order that he is bringing before the House. If he is not ashamed, he should be.

This order is just one more step along the road to the dismantling of the Labour Government's employment protection legislation. It is another element of the Tory Government's attack on working people and the dismantling of the welfare state. Previous Labour Governments started to build a framework of reasonable provision of pensions and social security benefits and a humane regime of protection in the workplace in terms of employment, health and safety, the right to belong to a trade union and against the worst excesses of unfair and arbitrary dismissal by an employer.

Since the Government took office we have seen a steady erosion of welfare state provision. We on the Labour Benches note with anger the Government's apparent determination to abolish the state earnings-related pension scheme which workers are currently paying for, just as we recall with contempt the Government's swindling of the workers when they abolished the six months' earnings-related unemployment benefit supplement which, again, workers had paid for.

Now the Tories are extending from one to two years the period during which an employer will be free to sack unfairly his employees. I pose this question to the Minister and to every Tory Back Bencher: why should an employer have the right to sack anyone unfairly at any time? If the Minister wishes to intervene, I will give way.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): If there were merit in the hon. Member's argument, why did his Government include a threshold in the first place?

Mr. Evans: I will come to that point in a moment, because I was one of those who served on the Committee that dealt with the original legislation on trade unions and labour relations.

Why should there be any qualifying period of two years, one year or 26 weeks during which a worker is exposed to the whims of an employer who can sack him or her on the spot?

Mr. Hogg: What is the answer?

Mr. Evans: I will come to the answer shortly.

Why should an employer have the right to sack anyone unfairly at any time? That is the issue. Is it not an absurdity, if not an obscenity, that Parliament is enacting legislation which instructs an employer that he cannot sack a worker who has been in his employ for two years or more, yet which at the same time gives that employer the freedom to sack any of his workers for whatever reason, no matter how unfairly, provided the worker has not completed the two-year qualification period of employment?

Let us consider the official reason for the order. We are told that it will enable employers to take on more workers. The Minister said as much in his speech tonight. The Secretary of State for Employment said so in the Budget debate:

"Employment protection legislation, especially the unfair dismisal provisions, causes small employers anxieties about the difficulties of such procedures and makes them reluctant to take on more employees."

Later he said:

"We have already since 1979 taken some major steps to make the industrial tribunal system simpler for employers, but I accept that despite the changes the burden of this legislation can deter employers from recruiting more people."—[Official Report, 21 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 1023-24.]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the same in his Budget statement:

"The qualifying period for unfair dismissal claims will thus become two years for all new employees. This is a reasonable period of time and should lessen the reluctance of some employers to take on new people. — [Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 794.]

Neither of those right hon. Gentlemen offered a shred of evidence to justify those sentiments and neither did the Minister this evening. All that we get from opponents of Labour's employment legislation is anecdotal saloon bar evidence and vicious propaganda from Tory Members. It is offered in the same fashion as the so-called evidence of the need to abolish the wages councils, and frequently by the same people. We are told that the lowest paid are paid too much, thanks to the councils. It is rather surprising that we are not getting evidence to justify the Government's claim that dismantling Labour's employment legislation will create jobs. When the Conservative Government took office in 1979, the qualifying period laid down by the Labour Government was 26 weeks. It was generally accepted that six months was a relatively fair and reasonable period for a employer to assess the suitability of a worker before deciding whether to accept him as a permanent employee. It was accepted that 26 weeks allowed the employer properly to arrive at a conclusion on the suitability or otherwise of his employee. The 26-weeks provision had nothing to do with sacking someone unfairly.

The Tory party bitterly opposed the 26-week provision and one of their first acts after taking office was to extend the qualifying period to 52 weeks. That was done in July, 1979. Two arguments were advanced to support that extension. The first argument was advanced tentatively and without conviction and the Minister adopted the same style this evening. It was said that 26 weeks was not long enough to assess a new employee's suitability and so the qualifying period was extended to a year and then to two years. A brand new aeroplane could be tested in a shorter time than that.

The second argument was advanced with considerable force and much more certitude. It was contended that the extension of the qualifying period would create more jobs. The then Under-Secretary of State for Employment, who is now the Solicitor-General, informed the House on 24 July 1979 that the Government's "decision to lay the order again derives from our determination to see that the creation of new jobs is not curtailed by legislation that is unreasonable and unnecessary in its effect."

Later he said:

"To anybody with ears to hear or eyes to read, it must be plain that the qualifying provisions are widely seen as discouraging employers from creating new jobs."

That view was reiterated later in the debate by the then Secretary of State for Employment, the right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior). He said:

"However, we have to restore the confidence of management and small employers to take on labour and to be able to carry out their duties properly."—[Official Report, 24 July 1979; Vol. 971, c. 527-56.]

At that time unemployment stood at 1·4 million. That was before the Tory Government started to massage the unemployment statistics. What has happened since then? How many jobs were created by extending the qualifying period from 26 to 52 weeks? What reduction in unemployment has taken place between July 1979 and today? Everyone knows the unfortunate answers to those questions. Far from the Government creating jobs, they have destroyed them on a colossal scale. If the method of recording unemployment statistics were the same now as in 1979, there would be almost 4 million officially recorded as being out of work.

The Minister has not offered any evidence—if he had allowed me to intervene, I would have asked him to support his claims with concrete evidence—to support his claim that the order will create more jobs, because there is no such evidence available to him. However, there is considerable evidence that thousands of workers will suffer as a result of the order. Millions of workers, including part-time women workers and workers in small firms, are already disbarred from challenging the unfairness of their dismissal by the Government's previous acts.

It should be noted that at present about one quarter of all males and one third of all adult females in full-time employment have less than two years' service with their current employer. Those numbers are fairly constant and have remained constant for a number of years. Therefore, it will be those people who will be affected by the order. If they are added to workers in small firms and those in part-time employment, one sees that about half the labour force of Britain will be debarred from complaining to a tribunal if they believe that they have been unfairly dismissed. This is modern, Tory Britain.

If one looks at another ministerial justification for the change, one sees the peculiar statement of the Secretary of State for Employment when he announced the details in a Department of Employment press notice of 19 March 1985 which said:

"The risk of unjustified involvement with tribunals in unfair dismissal cases and the costs of such involvement are often cited as deterring employers from giving more people jobs. This change . . . should help reduce the reluctance of employers to take on more people, while still preserving a fair balance between the reasonable interests of employer and employee."

The Secretary of State did not explain what he meant by the curious phrase "unjustified involvement". The existing procedures are designed to minimise unjustified cases through the process of initial conciliation by the Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service and pre-hearing assessments in cases where an employer believes a complaint to be spurious. Employees who bring complaints that are judged to be vexatious, frivolous or otherwise unreasonable — a very wide, catch-all description—are required to pay any costs incurred by the employer. No legal aid is available to help tribunal applicants to bring cases. The image given by the employers of "unjustified involvement" is a complete red herring. Fewer and fewer cases of unfair dismissal are being heard before tribunals. Tribunal applications regarding unfair dismissal were just over 30,000 in 1983 — 25 per cent. down on 1979. These applications represent only a fraction—about 12·5 per cent.—of all the dismissals that took place in 1983. Only one third of those cases——

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): The hon. Gentleman has just given some statistics which are at variance with those that I have received from the Minister. I am wondering whether the hon. Gentleman wishes to correct the figures that he has given. The applications registered in 1979 were 41,244, of which 16,180 cases were heard. There were 39,959 applications in 1983, of which 16,649 were heard. According to the official statistics, therefore, the 25 per cent. figure is completely inaccurate.

Mr. Evans: I have long since given up believing in the statistics issued by the Tory Department of Employment, for a very good reason. If we were able to make comparisons—obviously they cannot be made across the Dispatch Box—I suspect that there would not be a very great deal of difference between my figures and those that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) has just read out. It will be interesting to see what figures are provided by the Minister.

Only one third of these cases—just over 10,000—proceeded to a hearing before a tribunal. The remainder were either settled before the hearing or were withdrawn. Of those cases heard by a tribunal, fewer than one third resulted in an award in favour of the employee—just one in 10 of all the original applications. When a tribunal ordered an employer to give an employee his job back —which ought to be a major criterion—in only about 100 cases did that happen. Only about three complainants out of every 1,000 got back their jobs.

The suggestion that unfair dismissal procedures inhibit employers from taking on labour has more to do with Thatcherite mythology than hard facts. To prove the mythology, I shall quote from a leaked confidential memorandum submitted on 7 July 1981 to a Cabinet sub-committee by the former Secretary of State for Employment the right hon. Member for Waveney. It related to his comments on the demand that was being made for alterations to the employment protection legislation and stated:

"In practice, employers are most concerned about the consequences of unfair dismissal. However, their fears should be put into perspective. Only about 7 per cent. of all dismissals lead to a complaint before an industrial tribunal . . . My conclusion therefore is that there is insufficient justification to amend the employment legislation further in favour of employers. Moreover, I believe that any attempt to do so would alienate large sections of the working population, trade unionists and others, and would there be politically damaging to the Government."

I wonder whether that was one of the reasons why the former Secretary of State for Employment was sacked.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one or two of the statistics that he has given suggest that there are many cases where people have pursued unfair dismissal applications unreasonably, vexatiously or frivolously and that as a result unjustified time was spent by employers? The facts that he has given about the few cases which have been upheld by the courts demonstrate the point that I am making.

Mr. Evans: If the hon. Gentleman studies the facts a little more he will find that the case is weighted against the employee making the application. There are pre-hearings. The employer is frequently legally represented and the employee is often on his own. In some instances he may have a trade union representative with him. However, there are people who do not belong to trade unions and, unfortunately, they are frequently sacked by the employer without any thought. They have no trade unionist to take with them to a tribunal. Such people foolishly have often not bothered to join a union. They learn to their cost one of the values of being a trade union member.

It is a pity that the Secretary of State for Employment lacks the political sensitivity that was shown by the right hon. Member for Waveney. He is oversensitive tonight, because he is not here. If he had showed some of that sensitivity, the Tories might not have needed a new team of centre forwards to which I presume the Under-Secretary would belong if he did not now sit on the Front Bench.

The Labour Government introduced the employment protection legislation. I am proud of the fact that I served on the Committees of the Bills that were introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), not to stop dismissals or prevent employers from managing their businesses, but to create a better framework of industrial relations in which proper selection and disciplinary procedures were agreed by both sides of industry. Most employers recognised that that led to better management practices.

One of the first things that the next Labour Government will do will be to introduce new employment protection legislation. The proof that our legislation was no disincentive to the creation of jobs is shown by the fact that when the Labour Government left office 315,000 more people were in work than when they took office.

Since then, for every job that Labour created, the Conservatives have destroyed six. Labour legislation helped to create jobs. Tory legislation has destroyed them. In their desperate search for scapegoats to blame for the appalling level of unemployment, the Government have come up with a brand new one: employers can be persuaded to employ more people only if they are first free to sack them. That is insulting to employers and the order is an affront to the British work force. That is why we shall vote against it tonight.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): The order adjusts the balance of protection given by unfair dismissal legislation originating under the Industrial Relations Act 1971, which was a Conservative piece of legislation. My hon. Friends and I take pride in the fact that good legislation to promote good industrial relations is Conservative legislation. The hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) seemed completely to overlook that in the thrust of his argument.

The order is part of a sequence of adjustments that have occurred over the years to put right many of the deficiencies that have crept into the legislation as a result of the changes which the Labour party, when in power, introduced into the original Act. The absurd overstatement of the hon. Member for St. Helens, North did nothing to earn him any credibility, though it may have gone some way to earn him an Oscar nomination.

The focus of the 1971 legislation was job protection. The focus today in legislation concerned with industrial relations must be job creation, and the two can be, have been and are now in conflict. Hence, the need to address the balance of the legislation in the light of today's changing priorities.

Mr. Evans: What evidence does the hon. Gentleman have for saying that?

Mr. Batiste: I shall come to the evidence shortly.

Some will argue that unfair dismissal legislation should be abolished altogether. I do not share that view. As a practising lawyer, I have for many years been involved in industrial tribunals as well as business, particularly small businesses. I readily recognise the importance of, and fundamental contribution that unfair dismissal legislation has given to, the improvement of the industrial relations climate.

Unfair dismissal legislation is essentially fair, and it has raised standards of management. But, apart from the question of fairness and raising management standards, it is fully justified in cost terms. In the 1960s, many strikes and industrial stoppages occurred as a result of dismissals. Since the legislation was introduced in the early 1970s, such industrial disruptions have become a rarity because most people accept that unfair dismissal legislation provides a reasonable alternative to taking industrial action. My argument is that the Government should return to the judgments that they made and incorporated in the 1971 Act.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): Does the hon. Gentleman, being a lawyer, agree that it is disgraceful that an employee claiming unfair dismissal and wishing to appear before a tribunal cannot even get legal aid, whereas the employer who is defending the case can offset his costs against tax and thus have part of his costs paid by the taxpayer?

Mr. Batiste: The original judgment of the Industrial Relations Act, which has been accepted by subsequent Labour and Conservative Governments, was that the industrial tribunal should be an informal forum. If we introduce legal aid and inevitable legal representations in all cases, the procedure will be slowed down and become much more complex. Far from providing a greater source of justice for the people to whom the hon. Gentleman refers, I believe that it would be more difficult through delay and complexity for them to achieve their objectives. I do not accept that legal aid is desirable at industrial tribunals. I believe that people with good cases can obtain legal representation if they require it. [Interruption.] With respect, the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) has very little experience in this area. I have represented employees at tribunals on many occasions.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): The hon. Gentleman should not suggest that Labour Members do not have as much experience as he in this area of the law. Where does he imagine that an ordinary working person who is not a trade union member will find skilled legal representation in the complex and difficult cases which everyone should know are the bane of industrial tribunals?

Mr. Batiste: I accept the hon. and learned Gentleman's expertise and his many books on industrial relations, not to mention his lectures to other lawyers on how to conduct their affairs. If an individual seeks advice from a solicitor and is told that he has no claim of significance, but he then chooses to pursue the claim on his own, that is his right. The fact that he will almost inevitably lose is due not to lack of legal representation but to lack of merit in his claim. If the solicitor advises the individual that he has a claim, it is my experience that he will readily act for such an applicant before an industrial tribunal. I do not see the need for legal aid in those circumstances. On the contrary, I believe that legal aid in tribunal cases would march us one step further down the American road towards an over-litigious society.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Would not the informality of the proceedings be enhanced by the complete absence of lawyers?

Mr. Batiste: I would happily subscribe to that view. As a practising lawyer, I accept that it must be up to the individuals on both sides to decide whether they want legal representation, but I believe that in most cases it is right for the parties to represent themselves rather than to have legal representation. Among large companies, the increasing trend is for the personnel manager or one of the line managers to represent the company at the tribunal, just as on the other side it is most often the individual applicant, a friend or a trade union official. I believe that the Opposition are making a bogus point, because the tribunals were always intended to be informal. I do not believe that there is any benefit for anyone in trying to make them more formal, complex and legalistic in their operation.

I believe that large companies have adjusted their procedures to the legislation and that it represents no serious disincentive to employment. So why is the order needed? There are two reasons. First, there must be a reasonable period for assessment. That was implicit in the speech of the hon. Member for St. Helens, North when he was asked why the Labour party accepted a period of six months. There is no difference in principle between six months and two years, only a difference in degree. If one accepts the basic principle that there must be a period of assessment, it is a matter of judgment how long that period should be.

The hon. Member argued that the Conservatives were breaking the consensus, but in fact the Labour Government broke the consensus because the original judgment under the 1971 Act was that the period of assessment should be two years. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman admitted that when the Labour Government reduced the period to one year and then to six months, it was in the teeth of the fiercest opposition from employers, who said that it was unreasonable and unworkable.

Mr. Evans: Will the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that when the 1971 legislation was before the House, the then Secretary of State for Employment, now Lord Carr, categorically stated that the Tory Government intended to reduce the period from two years? The two-year period was the inception period. I wish that I had brought the reference with me, so that the hon. Gentleman could look it up in Hansard.

Mr. Batiste: The 1971 Act represented a major change in the way in which this aspect of industrial relations had been handled. Until that time, the majority of the available protection related to redundancy payments. At the beginning in 1971 it was proper to form a conservative view of a reasonable assessment period. It was perfectly reasonable to examine that aspect from time to time to ascertain whether the original judgments were still correct. The Labour Government took the view that the period should be reduced. As a vice-chairman of the Small Business Bureau, I can say that that decision by the Labour Government to reduce the period of qualification has done grave damage to small businesses and to employment in them. [Interruption.] If an Opposition Member wants to intervene, I shall give way. Hon. Members do not need to shout from a sedentary position.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): The hon. Gentleman will be aware that every year many extremely important appointments are made in which probationary periods are laid down. Is he aware of any top post in industry where a probationary period of two years is laid down?

Mr. Batiste: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman why I think that a two-year period is important and in the interests of employers.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): Answer the question.

Mr. Batiste: I shall explain why I think this is so. The probationary period and the period of protection for unfair dismissal legislation cover two different situations because of the way in which they are viewed by employers. If we have a 12-month or six-month period of probation and a 12-month or six-month corresponding qualifying period for unfair dismissal legislation, two months or six weeks before the period expires, the employer would take a view of the individual and say, "If we are even in doubt about this man's fitness, we should get rid of him now." If we have a longer qualifying period, the probationary period would still remain at six months or 12 months, but— [Interruption.] In making such assertions, hon. Members show how remote they are from the realities of management.

The second reason why I support a two-year period is that it is anomalous to have differing qualifying periods for redundancy payments and unfair dismissal legislation. At the moment, a person can, after one year, bring a claim for unfair selection for redundancy, even if he is not entitled to a redundancy payment. This absurd anomaly must be corrected by bringing the two qualifying periods into line, as they were in the 1971 Act. I support the common two-year qualifying period and the original judgment of the 1971 Act.

Does the order go far enough? I have said that I do not support total abolition of the unfair dismissal legislation, but I accept the other judgment of the 1971 Act which exempted very small businesses from the legislation. Unfair dismissal legislation is a disincentive to very small businesses. I accept that the Government have done a great deal.

Mr. Evans: They have done a great deal of damage.

Mr. Batiste: The hon. Gentleman keeps intervening from a sedentary position, but noise is no substitute for argument in this important matter.

The unfair dismissal legislation is a disincentive to very small businesses. I accept that the Government have done a great deal in the detail of the legislation to redress the imbalances which were injected into the legislation by the Labour party when it was in power. However much this Government seek to redress the imbalances in the legislation, two major disincentives to small businesses will inevitably remain. The first is that a one, two or three-man business simply cannot afford the time to fight a case before an industrial tribunal. The cost is wholly disproportionate in terms of business endeavour. However the balances or the burdens of proof are adjusted, that remains the position.

Secondly, a very small business is disproportionately at risk in relation to the cost of losing a claim before an industrial tribunal. A man can be dismissed from a business employing two or three people, he can then win a big award at an industrial tribunal, even though he may have contributed to his dismissal by his own conduct, and, as a result of that award, the whole business may go into bankruptcy, so that other employees lose their livelihoods as a consequence.

If the balance had been left as it stood in the 1971 legislation, it would be a much more realistic, sensible and practical piece of legislation. If every small business took on just one more employee, the unemployment problem would disappear. Given the overwhelming priority of job creation, the Government's duty is to remove the obstacles which stand in the way of that process.

I support the order, but I hope that the Government will soon go further and restore the 1971 position.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Perhaps we can all at least agree that it is a great pity that a measure of this importance should be dealt with at this time of night and in the form of an order which we have no power to amend but can only accept or reject, and which does not go through the parliamentary process in its entirety. I hope we can agree that there are so many thousands of people who are affected and are likely to be affected that at least this is a matter which the House should consider at a time when it is awake and when it can consider fully all the matters concerned.

I suspect that the Minister was asleep when he talked, otherwise he would not have had to read his speech at such speed. One is reminded of the Member of the other place who dreamt that he was speaking in the other place and woke up to find that he was. In this place the Minister went through his speech with such speed that we listened to it with some amazement, waiting for a break when he would give way or perhaps add a dash of knowledge or an occasional statistic, or give the odd indication of evidence in support of what he was saying. But by the time we thought he might be reaching that break, he sat down, to cheers from his own side and gasps of amazement from those of us who thought that this measure, which is so important for so many people, would at least be given the courtesy of a full explanation by the Minister who was introducing it.

Perhaps the hon. Gentleman worked on the basis that the least said the soonest ended, and the quicker he could return to yawning on the Front Bench in his charming way. [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] I will not "come on" because this is a matter which should be dealt with properly and has not been. It has been treated in a disgracefully cavalier fashion. We have not even been told by the Minister how many cases he believes will not reach tribunals which otherwise would have done. That is the most basic statistic, and until now even his party has given it when introducing this sort of measure.

The statutory trial period, as it is known, should be at the very most six months. I take the point that was made as to why the Labour party, when in office, saw fit to have any statutory trial period. I have always considered that it was wrong. Indeed, I asked Mrs. Castle, who was the Minister at the time, why she would not get rid of the trial period. She replied with one of the more exciting sentences in my recollection. She said, "It would be the end of hop-pickers, my dear". Apparently no one would take on hop-pickers if there were any worry about their being dismissed unfairly, and hop-pickers in Kent would be replaced by machinery. I never felt that that was the best argument that we managed to produce.

But at least to our credit we reduced the period from two years to 12 months and from 12 months to six months. If the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) cannot see the difference between two years and six months, he is well qualified to have made the speech that he made. As it is, we have a statutory two-year trial period during which a person can be dismissed, with or without good reason, fairly or unfairly. That is a major scandal. Like my hon. Friends, I believe that an employee who has been dismissed should always be entitled to say to a tribunal, "It was not fair. I have been deprived of my livelihood. This is how I support my family. I will be on the dole. I will be the scrap heap."

The hon. Gentleman is wrong to say that redundancy rights should be subject to the same time limits as every other remedy. Why should not a person who has been dumped on the scrap heap after a year say, "it is unfair to have treated me like this. I want compensation." Why should it be right for a small business to treat people unfairly any more than it is for a big business?

To give the right hon. Member the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry his due, there was a suggestion from the Select Committee on Employment, on which I sit—a suggestion made so as to achieve unanimity—that when the code of the Commission for Racial Equality came into force and introduced the idea of ethnic monitoring and positive action, that Code should not apply to small businesses. The right hon. Gentleman said no, because there was no reason why a small business should be any more entitled to discriminate unlawfully than a big business. If that is right for discrimination, why should it be wrong when treating people unfairly? Why should a small employer be entitled to treat people unfairly when a large employer is not?

Why should there be merit in an argument that a small employer will be driven to the wall if he has to go to a tribunal? A lawyer on the Government Benches has seen fit to argue that, without producing one example to back it. There is a good reason why the hon. Gentleman did not produce one case—there is none. In the history of the law there has, so far as I can recall, never been a reported case of a company going into liquidation because it had to meet an unfair dismissal claim—either won or lost.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): If the hon. and learned Gentleman is saying that he can see no difference between a company that employs one or two people and a company that employs a specialist personnel department, he is well qualified to be making the speech that he is.

Mr. Janner: I can see no difference in unfairness or discrimination between a one-man firm and a dozen-man firm. I can see no reason why a small employer should be allowed to break the law any more than a large one. If a small employer is guilty of fraud, he goes to prison, as would a large employer. It is no good him saying, "I am only a small employer, so I am entitled to cheat the tax man or the customer." Why should the small employer be allowed to cheat his employee out of his job any more than a large employer? It is that person's job; it is his livelihood.

The Minister said that the order is necessary to enable employers to employ more people. That might have some truth in it if the present system adequately protected employees. Unfortunately, it does not. The 70 to 73 per cent. failure rate, which has been fairly constant, is not because 70 to 73 per cent. of claims are not worth bringing. Some may be poor claims. But in the main, it is because th average employee cannot produce evidence. He does not have documents, although his employer has them. Above all, he cannot bring anyone to give evidence for him because his colleagues dare not go to the tribunal and risk their jobs, their livelihoods and their families by giving evidence against their employers.

I always advise employees to take good care of themselves, not so much because they must win tribunal cases, but because, if they bring a case, they will almost certainly lose it. Even more important, most people, especially managers and higher level employees, dare not exercise their rights, because an application to an industrial tribunal is a passport to permanent unemployment. Therefore, there is not only a 70 per cent. failure rate of those who go to tribunals but a huge percentage of people who are unable to go to tribunals because they know that if they do they will never get another job.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman accept that in the experience of most of those who practise before the industrial tribunals the great majority of applicants who obtain compensation have already obtained employment by the time that the case is heard?

Mr. Janner: There are some, but I am told by personnel managers and employers who have large numbers of people applying for jobs that when someone in the queue for a job gets an interview and gives references and the references from the previous employer are taken up, and when the previous employer says, "He is suing us in an industrial tribunal", the applicant is unlikely to go to the front of the queue, on the ground that he is a person of initiative. In some cases, such an applicant gets the job anyway, but it is a great disincentive. If the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) does not know that, perhaps he should listen to some of those who are unrepresented and they would tell him.

That brings us to the next point, the representation. I agree that the more informal these procedures are, the better. I have never believed that this should be a happy hunting ground for lawyers. But, unfortunately, a tremendous amount of tribunal law has accredited over the course of years. This is no longer a question of somebody giving judgment under a coconut palm on the basis of what he hears. There is a vast amount of case law in which both the hon. Member for Grantham and the hon. Member for Elmet are expert, and which they can go to their law books to find.

What happens in tribunals is that the chairman or chairwoman tries very hard, if he or she is good—and many of the women are first class — to help the applicant in person, but it is not easy. If one talks to them and listens to them, they will say that people who have complex cases involving difficult questions of law are certainly better off to have legal representation.

I do not put the blame entirely on this Government. Again, I turned to our own Labour Government when we were in power because I have always believed that we should have brought in legal aid in industrial tribunals when we had the chance. I should also point out that it was not altogether the fault of the then Labour Government. The trade unions did not want it, and when they were faced by people like me who said to them, "Why not?", their answer was, "Bloody lawyer, feathering your own nest." When I said to them, "If a doctor asks for more medical help, you do not say, 'Bloody quack, feathering your own nest'", they said, "Ah, but that's different." I suggested to them, which I could do because I do not practise in industrial tribunals, that it is wrong to deprive members and non-members alike of the right to go to tribunals—and, by the way, the right to bring all claims concerning contracts of employment to tribunals and not to have to go to courts with one lot and tribunals with another, which is another idiocy—their answer was that it should all be dealt with on the shop floor which, in theory, is absolutely right. But, in practice, the person who goes to a tribunal unrepresented is now, and will remain, often at a great disadvantage.

It is all very well for the hon. Member for Elmet to say that people should not be represented, but the fact is that a substantial company is generally represented either by a lawyer or by an articulate personnel executive, probably one who has been trained to do the job, whereas the employee goes on his or her own or through a friend and cannot get legal representation. They can get legal advice under the legal aid and advice legislation on how to bring the claim, and as to whether it is worth bringing, but they have to represent themselves.

Most people are afraid of tribunals and courts. Most people are apprehensive when they get there. They do not like it. It is not their livelihood, and they are scared. So there is already the disincentive to go, and there is already the qualifying period, which is much too long. It is a period that is about to be doubled. There is no justification for that. Neither is there, nor has there been given to the House, a shred of evidence that to do so will create one single job in any part of the country. It is a discourtesy to the House to claim to protect employees by doubling the qualifying period without giving the evidence. There is only one reason for that being claimed by a Minister who is articulate. It is that there is no evidence.

The Minister is a nice man. If he had evidence, he would give it to us. He does not provide that evidence because there is no evidence. He keeps his speech short because if he went further he would sink himself in the mire. Not only is the Minister a nice man, but he is also shrewd. He knows that he must skirt around the mire as quickly as possible and then run like hell. That is exactly what he has done.

There is no evidence that further jobs will be created. There is no evidence that businesses have suffered because of the one-year period. There is no evidence that the new qualifying period will help employment in any way and and no evidence that it will reduce cases which are allegedly vexatious, frivolous or unreasonable. There is no evidence that people go to tribunals for fun. There is no evidence that the present 12-month qualifying period discourages firms from taking on people. There is no evidence, no case, no sense—only a very bad rotten piece of legislation that I hope even Conservative Members will throw out.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I should declare an interest because, although I am not a lawyer, I attend tribunals and represent people. Perhaps in my contribution I shall talk myself out of a job.

I shall describe the ways in which industrial tribunals have affected me. I was director of personnel, and the shop stewards' works committee told me that an employee was behaving in a peculiar way. We investigated the matter with the line manager and found that the employee was putting himself and other employees at risk and was liable to hurt himself and them.

After consultation we agreed that the employee should be dismissed. He went to the labour exchange to sign on and the first question that he was asked was 'Why are you out of work?" He said "I have just been dismissed." He was then asked whether he had commenced proceedings for unfair dismissal.

The chap was bemused at the time, signed a paper and proceedings were commenced against the company. In due course I and four or five colleagues, the convener and shop steward arrived at the place appointed for the hearing at nine o'clock in the morning and waited and waited. At the end of the day we were told that the man had not turned up. The chairman would not hear the case in his absence because he might have missed a bus or misread the date.

We all missed a day at work and had to work overtime to catch up and we were summoned to turn up at the tribunal four weeks later. The applicant did not turn up again and the chairman decided to allow the case to be heard. The convener of shop stewards said that the man was a herion addict and did not turn up for work regularly. That case cost the company many hundreds of pounds and it is not untypical. It is not the only case of which I have had personal experience.

Dr. Godman: I find the hon. Gentleman's anecdote of some interest. I have a couple of questions, one of which I shall ask now. I shall ask the other later if I catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Why did that decision, if it was reached in such a fair manner, need to be defended by five managers?

Mr. Holt: Because, like so many employers, we were unsure of the case that would be presented by the man when he turned up. No one knows what sort of lies will be told by the applicant. Therefore, it was necessary to have everyone there to give evidence.

I am speaking primarily because I do not believe for one moment that the order will produce one single job. The introduction of the order goes nowhere in the direction that it should so that we shall have more jobs and so that employers will be freed from the shackles and worries of the industrial tribunal. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary suggested that the change to two years is reasonable. I suggest that it is unreasonable because any employer should be able to assess whether a person is good enough in a very short time and not have to wait two, three or four years. Therefore, as far as I am concerned, this whole thing is rather specious.

It has been suggested that the Government do not have any figures for the likely number of people who will be affected by the introduction of the order. I have the official figures in a Department of Employment reply to a question that I asked, which states:

"This information is not available in the form requested. On the basis of a sample analysis of complaints of unfair dismissal for the calendar year 1983 it is estimated that 1,650 such complaints heard by an industrial tribunal involved persons who had been employed for more than one but less than two years.

The figure should be treated with caution because of the margin of error inherent in the sample." — [Official Report, 7 May 1985; Vol. 78, c. 361.]

If Ministers are to come along with legislation, and if they want support from Conservative Members as much as from Opposition Members, they have a duty and responsibility to present a case that is cogent and has statistical evidence to back it up. If the whole edifice is based on the probability of 1,650 cases as a sample analysis, albeit allowing for the errors that might accrue, I do not believe that it is worth keeping the House up until this time of night.

The case for small firms is another one of those "Spit in the wind and see that it doesn't hit you when it comes back," scenarios. Who picked on 20 people? Why not 25? Why not 50? Why not 100? How many employers will sit down, scratch their heads and say, "My God, I had better not take on another guy. That would mean I had 21 employees, which would put me within the scope of the Act."? In real life, that is not the way in which firms, personnel people and line managers deal with things. They say to themselves, "Have I got a vacancy? Do I need to employ somebody? Do I have the capability to offer a job to somebody? If I have, I shall offer someone a job, and I shall select the right person in the first place." In respect of small or large firms, no case has been made out for a period of one or two years, and the onus placed on the Government has not been discharged satisfactorily.

Small firms may have large turnovers. Alternatively, they may employ a large number of people — for example, on a vegetable stall—but their turnover may not be very great. However, all firms will be subjected to the majesty and panoply of the law.

I can tell the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) that even a humble personnel director would quake at the thought of going before one of these tribunals, because one does not know what it will do. Not only is the job of the employee on the line, but so is the job of the personnel director. If he fails with too many cases, he is liable to find himself out of work. Therefore, everyone walks into these tribunals in fear and trepidation.

Mr. Douglas Hogg rose——

Mr. Holt: I am not giving way. According to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State's predecessor, the purpose behind the legislation was to provide a cheap, speedy and informal means of redress. Cheap? My fees are not cheap, so it will not be cheap to employ a lawyer. I can assure the House that my fees are only a fraction of those of the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West.

Speedy? No figures are available as to the average length of time between a case being initiated and heard, but in those cases where there is a hearing, the median length of 13½ weeks has been estimated. In other words, the poor, cringing soul who has been fired, the poor, terrified personnel director, the foreman who did the firing and everyone else involved must wait 13½ weeks. More importantly, because of the way in which compensation is awarded, the employee will not take a job during that time because he will get more money if he is out of work. Therefore, the argument that people have gone into work is quite specious.

There are too many regulations. The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West said that the situation had become too complex, too complicated and too difficult. He is absolutely right. Rather than lengthening the time from one year to two years, the Government ought to have a total review of tribunals and their procedures. They should ban all the lawyers from participating and should limit the hearing to the appellant, the respondent and the respondent's employer.

The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West talked about deprived livelihoods. There is nothing more galling for a company than to train a person for a job only for that person to say after a year or 18 months, "Here is my week's notice. I am going off to work for your competitor." At present, the employer has no means of redress.

It is suggested that in unfair dismissal cases we can, with our hands on our hearts, look to the costs for frivolous or similar actions brought by employees. We are told that the comprehensive statistics regarding costs are not collected and that the Ministry does not know. But we do know.

In 1982 costs were awarded against applicants in about 150 cases out of approximately 15,000. What sort of money does an employer get? He gets an average of £55. The range is £5 to £400. Why do so many people telephone me to ask what it will cost them if they dismiss someone? I say, "£300 for my services and probably £200 if you sweat it out and get the tribunal to make an award." So the case does not go to a tribunal. The whole thing is swept under the carpet. The person goes away with £200 or £300 and does not have the stigma on his record of having gone to a tribunal.

The whole business of the tribunal has become too complex, too costly and too legal. If you do not believe me, go there. When you go in, you have to sit on one side, with the other party on the other. There is the witness box —"How do you swear?", "Don't intervene," "Shut up." It is like the High Court. There is not a free and open exchange of information between two people so that the tribunal can determine in the final analysis whether in its opinion someone has been dismissed unfairly. What the tribunal has to decide is whether in its opinion the law has been interpreted correctly according to the advice given by the legal clerk. It has nothing to do with the realities of working in a factory, in an office, on a farm or wherever. Reality does not come into it. Industrial tribunals have become another arm of the law, just like any of the others that we watch in "Bleak House" from time to time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) talked about cutting down the number of strikes. The speech of the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) on behalf of the Opposition was a travesty. I thought that tonight he might make a decent speech. Unfortunately, Opposition Members have not brought forward evidence to back up what they have been saying. I agree that it is difficult to prove that there has not been a strike for certain reasons. You would have to put into the ingredients the whole changing environment about going on strike. People are much more reluctant to go on strike than they used to be. Therefore, it is not reasonable to suggest with any degree of certainty that the number of strikes has gone down because of what has happened.

Mr. Evans: I never mentioned strikes.

Mr. Holt: My hon. Friend the Member for Elmet mentioned strikes. If you want to intervene, I will sit down.

Mr. Evans: No, carry on.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the percentage of strikes due to disciplinary causes dropped when the period was changed from 52 weeks to 26 weeks and then rose again when the period was extended? That evidence is on the record. I will quote the figures later if I am called.

Mr. Holt: I do not dispute that. Neither the hon. Gentleman nor I can prove or disprove negatives. Without a complete analysis of every case so as to reach conclusions, you are generalising——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Gentleman should not keep bringing me into these matters. I am not generalising at all.

Mr. Holt: I would not wish to bring you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, into something so uncontroversial as the order before us.

My hon. Friend the Minister might have brought along a welter of evidence to justify making the order. The prerequisite is that it will produce jobs. I shall judge whether the order will have that effect in my constituency, but I doubt whether it will produce many more jobs. I shall ask constituents whether they have been taken on as a result of the legislative changes that the Government have introduced.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Will my hon. Friend ask employers in his constituency whether they found it more attractive to take on employees following the legislative changes?

Mr. Holt: I do not accept that it is more attractive or that it will be. An employer will take on an employee if there is a vacancy, but he will not do so if there is a prospect of having to employ a barrister to defend the decision that he took in the prevailing circumstances.

I needed evidence before I could say that what the Government were doing was right. I do not believe that the Government's action is correct, but I take that view for reasons that are different from those of Opposition Members. The Government are not moving half far enough. They should be investigating the work of tribunals.

I thought that I would take the trouble, even if the Government would not, of acquainting myself with the views of relevant bodies. I telephoned the Institute of Personnel Management. Being a fellow of the institute, it cost me nothing to obtain the information. If the Government are short of a bob or two, I might give them a loan. The institute told me that it was still surveying the matter, but added that the order "would tidy up the present position". Does tidying up provide jobs? I suppose that the tidying-up exercise will make life easier for lawyers, but it will not make line managers, entrepreneurs or others in business any more inclined to take on employees or not to dismiss employees.

I contacted also the Engineering Employers' Federation. It said, "We welcome this but it should go further. It should be retrospective and for a longer period." It seems that the Government have not taken the federation along with them.

I spoke also to the British Institute of Management, of which I am also a fellow; therefore, I obtained free information. The institute has carried out a survey of its members to ascertain whether they feel that the order is right or wrong. The survey provided the crude statistical evidence that 65 per cent. are in favour of what the Government are doing, 32 per cent. are opposed and, typical of British management, 3 per cent. do not know what the answer is.

I said to myself, "All is not lost, there is always the CBI." Accordingly, I contacted the CBI.

Mr. Janner: Is the hon. Gentleman a member of the CBI?

Mr. Holt: No, I am not. I cannot afford that.

The CBI kindly provided me late this afternoon with a glossy book which I have with me. As the House will see, it still bears a compliments slip. I shall read the CBI's official position on this issue. A passage in the book reads:

"Following the announcement in the Budget, the Secretary of State for Employment has laid a draft Order before Parliament to increase the qualifying period of service for complaints of unfair dismissal to two years for all employees. This change will come into force on 1 June. The effect on the number of tribunal cases will not be felt for some time, but even then it will not be enormous. The effect on companies, existing recruitment practices and disciplinary procedures is likely to be marginal."

Of course I support the Government's attempt to produce more jobs.

Mr. Golding: Is the hon. Member aware that it is common for the Confederation of British Industry to be sceptical about Government legislation? The confederation is as aware as are hon. Members that the Institute of Directors has more influence on this Government than practical industrialists. What is the view of the Institute of Directors?

Mr. Holt: I must confess that I do not move in such exalted circles. Therefore, I am unable or unwilling to tread in waters where I might get my feet a little wet.

Mr. Robert C. Brown: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When the Government bring an order before the House it is incumbent upon them to produce evidence to justify the carrying of such an order. The only support the Government have received in this debate has been from the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) who is a member of the legal profession and who therefore has a vested interest in this matter. The devastating case put forward by the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) suggests to me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you ought to adjourn the House for 10 minutes to provide the Minister with an opportunity to produce evidence or to withdraw this tatty little order.

Mr. Holt: I have, I hope, made it absolutely and abundantly clear, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I am not opposed to the Government's intentions. I am opposed to their actions. They do not go far enough. This Act has been on the statute book since 1971. There has been no thorough review of the work of tribunals. They have become more and more legalistic and more and more costly. Tribunals now cost this country £20 million.

Mr. Cash: Could I please ask my hon. Friend, with whom I have the pleasure to share a room, and who frequently asks me for my opinion as a lawyer, which I am happy freely to give him at almost any time of the day or night, to tell me, because of the extreme attack that he has made on the legal profession this evening, how Acts of Parliament which come before tribunals would be interpreted if lawyers did not appear before them to provide help for those who need it in order that they may obtain justice before tribunals?

Mr. Holt: I was hoping not to have to introduce one little anecdote, but I am now being forced to do so. I must say to my room mate, if I may use that phrase, that when I set up in business as a consultant with some colleagues from personnel management we offered our services to small businesses and to others—we are not proud; we will take money from wherever it comes—and we took the step of advertising in the journal of the Conservative Small Business Bureau. This was not an unreasonable thing to do. Within 24 hours I had a letter from the Law Society saying, "Lay off. This is something for the Law."

Mr. Cash: As the vice-chairman of the Conservative Small Business Bureau, may I say to my room mate that I should be glad to look into that matter, particularly as I happen also to be on one of the parliamentary committees of the Law Society. I shall take it up with both bodies.

Mr. Holt: I appreciate my room mate's offer. I shall take it up gladly and will be affected by it as much as I was affected by the letter from the Law Society. I continued to practise with my colleagues. We do a better job more cheaply than the lawyers, because it is based upon the real life experience of workers in factories. It is not based upon something that one has read about in books or seen inside a court of law or before tribunals.

Mr. Crowther: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Could not this private dispute between the hon. Members for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) and for Stafford (Mr. Cash) be carried out in the privacy of their room?

Mr. Holt: That is a practical proposition that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and I should be delighted to take up. I did share a room with someone else, but we would not have been able to have any conversation because I could not get a word in edgeways.

During the course of my short, frequently interrupted, contribution I have sought to introduce a small element of levity because I often find that the ponderous goings on of lawyers drive most people to despair. That is one of the reasons why few cases go to tribunals. None of us wants to go to them, even if the money is good.

If my hon. Friends cannot occasionally stand a little tickling around the ribs, they are not men enough for the job. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is man enough for the job and will take on board what I am saying. I am trying to make the serious point that the tribunals have become over-legislated. The order is meaningless. There should have been a proper review of tribunals and their procedures. I believe that that would be welcomed by both sides of industry and by all the elements of management to which I have referred. Although I have not tried to contact it, I dare say that the TUC would welcome it if tribunals were once again made simple, speedy and cheap.

If I may paraphrase, the order might be a small step for the Government, but I believe that it is a minuscule step towards helping the unemployed. The fanfare with which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor unveiled the proposal in his speech was a smoke screen. It will not create one job.

My job, as the Member of Parliament for a constituency which has the highest unemployment in mainland Great Britain, is to prod the Government into doing something which will help to produce jobs. The employers to whom I speak want the Government to wipe the legislation off the books, to stop tinkering with it, or at least to make it simpler, cheaper and speedier, so that, irrespective of whether the period is six months, one year or two years, the people who are most involved—those who have been fired and those who have done the firing—can go before a lay body as quickly as possible for it to adjudicate, like a jury, on whether the dismissal was fair or unfair.

In the last case with which I dealt there were 10 references to previous cases. We sat for hours going through what people had said previously to different tribunals. Finally the managing director was asked the simple question, "Given all the facts, would you do the same again?" He replied, "Yes, I would fire him because he was no good." The tribunal found against the company. I accept the fact that the tribunal found against the company that I was representing, but the case had cost too much in time, research, and heartache.

The Government would be well advised to let the order go through, but to study properly the whole subject of tribunals.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): Considering that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) managed to spend 33 minutes talking about the order—and at the conclusion of his remarks I was not sure whether he was for or against it—I was surprised by his claim that he had managed to speed up the work of tribunals.

The hon. Gentleman, nevertheless, made some interesting points. I agree with him that the order will not make any difference to the nation's total unemployment statistics. Indeed, there cannot be many hon. Members who believe that it will have much effect on unemployment. Nor do I accept the claim of the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) that labour protection legislation increases jobs. It does not make much difference either way.

However, the justification for this kind of legislation is to inject into the labour market a degree of justice for the individual. When a person appears before a tribunal, local people—that person's friends and colleagues—have a view about whether the dismissal was justified, might have been justified or was completely unjustified. People have a corrosive feeling of anger when they believe that, say, Bill, who has given a substantial period of service to the company, has been dismissed for unjustifiable reasons. That is the real justification for legislation such as this. While no system can be perfect, it gives people an opportunity to have their cases heard and for some compensation to be offered if an outrage has been committed.

That is the justification for the legislation, but the order is a move in the wrong direction; and what saddens me is the feeling that the Minister agrees with me. He adduced no evidence for the order, just tittle-tattle about what might have been said over the bar in the Conservative club quite late at night.

Much the same level of argument is put to me by some of my local small employers about the abolition of wages councils. They argue that if they could pay a little less, they would be more competitive and be able to offer more jobs. There is some truth in that, so long as it applies only to them and not to all their competitors who are beating them. If an employer is the only one to be allowed to lower wages, of course he can undercut his competitor down the road. But one presumes that if wages councils are abolished—hon. Members on the Opposition Benches, regardless of party, pray that they will be retained—they will be abolished universally. In other words, employers who argue that the abolition of wages councils will create more jobs are simply indulging in tittle-tattle.

The Minister argued that an employer needed a period in which to get to know the qualities of an employee. There may be some truth in the argument that a person may join a company and work with enthusiasm and dedication for a time, and that that period should be long enough to enable the employer to judge that employee's behaviour, attitude and enthusiasm. That is an argument for having a period of some length. The Minister argued, however, that by increasing the period from one year to two years, that will significantly increase the understanding that an employer can have of an employee. Not many employers believe that, certainly not many employees believe that, and we on the Opposition Benches do not believe that. If an employer cannot decide in a whole year—in 52 weeks of 40 hours a week—whether Bill or Mary, or whoever, is satisfactory to be employed by that company, the idea that two years will be the right period is a fantasy, and the Minister knows it.

This is part of a steady erosion of rights. Far too many Conservative Members believe that the solution to the 3·5 million unemployment problem is to remove some of the minimal rights that exist. They believe in a peculiar fatalistic way that if they remove enough of those rights fast enough, suddenly employers will begin to employ more people. That, again, is not true.

As the hon. Member for Langbaurgh said, employers take on employees because they see an opportunity to use those people's skills to their own advantage. I do not complain about that. That is the way in which our economy has grown. The reason why there are now nearly 4 million unemployed is that the Government are running the economy in such a way that employers no longer see any way of using the skills available in a satisfactory and economic way.

People tend, sometimes without justification, to feel weak and vulnerable vis-a-vis their employers, and the Government have made them feel even more so. People's rights in relation to unfair dismissal are gradually being taken away. That is a bad thing and it is a sad day for Parliament — one of a series of days that the Government will come to regret.

This is a move in the wrong direction and, saddest of all, I suspect that the Conservative Member most convinced of that is the Minister who made the rather inadequate attempt to justify the measure when he opened the debate.

12.5 am

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Despite all the noise and excitement generated among the Opposition, we are actually discussing when a qualifying period should arise. That does not give rise to massive questions of principle, and in view of Labour Members' attitudes to this in the past they are not in a good position to argue about it as a matter of principle today.

The qualifying period of two years was first introduced in the 1971 Act. In 1974 the period was reduced to one year by the Labour Government and the following year it was reduced to six months. The concept of a qualifying period, however, has been preserved throughout. There is a similarity between the right not to be unfairly dismissed and the right not to be made redundant. For more than 20 years Parliament has accepted that there should be a qualifying period before a person becomes entitled to redundancy payment. That goes right back to 1960. The qualifying period is two years and the Labour party has always accepted that.

I do not find that fact at all remarkable, because the right not to be unfairly dismissed is a very valuable one, giving rise to a large number of fairly substantial financial benefits. The benefits may well be quite correct, but the House must always consider whether such rights should arise immediately upon the formation of a contract of employment and by virtue of that fact alone. I do not agree that they should.

The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) referred at some length to probationary periods, but that is not really the purpose of the qualifying period. In my view, the reason for the qualifying period is that people should have to justify their entitlement to this fairly valuable right. Whether the period of justification should be six months, 12 months or two years is not a matter of principle but a rather nice difference of judgment as to how the balance should be weighted.

I think that most Members now agree that the containment of unemployment is the strategic purpose of Government and Parliament at this time and every benefit and policy that we bring forward must be tested against that objective. When this measure is tested against that yardstick one sees the advantages that are likely to accrue.

My hon. Friends have referred to the disadvantages faced by small employers in this context. I appear frequently in cases involving these matters. Last month, I was involved in a case concerning a small employer whose entire work force of six would have had to attend the tribunal for two days. An employee had resigned. The employer was seeking to argue that the resignation constituted a constructive dismissal. I took the view that he was wrong and had no chance, and advised the employer accordingly. the employer was faced with the fact that he would necessarily incur substantial costs and his entire work force would have to attend for two days. That was understandably unacceptable to him, and so a payment had to be made. A payment was made. This happens repeatedly.

Hon. Members ask, "Where is the evidence that any job will be created directly as a result of this change in the legislation?" I admit that I cannot come forward with direct evidence.

Mr. Prescott: Neither can the Government.

Mr. Hogg: But, in the end, one comes forward with the impression, which is made in good faith — [Interruption.] Hon. Members must try to approach these issues with open minds. They must try to be open-minded on questions of employment. Repeatedly, both professionally and in my political capacity, it has been made clear to me that the framework of the legislation makes small employers in particular less willing take on more employees.

Mr. Prescott: Where is the evidence?

Mr. Hogg: We come back again and again to the question of judgments made in good faith.

Mr. Janner: Without evidence.

Mr. Hogg: Of course it is based on evidence.

Mr. Janner: Where is it?

Mr. Hogg: I have told the hon. and learned Gentleman. If only he would listen, but he never does. I have told the House the evidence that I have been receiving.

Mr. Janner: Where is it?

Mr. Hogg: If the hon. and learned Gentleman would only shut up for one moment, he might hear it. I have repeatedly been told by employers, in my political and legal capacities——

Mr. Janner: Hearsay.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. and learned Gentleman knows all about hearsay, because he makes his living out of it. He would do well to listen just occasionally.

Mr. Janner: There is no need to be offensive about it.

Mr. Hogg: I would certainly not be offensive to the hon. and learned Gentleman, whom I rather like, but he would do well just to listen. One repeatedly hears people say, "I would take on more people if it were less unattractive for me to do so."

Mr. Evans: Anecdotes.

Mr. Hogg: They may be, but they may reveal the facts. We must try to reduce people's anxieties about the existing law. This measure is a legitimate step in that direction. I hope that, as a consequence, and judged against a yardstick of improving jobs, the House will support the order.

12.12 am

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): Unlike a number of hon. Members who have spoken tonight, I intend to make a short contribution. The hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) referred to small firms. That matter is not strictly relevant to the order. Apparently, the order wipes out the difference between those employed by small firms and those employed by larger firms and subjects them all to the same injustice. I have never understood why people employed by a company with 20 employees should be denied rights that apply to people employed by a company with 21 employees. Apparently, the order applies the same injustice to everybody, so that seems to wipe out the difference.

The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) raised an interesting, but totally irrelevant, point. He talked of his belief, which I share, that an employer who has been employing someone for 12 months should by then know whether that person is suitable for the job. That is true, but it is totally irrelevant, because we are not talking about whether people are suitable for a job. If they are sacked because they are not doing the job properly, that is fair. Here we are talking about unfair dismissal. I do not understand why it is all right for people to be unfairly sacked at a certain period but not right for them to be unfairly sacked at a later period. It is wrong for people to be unfairly sacked at any time. If they have been working somewhere for only one day, they should not be unfairly dismissed. That is the real issue here.

I accept the point, rightly made by the hon. Member for Grantham, that my party has in the past accepted a qualifying period. I think we were wrong to do that. Justice demands that people should be compensated or reinstated if they are unfairly dismissed, irrespective of how long they have been employed. If they are incompetent or dishonest, they should be sacked without compensation, but if the dismissal is unfair the qualifying period is totally irrelevant.

12.15 am

Mr. Ernie Roberts (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I speak not as a lawyer but as someone who has been a shop steward for 25 years, and as a national trade union official with some experience of dismissals and protection against dismissals.

The order will remove the right of a worker to go before a tribunal and appeal against unfair dismissal if he has been employed for less than two years. There are nearly 4 million people in Britain who have been unfairly dismissed. It is not their responsibilty that they have been dismissed. They have not been dismissed for any reason for which they have been responsible. It is the responsibility of the Government.

I am opposed to the order being sneaked in at this late hour because it cannot stand the light of day. The order is absolutely irrelevant to job creation. Its aim is to make sacking easier and cheaper. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) that, in spite of what has been said from the Conservative Benches, there should be no qualifying period.

I know from my experience that shop stewards, workers and trade union representatives generally are always under the threat of victimisation by their employers. It happens continually. There was far better protection under the essential works order. It often protected me when I was at work. It operated at a time when the country needed the workers' labour and was prepared to give them protection in their jobs.

The extension of the order to two years will hit particularly school leavers and those who are at present unemployed. They will be under constant threat of dismissal if, on getting a job, they do not work for the pay set down by employers and at the speed and under the conditions demanded by them. That is what the order is about. It is a weapon to be used for that purpose. The threat of the sack is the big stick that the employers will use against workers, and they will have two years' free bashing of work people to make them do what the employers want them to do.

Directors and top management — there are some representatives here — are well protected against unfair dismissal. They are protected by contracts with companies which provide massive golden handshakes. Those who own and control the means of production, distribution and exchange will use their power to hire and fire as they please. Their only concern will always be to make as much profit as they can and to squeeze as much work as they can from people they employ.

It would be far better if this Government introduced an order on the right to work rather than one on the right to sack. They should pay more attention to that. The Government and the employers know that the order will produce more strikes because that will be the only method for workers to obtain justice because they cannot take their case to a tribunal until two years has elapsed. Their only defence of their jobs will be to strike. The order will provoke more industrial unrest.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): One thing we know clearly — that the directors of this country have voted substantial sums of money, millions of pounds, to the Conservative party. That is the argument for the order. My hon. Friends have said that the Government have produced no argument for the order — they do not need to do so because they have received payment for this order.

I do not know whether the Government are introducing the order because it will please the Institute of Directors, or whether it is because the Institute of Directors has twisted their arm. The order is ideological. It is not even seen to be in the interests of those managers in indutry who actually manage. The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) gave the game away when he read from the CBI brief. The practical managers, who often find themselves at loggerheads with the directors, are saying that the effect of this order on employment will be marginal. So why has it been introduced? It is because the Government think that they must pay the debt that they incurred to the directors before the general election. They are paying with our time for the money that they received to help them win the general election.

The paucity of the Minister's speech has been mentioned already. Have we ever known a debate with so much criticism of the Minister, but not one note of reply being sent from the officials' Box through the PPS to the Minister? Not one item of refutation has been passed. The PPS tonight has been one of the idle layabouts on the Government Benches. It has been a remarkable debate. The Minister has not made a case and the officials have not been able to think of one refutation of the arguments presented.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman be good enough to explain how it was that in 1978, when the precursor to this order was going through the House and the Labour party was in Government, it allowed a private Member's Bill that contained the essence of this order to be passed against the then Government's Whip because Labour Members did not turn up to support their Government?

Mr. Golding: I do not think that that is relevant, for reasons that you and I know, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It may be embarrassing to Conservative Members because a very distinguished Member of the House was in charge of industrial relations legislation at the time. I know that there would be embarrassment if I referred to him.

Mr. Cash: I wish to complete the story by explaining that I have some knowledge of this because I drafted the Bill in question.

Mr. Golding: The only argument we have heard from Conservative Members who are lawyers — and I emphasise that we have heard no criticism from Conservative Members who are practising managers — is that these procedures are inconvenient and costly to the employers.

I do not know whether Conservative Members know how inconvenient and costly it is to be sacked. The right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) has been unfairly dismissed, and has translated himself into centre forward. But, that apart, I do not think that Conservative Members know what it is like to go home to one's wife and family and explain that one has got the sack. It is more than an inconvenience. It is rather worse than having to sit two days in some ante-room waiting for a case to be heard. To have to go home and say, "I have had the sack. Look, it was unfair. Look, it was not my fault. I have suffered because of the arbitrary whim of some manager." It is not just inconvenient. It can be a disaster.

Talking in terms of cost, in the survey, unprompted, managers disclosed that the cost was about £4,000. But when they thought of what they were claiming on their tax forms, they increased that to £15,000. Let us say that the cost for the employer is between £4,000 and £15,000. That is minimal when one considers the employer's turnover compared with the loss of wages to an individual who is unfairly dismissed. To a company, the inconvenience and the cost of having to go a tribunal to justify an unfair dismissal is infinitesimal compared to the cost to the individual who has been sacked.

Mr. Janner: To reinforce what my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) says, is he aware that the average award to a person who is among the 30 per cent. who succeed is only about £850, which is far less than the amount that could be awarded, which is very seldom reached?

Mr. Golding: I am not as familiar with the facts as is my hon. and learned Friend, but I do know that the legislation has had many beneficial effects. First, as has been pointed out—and whether one can quantify it I do not know—it has provided an alternative to strike action on the shop floor. It has removed a lot of the frustration and grievance among people who sometimes do not feel strongly enough to strike. It has removed the demoralisation that is always present among groups when they think that they are subject to arbitrary power.

What Conservative Members do not understand in my view is that working people without vast savings and an accumulation of capital behind them are in a weak position when faced with such employers. If the employers can do without the individual employee, the individual employee cannot do without the wages. These individuals are weak. When these weak individuals face people who can take decisions on an arbitrary basis, they feel very humiliated when the decisions are taken on anything other than just grounds.

I do not say that all dismissal decisions are unfair—obviously not. But some are. Conservative Members will cite cases of irresponsibility on the part of the employees. Of course there will be some of those. Of course in the isolated case the employee will be irresponsible. However, many employers take decisions which are based not on reason but on whether they feel at home with the employee. Sometimes the employer will be upset by what is happening in his domestic life and will take odd decisions for odd reasons. When a decision is as important as a sacking it must be fair. There must be some resort to an outside body when a person believes that his dismissal is unfair.

Government Members argue that at a time of high unemployment it is more important to create jobs than to be fair. In a nutshell, that is their argument. The argument is not new. During the period of the Labour Government between 1976 and 1979 I spent a lot of time talking to employers throughout the country. Often I heard the argument that the employment protection legislation militated against employment. When I cross-examined the person arguing that point I was usually told "That does not apply to us, but we've heard that it applies to somebody else." Not one employer said "It affects me."

We introduced a number of studies because the Government were worried about the effect of what they had done. At that time 1·4 million people were unemployed and we felt a deep sense of responsibility towards them. Those studies are often quoted. I refer to a paper by Daniel entitled "The effects of employment protection laws in manufacturing industry," published in the Employment Gazette, June 1978 and to a paper by Daniel and Stilgoe entitled "The impact of employment protection laws," published by the Policy Studies Institute in 1978. There is also a paper by Clifton and Tatton Browne entitled "The impact of employment legislation on small firms," published by the Department of Employment as research paper No. 6 of 1979.

I was responsible for those studies, which all came to the same conclusion. There was an impact, but it did not decide whether employers recruited. The biggest impact was on the care taken when recruiting. That is right. It is irresponsible for an employer to take on someone knowing that he might be sacked. A responsible employer knows what the job means and must ensure that the person recruited is suitable and that he fits in within the first few months.

To say that two years are needed before one can know whether a person is doing a job properly is poppycock. If it takes a person that long to decide, he is not doing his job properly and should be sacked. We are talking about manual workers, not sophisticated people. I believe that what the Government are doing is wrong.

I have talked about the inequality of the worker and the employer. It happens before the tribunal as well. The hon. Member for Langbaurgh almost brought tears to my eyes when he talked about how he, as a director of personnel, quaked before going into a court. But he went in with four other people. He was well briefed, with all the substantial resources of the firm behind him. He should think of the individual who has been sacked, who usually cannot take four or five people with him. Why? Because the others are frightened of victimisation. We in the Labour party know that that happens over and over again. If one asks, "Who will give evidence?", the first time Sarah, Jane, Bill and Joe say that they will. A week later they say that they are frightened to give evidence because the boss will victimise them.

My hon. Friends on the Front Bench are pleading with me to sit down. It is the story of my life, but I shall do so —only because it is a plea from my Front Bench. I believe this to be one of the most iniquitous things that the Government have done, because they do it without reason. They do it against workers everywhere. They do it to repay the debt of money given to the Conservative party before the last general election.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): I had thought that following the speech by the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) the Minister would graciously withdraw the order and creep away quietly, instead of keeping us up after the midnight hour.

The point that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh made about the law getting mixed up in tribunals is something that I have fought against ever since its inception. We had a first-class example of what happens when the law gets mixed up in such matters when the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) got on his feet. Never in his life has he been sacked on the spot and had to go home to reveal the news to his family.

With the present level of unemployment, employers can be very choosey when engaging labour. Prospective employees, for the same reason, are anxious to please prospective employers. Therefore, at present the scales are weighted heavily in favour of employers.

We were told by the Minister in his short speech that employers were afraid of going to tribunals. I believe that the fear is on the part of the employees, not the employers.

Last night, together with colleagues, I met a delegation of women clothing workers from the west midlands. Those who worked part-time were paid 50p an hour. I understand that the delegation was seen by a Conservative Member who is now in the Chamber. He may want to corroborate what I am saying. People in full-time employment were being paid about £1 an hour. The women found that their tax and holidays were being fiddled. They were in difficulty with the Department of Health and Social Security. Notwithstanding that, they were extremely chary of having their cases taken up, because, bad though they were, merely to reveal them would have meant the sack. Indeed, one woman, who had had the effrontery to organise her workmates into a trade union, was promptly sacked. In another case, the employer was so determined not to allow trade unionism into his factory that he shut it down and reopened a few months later in premises on the opposite side of the road.

Last night we listened to those women. I do not know whether the Conservative Member wants to corroborate what I have said. I shall give him the chance to do so, but I have not identified him because I do not wish to embarrass him unnecessarily.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): The hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park) has referred to a visit here yesterday by some immigrant workers who, in the main, are largely employed by immigrant employers. Many of their circumstances were most unsatisfactory, and what the hon. Gentleman has said is largely correct.

Mr. Park: Except that I did not mention immigrants. To me an employer is an employer. I am interested only in the circumstances. From what I heard last night, it was clear that fear existed among the employees. It did not exist among the employers, who seem to have the whip hand.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) that it stretches the bounds of credulity to suppose that, given the initial ability to be choosy, an employer should support the idea of requiring two years to assess whether an individual will fit into the set-up. I cannot believe that.

There has been no evidence to support the order. In fact, the hon. Member for Langbaurgh, figuratively speaking, stripped the Minister bare. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary has not responded at all, and that is a scandal. This is just another turn of the screw in relation to the policy announced by the Conservatives when they first came into office. They said that the balance of advantage was too much on the side of the trade unions and that they would do something about it. This order is part of that process.

The Government's purpose is to undermine the trade union movement and to remove the possibility that people can be treated fairly. As my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) said, the Minister must tell us why any employer should have the right unfairly to dismiss anyone at any time.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I agree with much of what my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) said about the traumatic consequences of whimsical managerial decision making. The shock of being sacked and deprived of one's livelihood is dreadful.

I saw a lot of scandalously bad management among British trawler companies north and south of the border. Since the 1970s many of those companies have gone to the wall. That should not surprise anyone, because they were lousy managers of that most important and valuable resource — their employees. Their strategic decision making about the development of their companies in the changing international fishery regime was as bad. Many of them have disappeared from the scene. There are a couple of honourable exceptions in Aberdeen, but many employers in the British fishing industry are inefficient.

Some elements of the Industrial Relations Act 1971 — the concept of unfair dismissal and the code of practice — led to a proliferation of industrial relations training in British companies for managers and shop stewards. In those days some of my hon. Friends talked about throwing out the whole Act when they returned to power. I used to say, "Have a care because you may throw out the baby with the proverbial bath water." As the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) said, the concept of unfair dismissal is valuable, not just to trade unionists. Many managers in British industry have suffered at the hands of superiors who have a philosophy and practice of hire and fire.

In my experience of fairly large Scottish companies, the 1971 Act, plus other legislation passed by the Labour Government between 1974 and 1979, led to a growing professionalism among personnel managers and among shop stewards. In the 1970s we saw the development of more humane grievance and discipline procedures in many large companies. I cannot speak about small companies because I have little or no experience of them.

At an industrial relations training course in which I participated as a trainer, the managing director of the biggest company in Edinburgh said to his managers who were assembled for the course, "I do not want this company ever to have to appear in front of an industrial tribunal. This labour legislation will ensure that we become better managers when we deal with that important resource—our work people."

There has been a reference to the informality of industrial tribunals. For many people the prospect of appearing in front of the three wise men, or the three wise women, is daunting. The hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) referred to someone not turning up because he was a heroin addict; that must be an exceptional case. I suspect that many people do not turn up at tribunals because they are frightened at the prospect of taking part in what is for them an intimidating procedure.

One aspect that has hardly been touched upon in the debate, is the effect that labour legislation over the past 20 years has had on the role of the personnel manager and on his or her increasing professionalism. It seems that the object of recruitment and selection processes is to obtain the right person for the job. With professional personnel management, we should not need the threat of being able to bag a person.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Does my hon. Friend recall that in his constituency Greenock Morton football club dismissed its assistant manager, Mr. Mike Jackson? His case was upheld when it was heard by a tribunal and it was considered that he was unfairly dismissed, but Mr. Jackson was told that he had to meet all the legal costs. He received not one ha'penny in compensation. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that instead of weakening protection for those in employment the Government should be introducing proposals to strengthen the right of those like Mr. Jackson, who was badly and unfairly treated.

Dr. Godman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for providing the House with that sad illustration. I am a supporter of Greenock Morton but not a director. Incidentally, the club has been overtaken by other sad circumstances in that it has been relegated from the premier league. I am sure that it will be back next season.

The regressive measure before us might take away some of the incentive to continue the process of enhancing the professionalism of industrial relations and personnel management. Surely the object of labour legislation is to ensure that an individual's terms and conditions of employment mean that he is treated fairly and reasonably.

I recognise that there are occasions when a person has to be dismissed if his or her conduct is sufficiently dreadful. However, with efficient recruitment and selection procedures there should be no need to provide harsh sanctions that can be used by less than honest and fair managers in both small and large companies. Over the past 20 years there has been a distinct improvement in labour relations in many companies. That improvement has been brought about to some extent by a more formalised set of grievance and disciplinary procedures. In many of the companies with which I have been associated, the individual can seek redress of grievance right up to board level. Some Scottish industries have tribunals that are formed from within the industries. That is the way ahead for industrial relations and for grievance and disciplinary procedures.

The measure that is before us will harm industrial relations. It will damage the position of skilled workers, including women workers, members of the hierarchy within a company and those in lowly positions. It will threaten the position of many managers. The order goes further than threatening the interests of those on the shop floor or those doing menial work in offices throughout the land. It is lousy legislation and it will encourage lousy managers to behave in a lousy way to their work force. It is a disgrace.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Nobody could have listened to this debate without concluding that the whole weight of the argument has been with the Opposition and against the Government's proposals. No attempt has been made by Conservative Members to present an argument in favour of the order, except the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), though I do not believe that he assisted the Government's case. For the Government to introduce in such a way a measure of this character and scale is, as my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) has just said, a disgrace. It will injure industrial relations in this country.

The origin of the measures dealing with unfair dismissal was not necessarily the 1971 Act. Unfair dismissal was included for the first time in that Act, but its origin lies in recommendations contained in the Donovan report. That report recommended that certain industrial disputes could be avoided if proper and fair procedures were established in industry. The Labour Government intended to introduce such a measure before they left office in 1970. Later we repealed all of the odious and offensive provisions of the 1971 Act, but we insisted that the unfair dismissal provisions should be retained and improved. Many Conservative Members also agree that we should persuade employers to support such a measure. That is why the original legislation included a fixed period. We were able to persuade the vast majority of employers to back the legislation and to ensure that it worked.

All that the Government are doing is attempting to carry out the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget proposals. He knows nothing about industrial relations. Nobody has ever suggested that he does. Nor has it been suggested that the Department of Employment Ministers want the order. When it was examined in detail, it was found that no case had been made. Therefore, the best thing that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment can do tonight is to say that he will withdraw the order. That is the best service that he can render not merely to industrial relations, but to the Government.

I regret that the Tory wets have not attended this debate. We should greatly have welcomed a contribution from the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire South-East (Mr. Pym) and from several other Conservative Members who have vowed to introduce compassion and intelligence into this Government. Not one of those right hon. or hon. Members has attended the debate. Therefore, I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will come out in his true colours and say what a miserable order this is, that he proposes to withdraw it, take it to the Prime Minister tomorrow, and dare her to dismiss him for doing a good deed.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): This order is an example of policies based upon slogans and dogma rather than upon serious evidence. We are told that the Centre Forward group has realised that the economic policies of the Government are based upon slogans and dogma. That is clearly right. They have been tested to destruction. They are not working, yet the sloganising and the dogma continue. This order provides yet another example.

The debate has also demonstrated the advantage of trade union-sponsored Members of Parliament. I am proud to declare that I am sponsored by the National Union of Public Employees, while a number of my hon. Friends who have contributed to the debate are also sponsored by trade unions—for example, by the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers, the Post Office Engineering Union and the Transport and General Workers' Union.

Conservative Members have suggested that these provisions are of no importance, that they provide no protection for workers and that they make no difference. Workers value them. Workers are unfairly dismissed, and they feel angry when that happens. They want the right to take action against an employer who treats them in such a way. It is not good enough to look at cases like that of the heroin addict. That story does not ring true.

Mr. Holt: I am sure that the hon. Lady does not wish to call me a liar. I shall send her chapter and verse.

Ms. Short: I should not dream of calling the hon. Gentleman a liar. I meant that the case was not typical of cases with which my right hon. and hon. Friends are familiar.

The difficulties that firms face when dealing with an uncontested case have been mentioned. Conservative Members do not understand that we set standards so that most employers most of the time do not go around unfairly dismissing their workers. If there were no provisions and penalties, there would be far more cases of unfair dismissal.

It is not good enough to measure the cost of the contested case and say that it benefits only the individual involved. The protection of the law applies to all workers who are unfairly dismissed, because the provisions exist.

My hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) quoted the extraordinary statement made by the Secretary of State for Employment in a press release on 19 March 1985 justifying this proposal shortly after the Budget. He said:

"The risk of unjustified involvement with tribunals in unfair dismissal cases and the costs of such involvement are often cited as deterring employers from giving more people jobs. This change . . . should help reduce the reluctance of employers to take on more people, while still preserving a fair balance between the reasonable interests of employer and employee."

How weak that is. It says, "often cited" and "should help". It contains no evidence.

Let me consider the evidence, because this is an important matter and a great deal of evidence is available, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) made clear. Allegations and rumours that the employment protection laws prevent employers taking on workers have been going on for a long time. The Labour Government therefore commissioned a series of academic studies to test them. The first was conducted by the Policy Studies Institute. W. W. Daniel, who has a reputation for high-quality research on this subject, with someone called Stilgoe, whose work I do not know, studied the manufacturing sector—in particular, firms employing between 50 and 50,000 people. Their conclusions were summarised in an article which appeared in the Department of Employment Gazette in June 1978. They had studied all the employment protection legislation. They said:

"The aspect of employment protection legislation to have had the most widespread impact upon employers has been unfair dismissal requirements. Their prime effect has been to encourage the reform or formalisation of procedures adopted in taking disciplinary action and in executing dismissals. They have had a secondary influence upon the degree of care exercised by managers in selecting new employees and appraising the performance of existing ones. At the same time our evidence suggests that unfair dismissal measures have reduced the rates of dismissal, particularly in establishments where levels were relatively very high prior to the legislation. There was no general indication in relation to the sectors of industry which we studied that employment protection legislation was inhibiting management from taking on new labour where they otherwise would have done so."

That study was funded by the Department of Employment.

More significantly, the study tells us that when the authors asked managers what the effect of the legislation had been, many said that it improved the quality of their management. I quote from the findings of the study because the arguments are important and should be heeded by Conservative Members and, in particular, by the Minister. Managers

"felt that on balance the Employment Protection Act had been advantageous to them. They most commonly referred to the way it had helped and encouraged them to establish agreed procedures, most frequently with regard to discipline, but also for regulating other terms and conditions of employment. They no longer suffered the consequences of line managers or supervisors taking arbitrary or idiosyncratic decisions. Further benefits attributed to employment legislation included the report that it meant"— and we must bear in mind that managers are speaking in this passage—

"that trade union representatives had less scope to exploit uncertainty and ambiguity."

That refers to less conflict in the workplace.

"Employees and their representatives knew where they stood and the labour relations climate had improved in consequence. Greater management attention was devoted to human resources and management was required to be systematic and explicit in its evaluation and use of human resources. Job specification, selection and appraisal of performance had been improved and more regard was paid to seeing that people were properly trained."

I hope that the Minister has noted that. We continually hear speeches and receive press releases in which the Government bemoan the low level of training in this country, yet they disrupt the small amount of machinery that exists to encourage training. The example that we have tonight will encourage employers to adopt bad employment practices, including less training.

The study added:

"Personnel considerations were more salient and the influence of the personnel function had increased."

In other words, according to that study, many managers said that the effect of legislation was to improve the quality of their management, to improve industrial relations and to lessen the amount of conflict in the workplace.

It may be said by some Conservative Members that that study applied to quite large firms — of 50-plus employees — in manufacturing, whereas they had referred to the problems of small firms. Another study was commissioned on that subject. The Department of Employment's research paper No. 6, on the impact of employment legislation on small firms, published in July 1979, having asked small firms a series of detailed questions, stated:

"What general conclusions can be drawn from these factual findings? The results counter the suggestion that the legislation had some massive and widespread effect on small firms. Only 6 per cent. mentioned employment legislation and 2 per cent. health and safety legislation as among the main problems faced by their firms. Less than 9 per cent. mentioned these issues when asked about Government measures that had caused difficulty. When asked directly if employment legislation had affected them, 65 per cent. said it had not. Only 12 per cent. had found particular pieces of employment legislation troublesome when faced with a specific list. Over 60 per cent. believed that the legislation had not made it more difficult to dismiss staff. When firms were asked to explain their labour market behaviour—that is, why they had not expanded their staff as much as would have been expected"— the whole thrust of the Government's argument is that treating workers in a worse way will lead to more employment—

"only two out of 81 respondents mentioned the Employment Protection Act."

We can proceed to examine the statistics collected by the Department of Employment. An article by Kevin Williams analysing the statistics in considerable detail appeared in the Industrial Law Journal in which he examined the figures for 1972 to 1981. He wrote:

"The statistics do not support the popular mythology."

It is the popular mythology, unsupported by the research evidence and unsupported by the statistics, on which the Government are proceeding tonight. They should be ashamed of themselves. The article went on to comment that since the legislation came into force and statistics were collected

"almost a quarter of a million complaints have been disposed of. Less than 1 per cent. of all employment terminations had gone through the procedures and less than 3 per cent. of all dismissals."

Mr. Cash: To bring matters a little more up to date, does the hon. Lady accept that, of the 10,381 cases which went to hearing, 68 per cent. were dismissed, showing that there was no real substance in the cases?

Mr. Prescott: That question was planted.

Ms. Short: It is interesting to note that after the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme about the civil servants in the Box not passing any notes out the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) went over there and was presumably given that profound statistic. Certainly the operation of the legislation has deteriorated and there are fewer findings of unfair dismissal, but that is part of our case rather than the hon. Gentleman's case as fewer and fewer firms are inconvenienced by adverse findings.

Since the Government took power in 1979 and adopted the dogmatic and destructive economic policies from which the country is suffering the number of unfair dismissal claims has increased because when jobs cannot be found and losing one's job may mean prolonged unemployment workers are more likely to pursue their claims. The argument that out of sheer malice unreasonable employees complaining too much and causing great trouble to virtuous employers who are employers who are desperately trying to create jobs for all the poor unemployed is utterly false. There are endless procedures to screen out such cases and heavy penalties can be imposed on any worker acting in that way. Moreover, if costs are awarded against the applicant, that in itself is a serious penalty for a person who has no legal aid and has already lost his job.

Two thirds of all complaints are withdrawn or settled at the conciliation stage and never reach the tribunals which cause all the knee-knocking described by the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) in his entertaining contribution. The employee may withdraw his claim or the conciliation process through ACAS may arrive at a settlement acceptable to both sides. The remaining cases go on to the tribunal, where the success rate is one in four and declining.

Who takes cases of unfair dismissal to the tribunal? According to Kevin Williams, in his article "Unfair dismissal: myths and statistics", the majority of complaints are made against small firms with fewer than a hundred workers by non-unionised and relatively poorly paid men in low status jobs whose workmates are frequently disinclined to testify against the employer for fear of jeopardising their own position—a point stressed by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner).

Low-paid, non-unionised workers in factories with a higher turnover of labour and poor management practices are the people who will be hurt by this tatty piece of legislation. Women are significantly less likely to complain—a phenomenon only partly explained by the fact that many more women than men work part time, generally have shorter service and so are less likely to be protected by the legislation.

Virtually everyone who has contributed to the debate and brought evidence to the House has torn the proposal to shreds and shown how disreputable it is. The one compliment that I can pay to the Minister is to say that I am sure that he does not believe in this measure—if it is honourable to try to convince the House of something in which he does not believe.

The present law has led to better recruitment practices, grievance procedures and training by firms — all improvements in industrial relations which the Government claim to favour. There is clear evidence that since these measures were introduced there have been fewer cases of industrial action over dismissals which the workers perceive as unfair. There has been a reduction in industrial action because of injustices in the work place — surely we would all be in favour of that. The evidence shows that the legislation does not prevent small or large firms from employing additional staff.

Conservative Members go on talking about the cost. There is a cheap system of insurance against the possible costs incurred by an employee taking action under this legislation. Paul Lewis tells us in the "International Labour Review" that in 1982 a firm with 10 employees could, for an insurance premium of £120 a year, cover itself for the risks involved in a case that might cost up to £30,000 per employee.

It is not that the present law is perfect. I agree with the hon. Member for Langbaurgh that we do not want great formal procedures involving lawyers and masses of expense. We can argue that the legislation has failed in one of its primary objectives—to return to work people who have been unfairly dismissed. Research evidence clearly shows that people who, immediately after they have been dismissed, would deeply like to have their job back may feel three and a half months later, after both sides have attacked each other, that they no longer want it back because the relationship has broken down. I agree with the hon. Member for Langbaurgh that there is room for more conciliation and informal procedures to return people to their jobs.

The present position is not perfect, but the Government's proposals are disgraceful. Part of their great economic strategy for the 1980s and 1990s is sweatshops, low pay, rotten standards of employment practices, lack of training and poor management. That is what the Government are giving us. That is what the Budget was about. This is just a tatty little part of that tatty little strategy.

1.17 am

Mr. Peter Bottomley: By leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I say that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) concluded—I am sorry that she felt it necessary to continue for so long—by referring to the Budget. I believe that the Budget will have a greater impact on employment than this variation order, because it gives direct help to those employing lower paid people as a result of the restructuring of national insurance. It is important to keep our various debates and proposals in perspective.

No one has claimed that this variation of period order will have a massive impact. It may have a significant psychological impact and a direct impact on some people who have faced trying to get rid of an unsatisfactory employee without believing that they had sufficient evidence to justify dismissal. They may be one of those two thirds of cases which do not come to a hearing, either because of conciliation or withdrawal, or one of the one third of cases that go to a hearing but the application is not upheld. In all these discussions, I caution the House against building too much on what is before it.

Mr. Prescott: The Government have presented no evidence.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman need not interrupt in the few minutes that his colleague the hon. Member for Ladywood has left me. We are dealing with the provision for employers of more than 20 people dismissing someone between the 12th and the 24th month.

Some hon. Members have openly said that they do not believe that there should be a qualifying period. Others are willing to accept that a qualifying period is reasonable. We have heard from the Opposition that, when changes were made in the 1970s, the qualifying period was not eliminated immediately in order to try to carry employers with the idea. That was at least an acknowledgment that employers do have a view to which it is worth paying attention. It is established that there is an impact which should be considered—whether direct or actual, because of the psychological effect.

I think I can still survive the compliments of the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner); we may have to put up with each other for some time yet. He referred to the length of my speech and whether I was reading it too fast or too slowly. I was not too clear—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) now says that it does not matter.

At the beginning I was explaining the nature of the provision and the reason for it. I should now like to try to get the House to understand that we are not just talking about employees who are unfairly dismissed. We are talking about employees who are able to put in an application claiming to unfair dismissal and go to an industrial tribunal.

The House will not hear from me tonight a total justification which lines up the Government only behind those employers who feel that they have been unjustly treated by having to answer unfair dismissal complaints. Neither would the House expect me to be concerned only with those employees who presently may have been unfairly dismissed but do not have the possibility of an effective claim for unfair dismissal because they fall within the qualifying period. We want to try to find the right balance. That is what my right hon. Friend said in his press release.

However much scorn Labour Members pour on what the Government are trying to do, they should accept that we are trying to improve the prospects for employment. That is critically important. Although there may be differences of view as to the scale of a change of this kind, the fact that there is likely to be an impact leading to greater employment is not disputed by any of the evidence read out by the hon. Member for Ladywood.

If we were to turn the question the other way round and go through the period when the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) was involved in these affairs, he might be able to demonstrate, through research, that there was no impact whatever on employment as a result of a specific change in the qualifying period. But I do not believe that that evidence is there. If one follows the line of Karl Popper, one should not be asking for evidence on something that one cannot actually demonstrate.

I accept the point made by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) about the improvements in industrial relations and in training on the management side, also involving shop stewards, together with the fact, mentioned by the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) and by other hon. Members, that the number of claims for unfair dismissal is a small fraction of the number of people who lose their jobs. That shows that there is a sense of reality in the outside world, even though we in this House may occasionally lose it when debating issues of this kind. If people were listening to this debate and believing all they heard from the Opposition Benches, one might expect a good many employers to start dismissing people unfairly and wantonly and on a large and growing scale. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Ladywood thinks that that is what I want, she is flying in the face of some of the compliments that I am surviving from her hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West.

What the Government are trying to do—I believe rightly—is to recognise the changed circumstances of today, where we have a far greater need to get people into work. Some people in work may need to accept for that one period, between 12 months and 24 months, the reduced provision in regard to making a claim for unfair dismissal. That is the essence of the debate.

Mr. Janner: The Minister has said that there is a reduced provision. Is it not the fact that the Government are removing that provision altogether for that 12-month period?

Mr. Bottomley: As the hon. and learned Gentleman pointed out, people can still make the claim, and the industrial tribunal hearing might have to be put down, although a pre-hearing assessment might remove it. But there are cases which have been brought to my attention of cases involving people who clearly have not qualified through the qualifying period, where an employer has been summoned to attend an industrial tribunal hearing. If the hon. and learned Gentleman is saying that that is wrong, I should be interested to hear from him, but it is the fact. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Ladywood says that it is mad. When she reads Hansard I hope she will accept that that sort of experience can discourage an employer from replacing or taking on additional staff. I think that the hon. Lady's research confirms what is said in the document "Burdens on Business"——

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Why does the Minister defend this mean and despicable measure? Does he not agree that 12 months is sufficient for any employer to assess the capabilities of any employee?

Mr. Bottomley: I am sure that we all welcome the Chairman of the Select Committee to the Chamber. If someone is taken on for a probationary period, and assessment comes within the first year, if that person is near the mark of being an acceptable employee but not quite there, giving him an additional year to demonstrate his capability may keep him in work. That is a simple and direct answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

There have been comments about the way in which industrial tribunals conduct their affairs, but that is outside the terms of the debate. However, I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) for putting forward his points in a robust and good-natured way. The fact that he managed to keep Opposition Members unaware of his view on the order, as well as keeping me on tenterhooks, is a tribute to his debating skills. We look forward to debates on the issues that he raised—such as the question whether so many lawyers need to be involved. We may discover that some recent books on industrial tribunal procedure bear some consideration in deciding whether the current system is the most effective. We might also pick up the point about ensuring that some of the tribunal awards are paid and that people do not escape by going bankrupt because awards have been made against them.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, North tried to interrupt my opening speech. I am not sure whether that was because I was not saying what he expected, so he had to rewrite his speech, or whether he was trying to play for time because the Opposition had asked for an additional hour and a half. All the time available has been used by hon. Members, so it is right that my introduction was factual. I commend the order to the House because the balance will be more in favour of encouraging employers to take on more people, without feeling that they may have to face unfair claims for unfair dismissal up to two years after the employee joined the company.

I look forward to a continuation of improvement in industrial relations. I remind the House that the information from many experts is that those businesses that have effective grievance procedures and ensure that they carry them out to the letter will not be at risk from the unfair dismissal provisions in employment legislation.

Mr. Janner: The Minister is wrong.

Mr. Bottomley: If the hon. and learned Gentleman says that I am wrong, perhaps we should have another debate in a few minutes. The fact is that we expect the number of cases to reduce by 4,000 a year, and I believe that future research will show some increase in employment——

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, Mr. Deputy Speaker put the Question pursuant to Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) and order [10 May]:

Resolved,

That the draft Unfair Dismissal (Variation of Qualifying Period) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 17th April, be approved.

Thorpe Hospital

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

1.38 am

Mr. Jack Dormand (Easington): I make a plea for the retention of maternity services at Thorpe hospital knowing that there is an overwhelming case for it. Not least is the fact that the hospital enjoys the full confidence of the people of the area. That confidence is based on several factors that I shall develop, but I mention it first because we are often told by the Government that elected or appointed bodies must listen to the voice of the people. In the case of Thorpe, it appears that the responsible bodies are completely ignoring that voice.

In all my 15 years as the hon. Member for Easington, I have never known such concern and enthusiasm about a local issue. In letters, at meetings and on the streets I am constantly asked, "What on earth are they doing, talking about closing our hospital?" The action committee set up to campaign against the closure and with which I work closely, is a dedicated and knowledgeable group of local people who are doing magnificent work in defending the hospital. They are receiving the wholehearted support of the community.

The official documents relating to the hospital talk about it being "isolated". I never cease to wonder about the people who write such reports. The hospital could not be more central for the area that it serves. Many of the expectant mothers walk to it. Buses pass it. No car journey to it is longer than 10 minutes. I live half a mile from it, so I need no instruction from anyone about its location in relation to the people who use it.

It is proposed that the maternity services be transferred to Sunderland and Hartlepool. Those towns are 10 miles away from most of the population, and the bus services to them are not very convenient. Indeed, some are highly inconvenient. I need hardly add that there would be considerable extra expense in getting to both those towns and, of course, we are talking not just about expectant mothers, but about families and friends visiting them. Those distances and the inconvenience would also inevitably be a deterrent to attendance at ante-natal clinics. Surely that is of considerable importance, too.

Some of my constituents argue that the greater distances constitute an element of danger. That point cannot be denied. I hope that the Minister will agree with that. It may not be a major point to most people, but if there were to be any tragic happenings because pregnant women did not arrive at the hospital on time, it would be a major treagedy for the people concerned.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten), referred to geographic factors when replying to a debate raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) in March this year, and drew support from the view shown by the Maternity Services Advisory Committee. Saying that the Government's view, by and large, is that women should be encouraged to have their babies in the larger and properly staffed consultant units of district general hospitals, the Minister went on to say

"However, the committee recognised that in some localities geographic factors will require the availability of what is termed 'isolated' maternity units, and recommended that such units, where geographic factors were a powerful influence on the provision of health care, should be equipped to a standard to cope with any of the complications that might have to be dealt with on site."—[Official Report, 9 January 1985; Vol. 70, c. 881.]

If the Minister and the Department believe that, Thorpe hospital, for the reasons that I am now giving, epitomises the circumstances envisaged in that report.

I refer to the hospital itself. In my opening remarks I said that it enjoyed the full confidence of the people of the district. There are several reasons for that. One is the high standard of care and the happy family atmosphere that is a feature of it.

Anyone who visits the hospital cannot help being struck by that atmosphere. It arises from the dedication and the deep care continually displayed by the staff. Everything possible is done by them to provide the security that is so important at such times.

There was an interesting incident when I last visited the hospital. I spoke to a constituent who had just been delivered of her baby and asked if everything was satisfactory. She replied, "This is my seventh baby born here. I would not have been here if I did not think that everything would be all right." No words of mine can be more eloquent or convincing than those in seeking to justify the continuance of Thorpe hospital.

There is universal praise for the hospital. The campaign to retain it has now lasted for well over a year, and it is literally true to say that no person or organisation has spoken out in support of closure, in spite of claims by the health authorities and the consultants that the alternative proposals will provide a better service.

One of the most heartening and surprising letters of support came from the clergymen of the area. I wonder whether the Minister has ever received a letter from the clergymen of his area. This is an unusual step for them to take, and is a measure of the strength of feeling in the district. Perhaps more importantly, the doctors of the area support the retention of the hospital and are completely opposed to its closure.

The area served by the hospital is covered by parts of three health authorities. It must surely be of some significance that none of the three community health councils supports the proposed closure. When the Minister replies, will he say how much importance the Government place on the views of community health councils which, after all, are the patients' watchdogs?

There is a widespread view in my constituency that the closure is being pressed for the convenience of the consultants, who must travel to the hospital. No one appreciates more than I the splendid work done by the consultants over the years, but, having regard to the strength of the case for retaining maternity services at Thorpe, there may well be some substance in that view. I hope that the Minister will take due note of that point. At a meeting with the consultants which I organised some months ago, I told them of that view.

One consultant said that he would welcome an extension at his hospital, but went on to say:

"If Thorpe is to close it would be jolly hard luck on the residents of the area".

That is an astonishing statement for a consultant to make. The quotation is taken from a local newspaper. It received widespread publicity, so I assume that it was a correct report of what he said.

Thorpe hospital has about 1,000 births a year. On 13 June last year, in a written answer to my question, the Minister listed the maternity hospitals and maternity wings which had been closed from 1979 to 1983, together with the average number of deliveries in each of them for the previous three years. Of the 46 hospitals named, only eight had more births than Thorpe, and from their location I suspect that the circumstances in most were very different from those in my own area. I can understand closures where the number of births were as few as 20, 47, 46, 73, 69, 98 or even more—I have quoted those figures from the Minister's answer — but those figures are very different from 1,000.

The Thorpe work load, if I can so describe it, allied to all the other factors I have mentioned, make the position very different from the closures mentioned in the written answer to me. The argument is that expectant mothers will be given a better and safer service at Sunderland and Hartlepool, and I expect the Minister to make that the main thrust of his reply. It will be necessary, however, to spend a considerable sum of money to bring the other two hospitals up to the required standard. The total capital and revenue costs at Sunderland will be £1,232,039 and at Hartlepool £498,250. Those are the official figures. If it is felt that there is a problem at Thorpe—and I do not accept that there is—a simple solution would be to spend the total of those two sums, £1,730,289, on Thorpe hospital. I assure the Minister that I am not being naive in suggesting that. In considering whether any hospital should close, it is essential to take all the factors into consideration, and I have described the merits of this hospital.

Had there been a high mortality rate at Thorpe, I would have been among the first to urge its closure. I understand that the mortality rate at Thorpe is 2·5 per 1,000 births. That cannot be regarded as a dangerous figure. I think I am correct in saying that it is below the average. I was informed yesterday that one of the most difficult births, a twin caesarean, was carried out recently without any problems. That is a tribute to both staff and facilities and is yet further evidence of the strength of the case for the retention of the hospital.

If there is any inadequacy or danger in regard to the medical aspects, we have yet to see the evidence of it. The confidence of expectant mothers in Thorpe and the difficulties associated with travelling to Sunderland or Hartlepool are giving rise to the very disturbing view, which has been expressed to me on several occasions, that expectant mothers will choose to have their babies at home. That would probably happen in some cases. I am sure the Government would deprecate such a development. I hope that the Minister will consider the seriousness of such a possibility.

When there is controversy about a proposal to close a hospital, the decision has to be taken by the Minister. I assure him that there is the utmost controversy in this case. I hope that he will listen to those who oppose the closure. By any objective standard, the case for retention could not be stronger. I would welcome the opportunity at an appropriate time to talk to the Minister in greater detail than is possible in a debate of this kind. I do not wish to praise a Tory Minister too much, but I have always found the Minister to be fair, if somewhat robust on occasion, and certainly open-minded. I know that he will give full consideration to the case that I have made tonight.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I congratulate the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand) on his success in obtaining an Adjournment debate and on the way in which he has put the case for his constituents in raising the controversial proposal to close a hospital which serves his constituency. I listened with great interest to all that he said. Certainly if he would like to come to see me at a more formal meeting and expand his arguments, I shall await that with interest. I shall arrange such a meeting and suspend judgment on the matter until I have heard his full arguments.

The hon. Gentleman has made it clear that his principal concern is about the maternity services for his constituency. He is extremely assiduous in pursuing his constituency interests in matters of this kind. No doubt he shares the objective of everybody in the Health Service of making sure that in his constituency, as elsewhere, child birth is made both safe and a very rewarding time for mothers and mothers-to-be. Every health authority strives to ensure that, but every authority must at all times ensure that the care that it is providing at any given time is in line with the best modern practice. It has to review its maternity services to ensure that it is keeping up with the best and most up-to-date standards.

The proposal that the hon. Gentleman has raised is still subject to consultation. At this stage I am not sure that it will come to me for my decision. In many ways I prefer these matters to be determined locally.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I begin by making some general remarks. Decisions must be based on the best kind of maternity care for a locality. The general issues between the wishes of the consultants and the obstetricians and the local population and mothers-to-be are frequently raised when proposals are made that involve small maternity hospitals. Anyone with any responsibility must ensure that, above all, the position of mothers-to-be and their babies is protected. Their safety and health must be ensured to the greatest possible degree.

There have been many inquiries into perinatal and neonatal mortality in recent years. It was the subject of a major inquiry that was undertaken first by the Expenditure Committee and subsequently continued by the Social Services Committee between 1978 and 1980. The Committee's report and the Government's reply were both published in 1980. They were the subject of a debate on 5 December 1980, when the Committee's Chairman, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short), highlighted the different questions that the Committee had attempted to resolve.

The Committee considered at length all the matters which might be linked with Britain's comparatively high natal mortality rates. It considered especially the importance of places of birth and the facilities available. After taking extensive evidence, both professional and from consumer groups, it came to the view that "an increasing number of mothers should be delivered in large units; that selection of patients should be improved for smaller consultant units and isolated general practitioner units; that home delivery should be phased out further."

That is to be found in the second report of the Social Services Committee 1979-80.

We set up the Maternity Services Advisory Committee, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. Its second report on care during child birth was published in January 1984. The committee came to basically the same view as the Social Services Committee, that by and large an increasing number of mothers should be delivered in large units. The committee recognised that in some localities geographical factors required the availability of so-called isolated maternity units. It recommended that these should be equipped to a standard to deal with the complications that may have to be dealt with on site. As a Government, we commended the reports of the advisory committee and distributed them widely within the NHS and to the appropriate professional and lay organisations.

In July 1984, the Select Committee on Social Services published its follow-up report and recommended that the "DHSS should do more to encourage regions, in the light of the evidence available to them, to rationalise their maternity services in order to promote better standards of care as well as economy".

In our reply to that in October 1984, the Government agreed that it was important for health authorities to look for rationalisation to improve maternity services and to redirect resources. A number of factors need to be taken into account when authorities consider doing this, including first, and most important of all, the view of users of the service, followed by the use made of different units, the need for units at particular locations because of social or geographical factors, the safety record of each maternity unit and the availability of medical cover and ambulance services for the transfer of emergencies.

There is no absolute prescription for all localities. It is not possible to lay down rules which all authorities should follow when reaching a decision either to concentrate maternity services on major sites or to retain the popular smaller, local units.

I mention these facts to demonstrate that local authorities have been encouraged to rationalise their services and to consider locating them in larger hospitals where all the emergency services are readily to hand not only by the Government but by the Select Committee on Social Services and by every advisory committee that has looked at maternity services.

Although there are no absolute rules, it is not surprising that authorities all over the country are looking at their services and trying, I hope, to strike a balance. They have to pursue the objective of reducing the perinatal mortality and handicap figures and improving the safety of the service that they provide. All considerations of that kind must lead them to consider the possibility of concentrating their maternity services on those sites where emergency facilities are most readily to hand. I hope that in doing so they will try to strike a balance, because authorities must keep constantly in the back of their minds how far the concentration of staff and resources in large hospital units matches the needs and wishes of the mothers who use those services.

In recent years emphasis has been placed upon improving the safety of maternity services. The effect has been dramatic. There has been a fall in perinatal mortality rates from 15·4 per cent. deaths per 1,000 births in 1978 to 10·3 per cent. in 1983. That is the result of the efforts of all the staff involved in maternity care in the National Health Service.

While great emphasis must be placed on safety, we must also remember the importance of providing a service that is satisfactory to the mothers. Therefore, I welcome the growing awareness among National Health Service professionals that, while the new technology and better clinical procedures which have led to safer maternity services must continue to be improved, they must not abandon the traditional, natural birth and all the basic human values that are implicit in childbirth. I believe that it is possible to develop the new general hospital units in such a way that they remain just as friendly and sympathetic places for mothers-to-be as the smaller units which, as we know, enjoy a great deal of local support.

I turn from those generalities to the specific proposal to change the use of Thorpe hospital. As the hon. Member for Easington knows, Thorpe hospital is about 11 miles from Sunderland, just south of Easington. It draws its patients from an area covered by the Sunderland, Hartlepool and Durham health authorities and provides 49 beds on its three wards. In addition, eight clinics are held at the hospital each week. But the distance of the hospital from the main maternity unit at Sunderland general hospital causes difficulties. The consultant obstetricians working at Thorpe have their duties split between two units. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman appreciates that the difficulties which are caused are not just those relating to convenience for consultants but those connected with the best and most efficient use of their time, the ability to cater for the needs of all their patients and the need to be readily available at all times.

The hon. Gentleman does not agree that Thorpe hospital is isolated, but it is relatively distant from the remainder of the Health Service facilities and that presents a problem with the availability of anaesthetist cover. It means, for example, that epidural anaesthesia cannot be given. It also makes it difficult to provide proper paediatric back-up services.

As I understand it, most babies requiring special care facilities are transferred from Thorpe hospital to Sunderland general hospital. It is only there that such facilities can be provided. Those are the reasons that have caused the Sunderland health authority to propose the centralisation of its maternity inpatient services at Sunderland district general hospital. At the same time, Hartlepool district health authority proposes to extend its maternity inpatient facilities at Cameron hospital.

At Sunderland, by upgrading vacant wards at the district general hospital, the health authority aims to provide more obstetric beds on that site and at the same time to upgrade its delivery rooms. The plans would provide the inpatient facilities currently at Thorpe hospital in much improved accommodation, with experienced staff available full-time. Full anaesthetic and paediatric back-up services would be on hand for all deliveries, together with the supporting pathology and radiology services, which are not available at Thorpe. For its part, Hartlepool health authority plans to accommodate patients from its area by making minor adaptions and improvements at Cameron hospital.

I accept that one reasonable reaction of people living in Easington is that travelling to hospitals in Sunderland and Hartlepool is inconvenient. I have no doubt that they will balance that inconvenience against the proposal that patients will receive better care, that fully trained, experienced staff will be continually on hand and that a fully equipped unit will be available.

As the hon. Member will know, it is intended that the outpatient clinics would continue to be provided in the Peterlee-Easington area. For most people attending these clinics there will be no change, as they would continue to be held at Thorpe. However, one gynaecological clinic would be transferred to Ryhope general hospital and the frequency of sessions held locally at Peterlee health centre increased from fortnightly to weekly. Discussions are taking place among the three health authorities on the future of services. The most important point is that they are consulting about their proposals. I must see what the public reaction to the consultation is. I have to see what the community health councils say about the proposals. I attach importance to their reactions. If they disagree, the proposals will come to me for a decision.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall consider the proposals entirely on their merits. I shall agree to any contentious closure proposals only if I am satisfied that on balance the interests of the service and the patients are enhanced. I take on board his reaction. He has already reacted adversely. He plainly has his constituents' interests at heart. When I meet him next, whether he comes on his own or with a deputation, I shall listen with great care to his reservations. If the proposal comes to me as contentious I shall weigh up the matter carefully before any final approval is given.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cereals

1. Mr. Fallon asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total cost to public funds of supporting cereal prices in the current financial year.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): It is estimated that support for the cereals market will cost the Community 2,325 mecu in 1985.

Mr. Fallon: Is that not a scandalous waste of public resources? Does my hon. Friend agree that, besides encouraging price restraint, it is now imperative to reduce or transfer the cost of disposing and storing the lower quality grains?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend will know that at present we are debating the price review negotiations for this year, and a key part of the United Kingdom's approach has been to urge the maximum application of the guarantee threshold to cereals. The reason for that is to reduce the cost of support altogether.

Mr. Torney: Instead of wasting money on cereals in this way, will the Minister seriously consider sending cereals completely free of charge to the starving nations of Africa, such as Ethiopia, and to other parts of the world where people are starving? It may cost more money, but at least it would save starving people.

Mr. MacGregor: The Community is embarking on a major programme of food aid in relation to cereals this year, and the British Government have been taking a lead. There was a fairly large programme last year. However, to think that that is a way of disposing of surpluses and of dealing with that problem is the wrong approach. The real need is to get the cereal support price down. Simply to dispose of all surpluses free of charge would cost a great deal more than the figure that I gave.

Mr. Harris: My hon. Friend referred to the talks going on now in Brussels. Does he agree that today's news from Brussels is absolutely disastrous, that Britain's efforts to try to bring about price cuts in cereals have gone out of the window, and that we shall merely store up bigger trouble and surpluses if the rest of the Community has its way?

Mr. MacGregor: We cannot say that the news is disastrous, because we do not yet know what it is. The negotiations are continuing. It is true to say that the full application of the guarantee threshold will not be negotiable this year, but price restraint is the main item on the table for dealing with cereals this year, and we have allies in our approach to getting price reductions in cereals.

Mr. John: What is the likely carry-over of cereals in storage in the United Kingdom this year and next year if, as many forecast, there is another bumper cereal harvest this summer? Does the Minister think that taxpayers' patience can be stretched as much as storage facilities to harbour such unwanted grain?

Mr. MacGregor: It is difficult to say what the carry-over will be, but there will clearly be one. The hon. Gentleman will know that the United Kingdom has had considerable success in exporting grain this year—a total of about 4·6 million tonnes. However, I do not disguise the fact that the size of the cereal surpluses is a major problem. It is one of the main discussion points—indeed, one of the main stumbling blocks—in the present negotiations.

Research and Development

2. Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how the amount of money spent on research and development in the United Kingdom agriculture industry per £100 of income compares to other European countries.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): Although only partial information is available, it is clear that expenditure on publicly funded agricultural research in relation to farm income in the United Kingdom compares favourably with that in other European countries.

Mr. Jackson: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful reply. She will be aware of the controversy surrounding the statements on this subject in the annual review of research and development published by the Government last year. Does she agree that such uncertain comparisons are an inadequate basis for making Government decisions?

Mrs. Fenner: There are many alternative measures on which to base comparisons, and different bases produce different results. However, it is clear that United Kingdom agricultural R and D has been well supported and that, even after reduction, it will stand comparison with that of our competitors.

Mr. Kennedy: Will the Minister concede that that statement will sound extremely hollow once the Government implement the full cuts that they propose in the general research, advisory and scientific programme, especially in Scotland, where so much of the territory for farming is in less-favoured areas, such as the Highlands? As this reduction, following the reduction in capital grants, will have a severe effect on farming, will the Government rethink the policy?

Mrs. Fenner: The hon. Gentleman exaggerates. There is no reduction in 1985-86, and the planned expenditure for 1986-87 will be reduced by £10 million, of which the Ministry's share will be about £8·25 million, within the general research, advisory and scientific programme. We should remember that the national spend for research and development on agriculture, fisheries and food was £204 million, of which agriculture spent £160 million. That puts the reduction in perspective.

Mr. Lyell: When my hon. Friend examines future spending on research, will she remember how cost-effective it can be? The National Institute of Agricultural Engineering has developed the Paraplough, the Dynodrive cultivator and the hay mower/conditioner, which have helped the turnround in our exports of agricultural engineering products. Is this not money well spent?

Mrs. Fenner: We have asked the Priorities Board for Research and Development in Agriculture and Food to advise us, and it will undoubtedly advise on the wise use of resources to which my hon. and learned Friend referred. It would not be helpful to speculate on the outcome of that advice.

Mr. John: When will the staff at the scientific and research establishments know their fate? Does the hon. Lady agree that the fact that the priorities board has not yet said where even one cut will fall is liable to cause the maximum uncertainty and, therefore, anxiety in research establishments?

Mrs. Fenner: The Agricultural and Food Research Council is our major contractor for commissioned work, and we are working closely in collaboration with it. It is represented on the priorities board.

Price Review

3. Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the progress of the price fixing negotiations in Brussels.

8. Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest position regarding the Common Market price negotiations.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and I are currently attending the Council of Ministers in Brussels, from which I have just returned, and where negotiations continue. That is why my right hon. Friend is unable to be here this afternoon, and he apologises to the House for his absence. They are proving to be exceptionally difficult and protracted negotiations. A main stumbling block continues to be Germany's attitude to the proposed cuts in CAP support prices for cereals.

Mr. Maclennan: Is not the damaging delay in reaching agreement on prices due to the fumbling ineptitude of the Government in failing to prepare the ground adequately and sufficiently in advance, and especially in failing to recognise that across-the-board institutional cuts at a level which the Government have been pursuing are unlikely to be achieved and will only alienate our Community partners? Does the Minister agree that the only hope of reducing expenditure while maintaining farm incomes equitably is through quantitative restrictions on price support for cereals, as on milk?

Mr. McGregor: Obviously we would have preferred and earlier settlement, and we have urged all the way through for a settlement as quickly as possible. I hope the hon. Gentleman will agree that it is more important to have a delayed settlement that is right than a hasty settlement that is wrong.

The hon. Gentleman is wrong to say that the United Kingdom Government have not been preparing the ground for the cereals negotiations. We have been taking the lead on many of the major issues in these negotiations, and in particular we have argued for price cuts.

I do not understand the hon. Gentleman's point about alienating our Community partners. We are getting increasing support for our approach to price reductions on cereals, but we have to face the fact that many member states have a different view.

Finally, it has become clear in the debates that a considerable number of important member states are totally opposed to quotas for cereals.

Mr. Latham: Is my hon. Friend aware of the disturbing rumours from the Milk Marketing Board that the 1 per cent. cut in the co-responsibility levy might not be achieved after all? Will he assure our totally frustrated milk farmers that in these negotiations he will insist on that cut?

Mr. McGregor: I assure my hon. Friend that we are battling extremely hard for United Kingdom interests, of which this is one. One or two member states have been urging a delay in the reduction of 1 per cent. in the co-responsibility levy, but we have been resisting that strongly.

Mr. Weetch: The Minister said that one of the points of contention was the price of cereals. Does he realise that artificially high prices for cereals have caused enormous environmental damage to the country? Will our negotiators do all that they can to persuade the EEC that it would be far better to devote some of the money to an integrated countryside policy than to propping up grain prices and creating surpluses that nobody can buy?

Mr. McGregor: The hon. Gentleman should recall that the United Kingdom Government, initially on their own, took the lead in getting a conservation and environmental element into the Community proposals on the structure programme. We have gradually got more support.

Mr. Watson: Does my hon. Friend agree, at least in principle, that any attempt to reduce the present cereal surplus by means of price restraint alone would inevitably involve substantial reductions in price, the main burdens of which would fall upon the more marginal grain producers, such as those in Yorkshire and the south-west?

Mr. MacGregor: It is difficult to give the House any final sign of what is happening in the negotiations, because they shift from time to time and the package changes as the negotiations proceed. Although price reductions are the main element in what both the Commission and a considerable number of member states are urging this year, there are other ways in which cereal problems can be dealt with, including the proposal to drop the breadmaking wheat premium, which is currently being negotiated, and one or two other matters, such as changes in the carry-over payments, which would also have an effect.

Mr. Deakins: What is the size of the gap between the cost of the Commission's original proposals for 1985 and the upper limit under the financial guidelines for agricultural expenditure?

Mr. MacGregor: For 1985, the limit, I think from memory, is 29,955 billion ecu. The current proposals are within that. There has been general agreement, very much at our insistence, that any other proposals now being considered will be financially neutral. In other words, at the end of the day we should stay within that limit.

Sir Hector Monro: Contrary to the views of the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), will my hon. Friend accept that most of us agree that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and his team are doing a first-class job in Brussels? Secondly, does he agree that if there is any one issue over which my right hon. Friend should succeed, it is maintaining the beef premium to livestock farmers in the west and the north?

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He will know that there are many other issues, besides surpluses, of great importance to us in these negotiations, and one of them is the beef variable premium scheme. The House knows that every year we have a problem even getting that subject on to the table. We are making considerable progress, largely because of tremendous efforts by my right hon. Friend, but it is too early to predict the outcome.

Mr. Nicholson: Have the Minister and his right hon. Friend accepted the compromise proposal put forward in the negotiations to allow the Republic of Ireland an additional 58,000 tonnes of milk this year as a retrospective adjustment for last year? Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that many of us would not find that compromise acceptable? Will he bear in mind the serious position of Northern Ireland dairy farmers vis-à-vis their counterparts in Great Britain?

Mr. MacGregor: It is difficult to comment with any finality on what is happening in Brussels. For all I know, the compromise proposals may be changing at this very minute. The Irish Government have argued that there was a statistical mistake in quotas last year and have pressed for an additional 58,000 tonnes. They appear to have the support of nearly every other member state. We have made it clear that we are very much opposed to that, but I cannot predict the outcome.

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to make it absolutely clear that there is not a significant cut in cereal prices this year? Is it not patently obvious to everyone that there will not be any proper reform of the CAP, and that in those circumstances the Government would not dream of coming to the House and asking for an increase in own resources for the European Community?

Mr. MacGregor: It is important to bear in mind that the figure of 19,955 million ecu—not 29,955 billion ecu as I said earlier; I expect that tiredness caused me to get it wrong—is the one to which we are working in the negotiations. We are determined to ensure that the financial agreements in the package are honoured.

Mr. John: What are the latest proposals for the sheep variable premiums? Is the ceiling originally proposed by the Commission still being maintained, and does the Minister accept that the success or failure of the talks will be measured by what happens on cereals?

Can the hon. Gentleman confirm certain figures? On production last year, would not an 8 per cent. reduction in the guarantee threshold be justified? The Government cut the figure to 5 per cent. because of the legal limitations in the CAP. The Commission originally proposed a figure of 3·6 per cent., but its current proposal is for a cut of less than 2 per cent.—which is less than one quarter of that which would be justified by the amount of grain grown in the CAP during the past year. Would it not be a total dereliction of duty if the Council of Ministers agreed to that?

Mr. MacGregor: On sheepmeat, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I say that a number of issues are still being discussed, and that is a rather important element of the final stages of the negotiations.

The limit on the guarantee threshold for cereals was negotiated three years ago, when it was agreed to have a ceiling in any one year of 5 per cent. That is why we had to argue for 5 per cent., although 8 per cent. would have been the figure had there not been a ceiling.

We have been taking a strong position on cereals during the negotiations. However, it is necessary to have the support of a sufficient number of other member states and the Commission to achieve any given figure. I believe that our firm stance has led to the whole question of where the cereals figure ends up being still very much in debate. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there are member states that would like to have no reduction at all.

Exports

5. Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take steps to allow greater freedom for United Kingdom exporters to export their products throughout the European Community.

Mrs. Fenner: The Government continually seek to ensure that our exporters of agricultural and food products can compete on fair terms in markets throughout the European Community.

Sir Peter Mills: While understanding what my hon. Friend is saying, and bearing in mind that there are problems with milk imports and disease, may I ask whether she agrees that it is about time we made a determined effort to have far more freedom and to stop all the restrictions on British food exports to the Community — especially the clawback on beef, and even the sheepmeat regime? Is it not about time that the subsidy that the Republic of Ireland is receiving for its exports to this country was ended?

Mrs. Fenner: My hon. Friend will have heard my hon. Friend the Minister of State comment on the Eire position. Exports have risen since the sheepmeat regime was introduced and they are now back to the level of the mid-1970s. I agree that the clawback still inhibits us from taking full advantage of what should be a common market, and we are continuing to press for improvements.

Liquid Milk

6. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects a decision from the European Court on the dispute over the importation of fresh liquid milk into the United Kingdom from the continent.

Mr. MacGregor: If the Commission application to the court goes ahead in accordance with its recent announcement, I would expect a decision in about a year.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Will my hon. Friend continue his heroic efforts, by every legal means open to him, to prevent this importation? Will he bear in mind, however, that the United Kingdom stands to gain more than any other member of the Community from the strict application of the rule of law within the Community? Will he remember that the doorstep delivery of milk has an importance going well beyond the dairy industry? Will he, therefore, consult his Government colleagues to ensure that our system of doorstep delivery continues, even if we eventually get imports of liquid milk?

Mr. MacGregor: The answer to the first part of my hon. Friend's supplementary question is that we have told the Commission that, in our view, the best course is to seek a Community-wide solution via a directive on heat-treated milk. In the absence of such a directive, we consider that our public health controls are necessary, and we shall, therefore, be defending the case.

I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that we are among the member states which are persistently arguing that the Community rules and regulations must be observed by all member states. Therefore, we must do the same ourselves if we are to succeed with that argument.

The best way in which doorstep delivery can be maintained is by keeping the excellent service and by our dairy industry remaining highly competitive. The House will recall that we had a considerable debate about imports of UHT and sterilised milk, when many fears were expressed about doorstep deliveries being undermined. That has proved not to be the case. Because of the competitiveness of our industry, there have been very few imports of that kind.

Mr. Torney: As the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has repeatedly informed me in recent months that there is a surplus of milk in the United Kingdom, why should there be any question of importing fresh milk into this country? I urge the Minister to bear in mind the danger, to which reference has been made, to the distribution of milk to the doorstep and the consequent danger to employees in the industry. In other words, is he aware that if fresh milk is allowed to be imported our already massive unemployment will be made that much higher?

Mr. MacGregor: Our concern about imports of this sort must, of course, be in relation to public health controls. However, if there is a Community-wide directive, as for all other products in the Common Market, there is free trade, provided that the public health controls are met. I repeat that the greatest strength of our dairy industry is its competitiveness, and the greatest hope for the doorstep delivery of milk is that that is what the consumer will continue to want. So far, all the fears about imports of other forms of milk have proved to be unjustified.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is the Minister aware that, whatever the European Court may say, there will always be legitimate doubts about the health and hygiene standards of milk that may have been transported over long distances from warmer climates? May we have a categorical assurance that the Government will take all necessary steps to protect the health of our consumers, doorstep deliveries of milk and the interests of British dairy producers?

Mr. MacGregor: I have made it clear that we think that our controls are justified in the absence of a Community regime; and we shall do all that we can to persuade the court, if it comes to a court case.

Southall Horse Market

7. Mr. Greenway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to visit the Southall horse market to study the implementation of his voluntary code on markets; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: I have no plans at present to visit the market at Southall. However, I am kept informed of conditions there by my veterinary staff, who frequently attend to monitor and encourage compliance with the code.

Mr. Greenway: Will my hon. Friend accept from me that conditions at the Southall horse market have improved considerably, but that the handling, stabling and transport of horses still often leaves much to be desired and that considerable cruelty is involved? Will she pay an unannounced visit with me to the market on some occasion?

Mrs. Fenner: Delighted as I would be to pay unannounced visits to anywhere with my friendly hon. Friend, I must remind him that legislation already exists to protect horses in markets, in trnasit and during loading and unloading. It is a matter for enforcement by the police and local authorities. I hope that it will be reassuring to him to know that the Farm Animal Welfare Council is considering the welfare of horses in its review of markets. We look forward to studying the council's recommendations.

Agricultural Grants

9. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications for agricultural grants in the countryside, in areas outside national parks and sites of special scientific interest, have been refused by his Department on environmental grounds for each year since 1980.

Mrs. Fenner: I regret that the Ministry does not keep records in a form which would readily identify the number of applications refused grant and the reasons for such refusals.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Parliamentary Secretary accept that that is a major defect in any system that is geared to enhancing what she says is her Department's duty to have regard to conservation? Until local authorities and others can be prenotified—I hope the hon. Lady can say that this will be possible under the new structures regulations that are about to be implemented—conservation in the countryside will not be something that her Department can honestly say it is trying to uphold.

Mrs. Fenner: Obviously, we shall have to ensure that any capital grant paid is for investments compatible with good conservation in the areas which are designated as environmentally sensitive and which my right hon. Friend has ensured are in the structures programme. Prior notification is one possibility to which we shall have to give consideration.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Is my hon. Friend convinced that since 1980 no environmental damage has been done by grant-aided agricultural works, or does her reply suggest that we should move to a system of prenotification of agricultural works that attract grant-aid?

Mrs. Fenner: Prenotification is an enormously expensive objective. During the past few years there has been a much wider appreciation of conservation in agriculture. I trust that my hon. Friend is well aware of the initiatives in which my Department has been involved during the past months in improving conservation in agriculture. Unfortunately, I do not have sufficient time to recite those initiatives now.

Mr. John: Does the hon. Lady agree that, whatever the costs of prenotification—I disagree with the costs she suggested—it will be necessary for people to be able to object to the granting of agricultural grant where damage is caused to the environment? What alternatives is the hon. Lady considering?

Mrs. Fenner: The extension of prior notification was recommended by the House of Commons Select Committee on the Environment. The Government will publish their reponse to that report shortly. I cannot, therefore, comment at present.

Cereals

10. Mr. Yeo asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will seek to establish a joint producer-Government-backed organisation to help the promotion of cereal exports.

Mr. MacGregor: The promotion of cereals exports already falls within the scope of Food from Britain, which is a producer-Government-backed organisation. I would be prepared to consider proposals for improvements in the existing arrangements for the promotion of cereals exports if they were practical and realistic and had wide support from the cereals sector.

Mr. Yeo: Will my hon. Friend take steps to ensure that the export credit arrangements are satisfactory in time for the start of exports from the 1985 grain harvest?

Mr. MacGregor: Last December we made considerable improvements in the export credit arrangements. During a meeting with the trade I said that I would be happy to consider any practical ideas that could bring about further improvements. Our export growth in cereals has been substantial in recent years. That is a remarkable achievement. It is clear that a great deal of growth is taking place.

Mr. Home Robertson: Will the Minister comment on the financial crisis suffered by Food from Britain? Does he accept that massively subsidised cereal exports to Russia and elsewhere are not only an insult to our taxpayers but an injury to our cereal-consuming industries? Will the hon. Gentleman ensure that any new export promotion initiative by the Government on cereals also benefits the British cereal-consuming industries in the livestock sector?

Mr. MacGregor: Food from Britain already has a funding programme from the Government. The time is not right to review where Food from Britain should go. There is a continuing programme. As the House will be aware, we are opposed to any special arrangements for the export of agricultural products to Russia. The Community has a considerable surplus of cereals and the House has been expressing anxiety about that this afternoon. It is important that we should be able to export that surplus. With regard to the livestock sector in the United Kingdom, one of the reasons why we have been urging a reduction in cereal support prices is to improve the horn-corn balance and help the livestock sector.

Veterinary Inspection Centres

11. Mr. Freeman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received on his proposals for closure of veterinary inspection centres.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friend has received 118 representations to date on his statement of 15 April about the future of the veterinary investigation service.

Mr. Freeman: Is my hon. Friend aware that the important Moulton inspection centre lies in my constituency of Kettering? Has he got the message that the farmers in my constituency are worried about its possible closure? Will he therefore confirm that he will consider all sensible proposals, including the privatisation of the Moulton centre?

Mr. MacGregor: I am aware that the centre is in my hon. Friend's constituency, but, as the report made clear, it receives a low level of submissions and serves a relatively small catchment area. That area can easily be served by the centres at Cambridge and Sutton Bonington. My right hon. Friend is considering all the representations that have been made. He is meeting representatives of the main interested bodies and will be hoping to complete consultations within the next month or so, after which a final decision will be made.

Mr. Mark Hughes: Given that timetable, can the Minister guarantee that he will come to the House with these decisions before we rise for the summer recess?

Mr. MacGregor: I should like to consult my right hon. Friend on that, because some decisions must await the outcome of financial studies which are currently being undertaken and which require careful consideration. They could take a little longer than the month or so that I talked about earlier.

Mr. Colvin: Can my hon. Friend confirm that part of his proposal is to close three centres that serve the south of England—including the Itchen Abbas centre which serves my constituency—and to replace them with a single, larger, central unit? Will he consider enlarging the Itchen Abbas centre, which would be simple, rather than closing it? It is ideally situated on a green field site. If it were closed, obtaining change of use planning permission would be extremely difficult. The only alternative would be to destroy it, and that would be a terrible waste of a public asset.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall draw my hon. Friend's comments to the attention of my right hon. Friend so that they can be taken into account in the consultations in which he is now engaged.

Nutritional Food Labelling

13. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will invite the London Food Commission to participate in consultations on nutritional food labelling.

Mrs. Fenner: Our consultation document on draft guidelines for nutrition labelling of food has been circulated for comment to over 700 organisations. The London Food Commission is amongst this circulation and we shall welcome any response that it cares to make.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I accept that the Minister wants to improve the linkage between food and health, although we might disagree about the speed of action. Does she accept that the new body in London is plainly a broadly based and well funded body which will be able to contribute to making people understand the benefits of nutritional food labelling and help in the educational process? Will she involve it in the closer consultations in which she is involved with organisations such as the Consumers Association?

Mrs. Fenner: That organisation now has our document, and it has been invited, with the other 699 organisations, to make any comments that it wishes. I am sure that, as a responsible body, it will do that.

Mr. Aitken: Will my hon. Friend explain why the nutritionists and other experts who serve on committees to do with food labelling, such as the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy, are required to sign the Official Secrets Act? Is food labelling not a subject where maximum publicity is needed, not maximum security?

Mrs. Fenner: The Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. I shall draw his attention to my hon. Friend's comments.

Mr. Deakins: Can nutritional food labelling, valuable as it is of itself, adequately compensate the British consumer for the ever-rising cost of food products in the Common Market?

Mrs. Fenner: Fat labelling is a recommendation of COMA. There are other questions on the Order Paper today which may refer to food prices.

Sir Peter Mills: When my hon. Friend is considering these problems and the future of labelling, will she turn her attention to the unfairness of confining this to certain food products such as milk and meat? If it is successful for those products, why should it not be successful and wise for all products? Will it not have a damaging effect on the dairy industry?

Mrs. Fenner: Fat labelling is a recommendation of COMA and will be on all products. It is the nutritional labelling which will be voluntary. We are considering the best format which would be meaningful to the consumer. Nutritional labelling was not a recommendation of COMA whereas fat labelling was.

Mr. Home Robertson: We welcome the Government recommendations so far as they go to achieve a healthier diet for our people. Would the Minister accept that if these recommendations are to be of any value, food labelling must be both uniform and easily comprehensible so that when consumers go to the shops they know what the code means?

Mrs Fenner: We are involved in a survey, in collaboration with the National Consumer Council and the Consumers Association, to discover exactly the perception of consumers to labelling. I agree wholly with the hon. Member that the labelling must make sense to consumers if they are to accept advice.

Food Prices

14. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of food price increases since 1975 have been the result of higher real prices paid to farmers; and what proportion can be attributed to higher food processing and retailing costs.

Mrs. Fenner: Apportioning increases in food prices between prices paid to farmers and the costs of retailing and distribution can be done only in broad terms. In the decade since 1975, agricultural product prices have risen by 122 per cent., while retail food prices have risen by 166 per cent. Associated with this slower growth of agricultural prices, the cost of basic food raw materials now accounts for 44 per cent. of consumer spending on food compared with 50 per cent. 10 years ago.

Mr. Oppenheim: My hon. Friend may be aware that in real terms the cost of food, taking the farmgate price received by farmers, has fallen substantially in real terms. What expectation has she that the current common agricultural policy proposed price cuts will result in substantially reduced production, for which she no doubt hopes?

Mrs. Fenner: I am not hoping for substantially reduced production, but clearly realism in the common agricultural programme means that we need to consider surplus production.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Does my hon. Friend agree that the moderate rise in food prices compared with the retail prices index is helped greatly by the variable beef premium? Will she encourage my right hon. Friend in no way to barter that valuable instrument in exchange for anything else?

Mrs. Fenner: I can only reiterate to my hon. Friend that my right hon. Friend and hon. Friends need no encouragement to defend British interests in this matter.

Surplus Food

15. Mr. Canavan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest figure for the total amount and value of surplus food stored in the United Kingdom; and what is the total amount currently stored in the European Economic Community.

Mr. MacGregor: On 30 April intervention stocks of beef, breadwheat, butter and skimmed milk powder in the United Kingdom were just over 321,000 tonnes, valued at some £476 million, using the buying-in prices valid at that date. The volume of Community stocks of these products and sugar at the latest available date was just over 7 million tonnes.

Mr. Canavan: Would the Minister care to estimate how much of that food will eventually be consumed by human beings and how much will simply rot away? Is it not an absolute crime against humanity for the Government to support a high-price, high-waste common agricultural policy, especially at a time when literally millions of people in the Third world are in danger of starving to death?

Mr. MacGregor: Neither this House nor the Council of Ministers is under any illusions. It is the firm resolve of the United Kingdom Government to reduce the surpluses. Nevertheless, a considerable proportion of the surpluses will be consumed by human beings, or by animals which will ultimately be consumed by human beings. A considerable proportion will be consumed within the Community, through exports, or through the substantial programme of food aid.

Mr. Maclean: While the surpluses seem large in tonnage terms, will my hon. Friend put the whole business of surpluses into perspective and tell the House exactly how many days of normal supply for the British housewife the surpluses represent?

Mr. MacGregor: Clearly, it varies, but for butter it is between 150 and 200 days' supply. There are some cases in which it is vital to reduce the surpluses substantially. In other cases, moderate surpluses are desirable for the safety of food stocks.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 May.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Taylor: Will the Prime Minister take time during a busy day to study press notices of an enterprise by Shell in the North sea involving the investment of £2·5 billion, many ancillary contracts for British firms, and jobs for 6,000 people? Will she comment on that enterprise?

The Prime Minister: I confirm what my hon. Friend said. I understand that it is an enterprise which will provide about 6,000 jobs and that the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1983 probably contributed to the decision to go ahead with this development. It is good news and I wish the enterprise well.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Will the Prime Minister take time today to look at the Hansard reports of our economic debates in the House in the past two months, from which she will find that about 25 per cent. of the contributions from the Government Benches have been critical of the Government strategy? Does not that, together with the establishment of dissident groups on her own Back Benches, indicate the total failure of the Government's policies in dealing with unemployment?

Will the Prime Minister stop carrying on thinking that there is no alternative and start — [Interruption.] Will she start to listen to the proposals that are being made by groups on her own Back Benches and by some on the alliance Benches, and drop the absurd notion that there is no alternative?

The Prime Minister: No, I shall not stop carrying on. I shall carry on.

Sir William Clark: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, as a proportion of the population, the number of people in work in Britain is the highest in the European Community?

The Prime Minister: The proportion of the population of working age in work is 66 per cent. in Britain. That is as high as in the United States and higher than in France and Germany. It is one of the highest percentages in Europe.

Kampuchea

Q2. Mr. Allen Adams asked the Prime Minister if the Government have any intention of recognising the regime in Kampuchea.

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. We recognise the state of Cambodia, but in common with the overwhelming majority of the international community will not countenance having relations with the present regime in Phnom Penh, which depends on the Vietnamese occupation forces for its existence.

Mr. Adams: Does the Prime Minister not think that it is gratuitously offensive to the vast majority of the British people that we recognise at the United Nations the representatives of a regime which murdered 2 million of its own people? Is the bogus excuse still that the north Vietnamese or the Vietnamese invaded Cambodja? If that is the bogus excuse, is the Prime Minister aware of the United Nations 1948 convention on genocide? We cannot argue — [Interruption.] We have obligations under international law to put a stop to genocide.

The Prime Minister: The Government withdrew formal recognition from the Pol Pot regime in December 1979. In accordance with the recommendation of the United Nations General Assembly credentials committee, we continue to accept the representatives of the democratic parts of Kampuchea as representing the Cambodia seat.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: While admitting that the regime we recognise in Kampuchea has a deplorable record, may I ask whether the Prime Minister agrees that the regime in Phnom Penh, backed by the Vietnamese, has committed every crime under the sun and is the enemy of our friends in that part of the world?

The Prime Minister: Yes. The Vietnamese forces are still in occupation. They have caused the flight of many refugees into Thailand. We give as much support and help as we can to those refugees. We shall not recognise the puppet regime in Phnom Penh, which is upheld only by the Vietnamese occupying forces.

Q3. Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Parry: In view of the wide divisions in her party, will the Prime Minister stop shedding crocodile tears, and will she state today that she is concerned about unemployment? In view of the formation of the new Centre Forward group——

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: It is disintegrating. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know what hon. Members are laughing at, either.

Mr. Parry: Those baboons over there may be shouting at—[HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw that word.

Mr. Parry: I withdraw.

In view of the formation of the Centre Forward group and the statement by Mr. Iain Picton, chairman of the Tory Reform Group, will the Prime Minister now state whether the Lady is for turning, and if not, why not?

The Prime Minister: I am not sure whether I picked my way through that complicated question. The name "Centre Forward" was, of course, first coined by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, who wrote a book called "Centre Forward — a Radical Conservative Programme". Hon. Members can see that book, which I have here. It was written in 1978, and I am delighted to find that my hon. Friend has so many new supporters.

Mr. Roger King: Following the good news from Shell, has my right hon. Friend had the time to reflect on the good news from British Leyland, which, in the first quarter of this year, had achieved its highest output for 10 years, with 98 per cent. availability?

The Prime Minister: I am always delighted to hear of great success in our motoring industry. I hope that it will steadily increase the proportion of the car market that is taken by firms in this country. I congratulate the company.

Mr. Kinnock: Why have crimes of every kind increased substantially since the Prime Minister took office in 1979? What is she going to do about it?

The Prime Minister: Crime has been going up both in this country and in other countries. This Government, unlike previous ones, have substantially increased the numbers in the police force—by some 12,000. We have also increased the amount of equipment that is available to them.

Mr. Kinnock: The police are not convinced by that. Who does the right hon. Lady expect to believe it?

The Prime Minister: I had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman might actually be swayed by the facts on the numbers of the police.

Mr. Kinnock rose——

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Kinnock: This right hon. Gentleman and, plainly, the police are more impressed by the 30 per cent. rise in serious crime since the right hon. Lady became leader of the Government. Will she now answer the question? Why is the crime rate so much higher? What is she going to do about it?

The Prime Minister: I repeat the reply that I gave. We have increased the numbers in the police force. We have also increased, as we did during last year, the actual amount of resources available. If there should be any under-recruitment in local authorities, I urge them to come up to establishment.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Has my right hon. Friend noted that in the year to March wages rose by 9 per cent.? Does she agree that if those in work take more of the national wage bill it must be bad for the unemployed? Will she therefore re-emphasise the need for wage restraint in any sensible attack on unemployment?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I saw those figures today. On average earnings, the underlying rate is still 7½ per cent., but my hon. Friend will also have heard today the news and wisdom that has come out of Southampton docks. Six months ago those docks were not working at all. The news came today that they have realised that if they are to get back to work they must reduce the wage bill. By doing that they have turned the position around and are now very successful. As my hon. Friend has said, wage costs must not rise too high if we are to get more jobs.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Will the Prime Minister note that in yesterday's elections in Northern Ireland about 10 per cent. of those who wished lawfully to cast their votes were prevented from doing so by the terms of the Elections (Northern Ireland) Act of this Session? Does she agree with the opinion held in all quarters of the Province that that statute cannot remain unamended?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, the purpose of the Elections (Northern Ireland) Act 1985 and the local elections order of 1982 was to strengthen safeguards against personation, to counter a significant increase in electoral abuse in recent years. We shall, of course, be reviewing the way in which the legislation works and, in particular, the usefulness of the various documents specified for identification. In response to the right hon. Gentleman, we shall certainly look at the way in which the Act has worked.

Mr. Rowe: Is my right hon. Friend aware that recently I shared a platform with an employee of the Greater London council whose principal contribution to our discussions was to advocate riot as the only means whereby the ethnic minorities in this country could achieve their objectives? Does my right hon. Friend not think that that is one of the contributions to the rising crime rate?

The Prime Minister: I hope that almost everyone in the House accepts that the law must be obeyed, and we are all responsible for helping in its enforcement.

Q4. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave a few moments ago.

Mr. McKay: Will the Prime Minister reflect on the situation of my constituent E. G. Moxon, and thousands like him, who went out under the job release scheme only to find that this year his annual increase is only 60p due to favourable developments in personal tax allowances? Has not the scheme turned out to be a con trick in that those low-paid people have paid for an increase, which they were not supposed to do? Will that not be detrimental to people wishing to go out under the scheme?

The Prime Minister: I think the hon. Gentleman will agree that the job release scheme was a good one, allowing people to retire early and releasing jobs for people on the unemployment register. If there is a particular difficulty or a special case in relation to tax I hope that the hon. Gentleman will write to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer about it.

Q5. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. MacKay: Has my right hon. Friend had time during her busy day to read the totally independent report of the Comptroller and Auditor General stating that the National Health Service has never been more flourishing? Does that not show that the Opposition's scurrilous rumours about the future of the Health Service are utterly dishonest?

The Prime Minister: Yes, the Opposition do a lot of the talking, but we have delivered the best National Health Service that this country has ever known, with more doctors and nurses—[HON. MEMBERS: "Use them!"]—dealing more efficiently with a greater number of patients. [Interruption.] The Opposition may shout, as they usually do, but they cannot overcome the facts. Under this Government the National Health Service is the best ever.

Mr. Foulkes: Has the Prime Minister had time today to read the point of order that I raised yesterday regarding early-day motion 686——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The point of order was to me, so it is my responsibility and not that of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Foulkes: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wondered whether the right hon. Lady had had time in her busy day to read that point of order. As Reuters has apologised to me for the inaccurate report, and as the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) has graciously withdrawn the early-day motion, will the right hon. Lady now have the courtesy to apologise for, and withdraw, the remarks that she made without any justification at Question Time on Tuesday?

The Prime Minister: I said at Question Time on Tuesday:

"Those remarks must have been deeply wounding and we on these Benches reject them absolutely."—[Official Report, 14 May 1985; Vol. 79, c. 169.]

I understand that the hon. Gentleman is withdrawing the remarks—[Interruption.]

Mr. Foulkes indicated dissent.

The Prime Minister rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister must be given an opportunity to reply.

The Prime Minister: I understand that my hon. Friend has withdrawn the remark and, of course, I therefore do. I hope that the hon. Gentleman now thinks that that airstrip was a very good investment—[Interruption.]

Mr. Ryman rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take points of order only if they relate to Question Time and only if they are not an extension of Question Time.

Mr. Ryman: Only two days ago you ruled on a point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman's point of order relates to what happened two days ago, I shall take it later.

Mr. Stephen Ross: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As someone who accompanied the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) to the Falkland Islands, I can confirm that everything he has said in the House is correct and that if statements were made on Tuesday impugning his conversations in the Falkland Islands they are wrong and ought to be withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: I heard the exchanges yesterday and the points of order were addressed to me. I called the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) today. I heard exactly what the Prime Minister said, and she did withdraw.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: My hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) specifically asked the Prime Minister to read the exchanges which took place on Tuesday. She has obviously read them and must know that my hon. Friend was misreported. Will she now have the courtesy and grace to withdraw her remarks?

The Prime Minister: I thought that I had withdrawn —[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Then I do. I do so now—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—and of course, I apologise.

Railway Workshops (Job Losses)

3.33 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the announcement of job losses in British Rail Engineering Ltd.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): At a meeting of its joint consultative committee on 15 May, the management of British Rail Engineering Ltd. informed the unions that it had reluctantly come to the conclusion that it would be necessary to make further reductions in manpower within BREL. A year ago, the management had already informed the unions at the equivalent meeting of proposed reductions. Its latest evaluation of work load, however, shows a further reduction of 13 per cent. in repair work. The company has therefore concluded that it needs to reduce manpower by a further 1,300 over the next two years.

It may be helpful to the House if I explain these work load projections. The demand for railway repair and maintenance has declined because of British Rail's decision to invest in new rolling stock. In particular, investment in new diesel multiple units with higher performance means that the same frequency of service can now be provided with fewer trains, and each of these fewer units requires less maintenance. Major programmes of refurbishment, particularly the stripping of asbestos from older vehicles, are also nearing completion, and this has been a significant part of the recent work load.

In the light of this reduced demand, British Rail and BREL have, with considerable regret, decided that they must propose to the unions a sizeable rundown of the Glasgow Springburn works and some further manpower reductions at other works, particularly Doncaster and Eastleigh. Most regrettably of all, they have decided, after considering the position carefully, that there is insufficient work to maintain the BREL works at Swindon after March 1986.

I know that these proposals will be a hard blow to the communities concerned, particularly to Swindon, but British Rail and BREL have considered the matter carefully and concluded that a reduction of capacity of this scale is unavoidable. There will, of course, be an opportunity for all the possibilities to be re-examined fully in the consultations with the employees which now follow BREL's announcement.

British Rail and BREL will do all that they can to find alternative work for redundant employees by offering opportunities to transfer to other works and by encouraging business development and job creation at both Swindon and Glasgow.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the Minister not aware that it is a disgrace to come here and make announcements that represent a drop of 18·8 per cent. in the work force by the end of March 1987—1,000 more jobs lost than was proposed by British Rail to the unions last year—and the total closure of the Swindon works?

Why is it that, when the Ayrshire electrification programme is to be completed, the Glasgow works is to be reduced, because there is to be no more refurbishment of DMUs, to the level of a mere regional workshop? How does the Minister explain to the trained engineers who are to lose their jobs the reason for reducing the amount of maintenance that British Rail has undertaken throughout the regions since the Government came to power? Why has there been no estimate of the work load to the end of the corporate plan? Is it the intention of the Government to proceed even faster with the cuts that were proposed in the Serpell report? That appears to be the reason why there is no clear indication of how much work will be left at the end of 1987.

The Serpell report made various suggestions for BREL: that it should be forced to remain within British Rail, and not compete for work outside; that it should be privatised——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Lady but this is a private notice question, not the response to a statement.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I want to make it quite clear to the House that what the Government are insisting on is a rundown in the existing stock in BR. Will the Minister tell us whether it was ever made clear to the electorate in the constituencies that are to lose a highly skilled work force what the real effect of Conservative government would be on employment in BREL workshops? How does the Minister defend the fact that none of his efforts to obtain contracts overseas have been sent to British Rail, where they are desparately needed? Will he ensure that the new contracts go to BR and not to foreign workshops? If not, how dare he try to defend cuts in necessary jobs?

Mr. David Mitchell: The hon. Lady asked whether I knew of the job losses. Yes, of course I know. I am painfully aware of the job losses and deeply concerned about them. However, the reality is that when British Rail invests in new diesel multiple units and new rolling stock, that rolling stock requires much less maintenance than the old rolling stock. For that reason, the more investment it undertakes in new rolling stock, the less work there is in the old refurbishment and maintenance work which has been going on.

I shall give the House the facts. The average replacement rate is two new vehicles for three old vehicles. Each vehicle needs 30 to 40 per cent. less annual BREL maintenance than the older ones. Therefore, overall, to have a new fleet means a 50 to 60 per cent. reduction in the maintenance work which follows. That is an inevitable consequence. Nothing that the hon. Lady can do by blustering to the House alters the fact that the work load does not warrant the maintenance of the entire system as it now stands.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): Is my hon. Friend aware that, if the closure takes place, it will increase male unemployment in my constituency and the sorrounding areas by up to 50 per cent? Is he further aware that the Swindon railway works has been run down for more than 20 years, during which time there have been both Labour and Conservative Governments? Nothing has been done to reverse that trend, which was brought to an end yesterday.

In the circumstances, will my hon. Friend press British Rail to seek redeployment for as many of the work force in the railway works as can be achieved?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Gentleman will be redeployed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a serious matter for the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Mr. Coombs: Will my hon. Friend press British Rail for redundancy payments on the same level as those granted this year to people in other nationalised industries? Will he press British Rail to increase the sum available through British Rail Holdings — the enterprise agency recently created in my constituency — to redeploy workers and to create new businesses there to take up the work force who will be made redundant following the announcement? Will he further press British Rail to offer the Swindon works on the open market, as a going concern with a large pool of highly skilled engineering workers who would be a proud addition to any company in the world?

Mr. Mitchell: Last May the forward projection showed an anticipated work force at Swindon of just under 700. Those jobs are now going as a result of yesterday's announcement. Some of the men will be relocated within BREL, as a result of natural wastage throughout the organisation. My hon. Friend will be aware that, whatever Government were in office, it would have made no difference to the need to balance the capacity and the demand within BREL.

Redundancy payments and the funds available to help create work in those areas will be pro rata to those at Horwich and Shildon. My hon. Friend asked me to press the management of British Rail to offer the works as it stands on the open market, and I shall certainly draw that suggestion to the attention of the chairman of British Rail.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): I seek assurances from the Minister that British Rail will not put any orders for new locomotives overseas, and that any new stock will be built by British Rail engineering workers in my constituency and throughout the country. Will the Minister come to Springburn and see the impact that the decision has had on my community? Since the turn of the year we have had three major closures involving redundancies, yet we are only in the month of May. If the Minister seriously believes that he can find alternative employment, why was he not having discussions with the unions a year ago, and looking for alternative work then, instead of waiting until the announcement was made?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman raises the question of British Rail's purchases of locomotives, possibly from overseas. I must tell him that British Rail is in a competitive market. It has no monopoly, and is in competition with air and coach services and private cars. It must give its customers the best service and value that it can. Therefore, it must buy as competitively as it can. British Rail and I hope that it can do so from British engineering.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): Does my hon. Friend agree that this evolution was almost inevitable from the steam age to the diesel age, because the carriage works were started in the early part of this century? Is it not clear that the decision had to be made one day? With the inevitability of the decision, will he ensure that every sympathetic consideration is given to the employees who will be made redundant? Will he ensure that British Rail realises how emotive the issue is and, in every case, will he bring it to the attention of the board that those employees must receive every consideration for the many years of loyal service that they have given to British Rail?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the valuable service given to British Rail, especially by the workers at Swindon, who had an especially good productivity record. I wholly support the point that he made. When the BREL works were closed at Shildon and Horwich, I explored with British Rail every way of helping to create jobs. Of course, I shall do the same for Swindon.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): In view of the deplorable state of much of the rolling stock in the southern and eastern regions, where we are constantly told that, due to a lack of rolling stock, trains will have only four or eight coaches, it is hard to believe the Minister's statement. The rolling stock on the Isle of Wight goes back to 1924. Is the Minister sure that he is not destroying a railway industrial base which, in three or four years' time, we shall desperately need to produce the rolling stock that I believe is needed now? Is he sure that we will not be importing it from America?

Mr. Mitchell: I have to say that Swindon is not geared to the sort of work which the hon. Gentleman describes. There is no intention to close the works at Eastleigh— [Interruption.] There is absolutely no intention to close the works there. There has been a small reduction in the work force, which is deeply regretted. The precise programme for the refurbishment of Southern region's rolling stock is a matter for the management of British Rail, not for Ministers.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Does my hon. Friend recognise the excellent work that has been done at BREL and at British Rail workshops in Derby, especially the tremendous efforts made by management and men, many of whom are my constituents, to modernise the works and improve productivity? Does he agree that the action taken by BREL workers in other parts of the country—to go on strike—is exactly the wrong approach, for if we are to win more customers, we need a work force that is not only competent, but reliable?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. BREL can be proud of the way in which it has succeeded in recent months in winning orders in open competition. Indeed, it has just won the first competitive contract for freight wagon repairs, for which 13 companies had tendered. That fully bears out my hon. Friend's point: that BREL has become an efficient operation with an efficient work force and can compete successfully.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Can the Minister demonstrate to the House that he is not acting like a modern Pontius Pilate, and tell the House what he proposes to do and what measures he will take to help BREL to compete in the export market and to regain some of the export orders that it has lost in recent years?

Mr. Mitchell: It is not for politicians to undertake the work of manufacturing and exporting — that is for BREL. I have told BREL that I am available to help it in any way that I can in support of its export programme. It has had a considerable number of export inquiries for the railbus and the international coach and we shall do all that we can to help it succeed in that way.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Does my hon. Friend think that the Caley works at Springburn, Glasgow, where a number of my constituents work, will have a viable future with only 460 employees? Is he satisfied that the work load of BREL is shared fairly throughout the United Kingdom? Can he assure me that the BREL management is attaching adequate priority to the important job of winning vital export orders?

Mr. Mitchell: On my hon. Friend's point about the future of the Glasgow works and whether the number of employees will be viable the work fulfilled in the past at the Glasgow works is changing. However, I have every reason to believe that the numbers that have been projected will be enough for a viable future for the works. As to the share of the work, it is not a case of sharing it fairly but of allocating it within BREL's management to where it can be done most efficiently and cost-effectively.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): Will the Minister acknowledge that, if British Rail places a major order for locomotives abroad, he will be coming back to the Dispatch Box to announce further redundancies and closures in BREL? Will he also acknowledge that, if such orders are placed abroad, he will be putting a large knife through the heart of some of Britain's biggest locomotive manufacturers?

Mr. Mitchell: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point; that is why it is so necessary for the British firms that manufacture such products to do so as cost-effectively and competitively as their competitors elsewhere. On that basis, British Rail will order, and will be delighted to order, from British firms.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Is my hon. Friend aware that this is but another example of the many that we have had, and will yet have, of the private and public sectors doing away with jobs because of increased efficiency and increased technology? That is not the Government's fault, but is my hon. Friend aware that the Government must be concerned with how we re-allocate our employment resources, so that, either by reduction in hours of working or years of work, or by earlier pensions we can make up for the jobs that are being lost month by month and year by year?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is correct. Increased efficiency often reduces jobs, but a huge British Rail investment programme stretches out ahead of it. In the next five years, we expect some £2,200 million to be in invested by British Rail, which will create many jobs.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): Will the hon. Gentleman reconsider his answer to the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) about the division of work? Does he not know that allegations were made to me by the trade unions at Springburn two months ago that those works did not get a fair share of the work coming from the Scottish area of British Rail, never mind the work coming from other areas? Will he look at that, because Springburn has borne an extremely heavy proportion of the redundancies involved?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman will know that there were certain difficulties at Springburn last year. I shall draw his comments to the attention of BREL management, but it must be for it to decide where it can best carry out the work that it has to do both cost-effectively and efficiently.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why does this Minister, like the rest of those on the Tory Front Bench, glory in putting people on the dole? When will this bleeding stop? Is it not just what the railwaymen have been saying? What does one expect from this Government, with a Prime Minister who will gallivant all around the world but does not have the decency to travel on a British train?

Mr. Mitchell: I bitterly resent the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that I or any other Minister glories in people being put on the dole. My hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) will confirm that I have been as anxious as anyone to try to retain the jobs involved. It is force majeure. The hon. Gentleman should know that if there is no work available, factories cannot be kept empty.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call those hon. Members with a direct interest in this matter.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Would it not be common sense—I know that the Government are a little short of that—to bring about a movement of heavy freight from road to rail, thereby generating demand and doing a service to the environment and the country?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman makes a very sensible point, and I shall make two points in reply. First, the Government already give grants to seek environmental improvement by the transfer of traffic from road to rail. Secondly, nothing has given a larger boost to the movement of goods by road than what happened on the railways during the miners' strike.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Here is another sensible point. When the Minister answered my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin), did he reflect whether the French railways would ever place an order for engines outside France or whether the Japanese railways would ever place an order outside Japan? What other countries can he name, which have major railway engineering industries, that place orders outside their own industries?

Mr. Mitchell: Hon. Members on both sides of the House have called for encouragement and help for BREL in its exporting work. If other countries manufactured everything that they wanted themselves, there would be no exports for Britain. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): Now that the Minister has expressed his grave concern and sorrow at the predicament of the engineers at BREL, may I remind him that the recent publicity engendered through British Rail by Mr. Bob Reid about the possibility of placing orders for 1,500 locomotives abroad could mean the loss of £1·5 billion-worth of business? I have been in correspondence with the chairman on behalf of the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers reminding him of the difficulties that that sort of policy would create.

Does the Minister recognise that such action would not only affect the workshops that he has mentioned today, but, if we do not have a share of the orders it will affect GEC, Hawker Siddeley, Metro-Cammell and BREL? They will then come to the Minister to tell him that they have massive unemployment. What will the Minister do about it?

Mr. Mitchell: It is not for me to do anything about it —it is for the firms in British industry to be competitive and to win orders.

Adjournment (Debates)

Mr. Speaker: I remind hon. Members that on the motion for the Adjournment of the House on Friday, 24 May up to eight Members may raise with Ministers subjects of their own choice. Applications should reach my Office by 10 pm on Monday next. A ballot will be held on Tuesday morning and the result made known as soon as possible thereafter.

Business of the House

3.59 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): The business of the House for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 20 MAY — There will be a debate on a Government motion on the report of the Auld committee of inquiry into proposals to amend the Shops Acts, Command No. 9376.

TUESDAY 21 MAY AND WEDNESDAY 22 MAY — Remaining stages of the Transport Bill.

At the end on Wednesday, motion on the Royal Ordnance Factories Trading Fund (Revocation and Repeal) Order.

THURSDAY 23 MAY—A debate on the Commission for Racial Equality report on immigration control procedures on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

FRIDAY 24 MAY—It will be proposed that the House should rise for the spring Adjournment until Monday 3 June.

Mr. Kinnock: I appreciate that the Government have problems with their mutinous ranks, but as the debate on the Auld report next Monday clearly involves matters of personal conscience and conviction, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman to explain why the Government are not observing the honourable convention of the House and permitting a free vote among Conservative Members on the substantive motion, as we on these Benches shall be doing? Will he discuss the matter with the Patronage Secretary and come to a more agreeable and reasonable position on Conservative Government whipping for next Monday?

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): What about your whipping?

Mr. Kinnock: As ever, ours is perfectly satisfactory. [Interruption.] I am sure that there are certain Conservative Members whom the Government wish would not turn up.

The right hon. Gentleman deserves thanks for at last arranging for a debate to take place on Thursday in prime time on the report of the Commission for Racial Equality. Is he aware that the decision to hold the debate on a motion for the Adjournment is objectionable, as it is a matter of some controversy and great importance, and that it would be far better for hon. Members on both sides for the subject to be debated on a "take note" motion, which could be subject to amendment?

Will the right hon. Gentleman speak to the Home Secretary and ensure that he speaks in the debate on Thursday, as it would be unacceptable if, on a matter of such significance, the Home Secretary was again to dodge his responsibilities?

Mr. Biffen: I assure the right hon. Gentleman that good and cordial relationships exist between the Patronage Secretary and myself, although the right hon. Gentleman, as a trade unionist, will know that it proceeds on a certain demarcation basis—I do not guide him on whipping and he does not guide me on a number of my responsibilities.

[Mr. Biffen]

I will only comment—it is the bromide that one usually uses on these occasions—that my right hon. Friend will have heard what has been said.

I appreciate the point that the right hon. Gentleman makes about the form of the debate on the report of the Commission for Racial Equality and the suitability of the "take note" resolution procedure. Perhaps we can discuss that further through the usual channels, as can those who will take part in the debate.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): What reason have the Government for expecting that the private Member's Bill, the Rent (Amendment) Bill, which they are hoping will receive its Second Reading on the nod tomorrow, will reach the statute book this Session?

Mr. Biffen: I do not know, but I will look into the matter and be in touch with the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): When shall we have a clear and definitive statement from the Minister for Health about the latest position on getting an appeals system in place to deal with the limited list of drugs? The matter is becoming extremely urgent.

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate the force of the point that my hon. Friend makes and I shall draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): The Leader of the House knows that I speak as chairman of the Co-operative parliamentary group in the House; I declare that interest. Is he prepared actively to persuade the Patronage Secretary and his other colleagues to think again about the three-line Whip that has been imposed for Monday's debate? What representations has he had on the matter from Conservative Members?

Mr. Biffen: I have cultivated a great innocence about whipping and I intend to keep it that way.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): As my right hon. Friend knows, we are now into local enterprise week. Is he aware that yesterday, on an Opposition motion on business and growth, there were at times only two Labour Members in the Chamber and that at another time no members of the Liberal party or of the Social Democratic party were present? Would it be possible for my right hon. Friend to organise an action replay of that debate so that Opposition Members can display some genuine credibility rather than just platitudes about the matter?

Mr. Biffen: For it to be an appropriate action replay, it would have to take place in Opposition time.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Government's announcement today that they are to give £250,000 to the Bradford disaster appeal — an action which was urged on the Government on Tuesday by the Leader of the Opposition —will be most welcome in Bradford and throughout the country? Now that the Prime Minister has had a further opportunity for reflection and discussion, will he urge her to make an early statement, certainly before we adjourn for the recess, about what contribution the Government will give to Bradford City football club for the rebuilding of Valley Parade?

Mr. Biffen: I acknowledge with gratitude what the hon. Gentleman says about the contribution of £250,000 which has been announced today. I shall look into the other point that he makes and refer it to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Will my right hon. Friend explain why the Government have taken over a private Member's Bill to promote Sunday trading, which was defeated by the House, whereas the Government have declined facilities for the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill, which received the overwhelming support of the House?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend is very perceptive in political matters and I am saddened that he has overlooked the fact that on Monday we shall be debating not legislation but a report.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Following the publication of the results of the opinion poll in the Daily Telegraph yesterday, and recognising that a system of proportional representation assists parties which trail in some places, would it not be in the interests of the Leader of the House to organise an early debate to enable hon. Members to consider the reform of our electoral system based on proportional representation?

Mr. Biffen: We shall bear our short-lived adversity with dignity and courage.

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): What action do the Government propose to take on the latest report of the Select Committee on Procedure, which has just been published?

Mr. Biffen: As my hon. Friend reminds the House, that report has only just been published. It is important for hon. Members to have an opportunity to reflect on its interesting range of proposals, and doubtless in due course we shall have a debate.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): In view of the bureaucratic nonsense that has emerged in relation to limited list prescribing and the bureaucratic tangle of the appeals procedure, will the right hon. Gentleman find time for my Generic Substitution (National Health Service) Bill, which is due for its Second Reading and which would get the Government off the hook, as it would still leave the clinical freedom of doctors to prescribe what they want to prescribe and at the same time save £200 million of National Health Service resources?

Mr. Biffen: It is a beguiling invitation for the Government to adopt a piece of private legislation, but one which I believe might be controversial in current circumstances. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to permit me to rest on the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes (Mr. Benyon).

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): When may we have a debate on the police, particularly with reference, first, to the question of missing children—as I told my right hon. Friend last week, more than 4,100 children went missing in the Metropolitan police area last year—and, secondly, to police operational methods? Is my right hon. Friend aware that in 1984, in the London area alone, there were five fatal accidents and 43 serious injuries in such accidents involving police answering emergency calls? Does he agree that it is time that we had a full debate on the police?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises a matter of considerable interest but I must be disappointing in my response and tell him that there is no immediate prospect of Government time for such a debate. However, he will have noticed that there will be no fewer than eight Adjournment debates available on 24 May.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Has the Leader of the House had time to read early-day motion 672, in which there is an overwhelming expression of feeling by hon. Members on both sides of the House that there is need for an increase in the secretarial and research allowance available to hon. Members, and particularly to Back Benchers?

[That this House believes that, in order to carry out their responsibilities to their constituents and to play a more effective role in the legislature, it has become urgently necessary for honourable Members to have, as a minimum requirement, the resources to employ a secretary and a research assistant paid direct by the Fees Office; and expects Parliament to provide these resources as a matter of urgency for every honourable Member who wishes to make use of such facilities.]

Will the right hon. Gentleman make time available for us to discuss the matter so as to take the view of the House, especially as there is such clear feeling on it among hon. Members in all parts of the House?

Mr. Biffen: I note what the hon. Gentleman says. I am well aware of the terms of the motion and the names appended to it. I must point out, however, that the House fairly recently took a view on this matter, and there I must rest my comments.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Will my right hon. Friend try to find time for a debate soon on the workings of the Lloyd's Act 1982, which gave powers of self-regulation to part of the London insurance market? Is my right hon. Friend aware that many people are disturbed by certain features of the Lloyd's scene, including the apparent lack of zeal in pursuing frauds and lack of adequate investor protection safeguards? There is concern also about the use of the immunity clauses in the Lloyd's legislation which allows the council of Lloyds to have immunity from paying damages in lawsuits. Can we investigate these matters before a great national asset's reputation is damaged further?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has made a fair point, but I must counter it with the observation that, in the near future, there is no likelihood of Government time being made available to debate the matter. I must say what I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) — that there will be eight Adjournment debates on 24 May.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the Leader of the House be a little less flippant about the voting arrangements for the debate on Monday on Sunday trading? Does not the right hon. Gentleman recognise that many people want to know why the Labour Benches will have a free vote while the Tory Benches are under instructions from the Prime Minister's Office through the Chief Whip to vote in favour of Sunday trading? Does that not require some explanation? Will the right hon. Gentleman put it to the Prime Minister that she should make an open statement to the House next week so that at least the Church of England and all the bodies interested in these matters fully understand what is happening next Monday in the House of Commons?

Mr. Biffen: My right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary will have heard those points.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): As the Government appear to be looking forward to a classless society, may we debate this fascinating subject? Will my right hon. Friend not be too hard on the upper classes and the landed interests who, in spite of some recent lapses, have made a great contribution to this place?

Mr. Biffen: I have some difficulty in answering my hon. Friend's point. Perhaps he will point out to me privately the catalogue of negligence and oversight by the Government which has led him to make this observation.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): Will the right hon. Gentleman again consider whether to provide time to debate the closure of Bates pit in Northumberland, where 1,700 men are going to lose their jobs? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware—he did not appear to be aware of this last week when he rejected my application—that the National Coal Board in the north-east of England has deliberately refused to adopt the pit review procedure on closure, having unilaterally broken that agreement, and has dishonestly withdrawn guarantees to the NUM about the life of that pit which it gave as recently as January 1984? Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that there are 29 million tonnes of workable coal in that pit which the NCB, for political reasons, refuses to work?

Mr. Biffen: I do not endorse the hon. Gentleman's strictures on the NCB. I shall certainly refer his point to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Will my right hon. Friend find time for the Secretary of State for Education and Science to explain in great detail the restructuring package on teachers' pay that he would feel able to commend to his Cabinet colleagues so that there is greater understanding by moderates in the teachers' unions of the type of restructuring that would command support within the Government?

Mr. Biffen: I should like to be as generous as I can to a repentant sinner, but I think that the best way I can help my hon. Friend——

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Not repentant—he never joined.

Mr. Biffen: I would not look to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield to be an authority on that type of dissent, unless he has now cornered for himself the position of authority on all types of dissent! I think that I can best help my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) by referring his points to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): When can the House debate and vote on the issue of televising Parliament? This would be an excellent opportunity to make Parliament more accessible to the British public and to highlight both the splits within the Conservative party and the so-called official Opposition's abject inability to provide credible alternatives.

Mr. Biffen: This is a serious subject, and its timing is a serious factor. This is not enhanced by the hon. Gentleman's trivialising comments on either the Opposition or the Government. I assure the hon.

[Mr. Biffen]

Gentleman that this matter will be proceeded with. We shall have to make a judgment which is largely related to what is happening in another place.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Has the Leader of the House had an opportunity to read the article in tonight's London Standard entitled which refers not, in this case, to his colleagues but to other hon. Members who throughout the week have endured horrible physical conditions in the Cloisters? Wetness underfoot has meant that some of us have had to wear wellingtons. Others have had to bring in nosegays because of the stench. We ask the right hon. Gentleman to give some time for the House to debate the adequacy and inadequacy of Members' accommodation. Will the right hon. Gentleman make time available as soon as possible for such a debate?

"Wets rat on their sewer"

Mr. Biffen: As a one-time occupant of the Cloisters, I am happy to assure the hon. Lady that the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee has been considering the problem of floods in the Palace of Westminster, and its review is progressing well.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I join the call for a free vote on the motion on Monday to take note of the Auld report. Will my right hon. Friend bear it in mind that this is a matter of conscience and ascertain whether the House can have a free vote on the Second Reading of the Bill which will be introduced on that subject?

Mr. Biffen: I assure my hon. Friend that I have absolutely no difficulty in passing on that message to my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Government's recently reviewed supplementary benefit regulations for the homeless, which force people to move every four weeks from area to area, is especially punitive to the mentally ill? Although the Government admit that they do not know the number of people in this category, I believe it is likely to be about 50,000 or 60,000. Should not Government cash be made available to build proper adequate housing for this unfortunate group so that they can be given the necessary care, support and help? This is especially important for those who are homeless but are not sufficiently ill to require hospitalisation. Does not the right hon. Gentleman agree that this serious matter is a suitable subject for an early debate in Government time?

Mr. Biffen: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that this is one of the many matters that probably call for a debate, but I think that he should try his luck in an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Will the right hon. Gentleman take note of the opening comments by the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry — the hon. Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher) — in response to the Adjournment debate on Monday this week on the economic divide between north and south? The Under-Secretary of State said that the subject needed "more time". Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Government to provide time to debate this important subject and reveal the action they propose to take to solve the problem? Will the right hon. Gentleman use his best diplomacy, in which we all know he is very capable, to persuade the Prime Minister to be present during that debate? The right hon. Lady believes that it is an alleged rift, and does not recognise that it is real.

Mr. Biffen: I am sorry that I must be disappointing in my response and say that I do not envisage any prospect of Government time being made available for an early debate. I shall certainly draw the hon. Gentleman's topic to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 684 about flooding in the Cloisters, which has been signed by a number of hon. Members?

[That this House deplores the massive penetration of water into the lower Cloisters on the night of 12th May; believes it to be offensive to the Members whose inadequate accommodation has been so damaged; further believes that the dampness, discomfort and bad odours should be removed as soon as possible; and also believes that it is yet another example of the warped sense of priorities that such inadequate accommodation is offered in the first place to the elected representatives of over a quarter of a million people.]

Does he believe that, in relation to the points raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), the House should seriously debate the provision of accommodation and facilities that are available for hon. Members? If hon. Members are to represent their constituents properly, without relying on a private income, they need the facilities in which to do so. It is a serious matter. The flooding in the Cloisters this week is but an example of the problems that many Members face.

This evening's report in The London Standard misquotes the space available. I understand that the office of the Leader of the House is about 350 sq ft, whereas most hon. Members occupying desks in the Cloisters have 20 sq ft in which to work. Does he not think that that is just another example of inequality in this building?

Mr. Biffen: Yes, Sir. When I look at where I now work and where I used to in the Cloisters, I realise that it has made it all worth while. I wholly understand the seriousness of this problem, but I think that, in the first instance, we should await the report of the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee which is now considering the problem.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): If we ever get round to having the debate on proportional representation suggested by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), will the Leader of the House take into account the fact that it would be a different debate from those that we have had in the past? Representations are now being made by members of the alliance that, although they are in favour of proportional representation as a whole, they are not altogether too keen about it in relation to Orkney and Shetland and to Caithness and Sutherland because they are not sure that they can get the 50 per cent. necessary to take them over the top. Is that not another example of alliance hypocrisy — it is in favour of something in principle but does not want it to apply to everyone.

Mr. Biffen: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I look to the day when the Bolsover-North Shropshire axis will become a more recognisable factor in politics. He and I can expect the great party of principle to be sullied by more practical considerations as it gets nearer to the fruits of office.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was about to inform the hon. Member that I shall take points of order in the normal order after the next statement.

Public Order Law

4.22 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the review of public order law.

The Government are today publishing a White Paper announcing the conclusions of the review, which was commenced in 1979, and which I have conducted in conjunction with the Secretary of State for Scotland. In conducting the review we have taken into account the lessons to be learnt from the varying forms of major public disorder in recent years. We have also considered carefully the response to the 1980 Green Paper on the Public Order Act 1936 and related legislation, the report of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, Lord Scarman's report on the Brixton riots, and the Law Commission's proposals for the codification of the common law public order offences.

The rights of peaceful protest and assembly are amongst our fundamental freedoms: they are numbered among the touchstones which distinguish a free society from a totalitarian one, but these rights, fundamental though they are, have never been regarded as absolute.

The European Convention on Human Rights, for example, in the article guaranteeing the right to freedom of peaceful assembly, recognises that it may need to be restricted by law for the prevention of disorder and for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

Even so, any limitations on the rights of peaceful protest and assembly should be imposed to the minimum extent necessary to preserve order and protect the ordinary citizen. That has been our approach in this review.

Most of the present law relating to these matters is either to be found in the Public Order Act 1936 or derives from the common law. The 1936 Act was passed to deal with a particular problem of the day: the threat to freedom posed by the Fascist use of intimidation and violence. It is hardly surprising that since 1936 different problems should have come to the fore and that the rights of the citizen should need protection from altogether different sorts of threat.

None the less, the review has revealed no yawning gaps in the law. It is also important to bear in mind that even where there may be a theoretical case for change, there is no point in passing laws or conferring powers which are of no practical value because they are unenforceable. There are, however, a number of areas where the law can and should be extended and clarified, mainly in improving the opportunities for the police to try to prevent disorder or disruption before it occurs.

To this end, the first proposed change is the introduction in England and Wales of a national requirement to give advance notice of marches, subject to certain exemptions for religious and traditional processions and those for which longer notice is not possible. A requirement of advance notice already exists in Scotland and certain other parts of the country and helps reduce the risk of disorder by giving the police and organisers time to make the necessary preparations.

Under the Public Order Act the powers of the police to impose conditions on a march are confined to circumstances when serious public disorder is anticipated. We have concluded that the power to impose conditions should also apply where what is anticipated is a serious disruption of the life of the community or the coercion of individuals. There will, however, be the opportunity to challenge police conditions imposed on any of these grounds in the courts, and there will be no extension of the existing power to ban marches.

One of the major developments of recent years has been that the threat to public order or to the rights of the individual is nowadays often posed not by a march but by a static demonstration or assembly — whether it is a football crowd that has turned into a mob or a mass picket behaving in an intimidatory manner.

The use of open-air assemblies is, however, so fundamental to free speech and the right to protest that we think it would be quite wrong to confer any power to ban them, but where such assemblies threaten to result in serious public disorder, serious disruption or the coercion of individuals we have concluded that it is right for the police to have the power to impose limitations on the number of people present, the location and the duration of the assembly. The imposition of such conditions would also of course be subject to challenge in the courts.

The power to impose conditions would apply in the case of all types of assembly in the open air. We do not, for the most part, consider that there should be special limitations on particular types of demonstration, such as pickets or demonstrations by foreign nationals. It is both in principle and in practice preferable for the general law to apply, and we consider that the general changes that we propose are adequate to deal with disorder and violence whatever its cause or source.

One of the most objectionable assaults on the rights of the individual citizen is the use of intimidation against his person or property in an attempt to prevent him doing what he has a legal right to do or force him to do what he has a right to abstain from doing. Such conduct is already an offence under section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875, but for this to be an effective remedy it is not sufficient for the police to bring charges after the event. They must be able to nip intimidation in the bud. We therefore propose that this offence should carry a specific power of arrest, and that the maximum penalty should be increased from three months and £100 fine to six months imprisonment or a fine of £2,000.

I turn now to the common law public order offences. In England and Wales the Law Commission has recommended the modernisation of the offences of riot, unlawful assembly and affray. Subject to certain minor amendments, the Government propose to accept its recommendations for the new statutory offences of riot, violent disorder—the successor to unlawful assembly—and affray. These changes will not significantly affect the overall scope of the criminal law, but they will restate these offences in clearer, more modern language. They will introduce statutory maximum penalties, and give prosecutors greater flexibility over the mode of trial, by enabling less serious cases of affray and violent disorder to be tried in a magistrates court.

The White Paper contains a number of other improvements to public order law, including some tightening up of the offence of incitement to racial hatred; but I have outlined the main proposals which will apply in England and Wales. Scotland already has some of the provisions which we now propose for marches, including advance notice. The regulatory powers of Scottish local authorities over marches will continue, and the police will be given the same powers as in England and Wales to impose conditions on marches and on static assemblies. The proposed change to the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875 and those on incitement to racial hatred will extend to Scotland, but the common law there will remain unchanged pending recommendations from the Scottish Law Commission on mobbing and rioting.

As the House already knows, legislation will also be introduced in England and Wales to control the availability of alcohol at or on the way to football matches along the lines of the existing Scottish legislation.

The White Paper contains a set of proposals which bring up to date the age-old balance between fundamental but sometimes competing rights in our society. We must and shall continue to preserve the basic and crucial right to freedom of speech and freedom of assembly. These freedoms are essential to any democratic society. They must be given full and effective protection, but people also have the right to protection against being bullied, hurt, intimidated or obstructed, whatever the motive of those responsible may be, whether they are violent demonstrators, rioters, intimidatory mass pickets or soccer hooligans. I believe that these proposals will contribute in a practical way to protecting both sets of freedoms.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for sending me an advance copy of the White Paper this morning. I am glad to welcome two of its proposals. The first relates to the new measure intended to bring relief to people on housing estates and in other areas who are threatened or intimidated by louts and hooligans. Secondly, we welcome the proposal to strengthen the law on incitement to racial hatred. However, we regret that the Government have rejected the proposal that has been made by the Commission for Racial Equality, the Trades Union Congress, the Board of Deputies of British Jews and others to create powers for banning a march on the ground that it would incite racial hatred.

There are two major areas in which we believe the Government have made the wrong decision in the White Paper. In one of those we believe that they have made a dangerous decision. We are profoundly concerned about the proposal that seven days' notice must be given by organisations of a procession in England and Wales. The Select Committee recommended a minimum of 72 hours, and current practice in local legislation is 24 hours to five days.

The White Paper and the Home Secretary cite the Scottish seven days' requirement, but in Scotland the law says that notice must be given to the local authorities, whereas in England and Wales notice will have to be given to the police. We are very worried that because of that the police will be forced into making a political decision about the nature of a march and whether it should be allowed to proceed.

Even more worrying to us is the decision to give powers to the police to impose conditions on open-air demonstrations, to limit their numbers, to decide their timing and to decide or indeed to change, their place. The whole point of a demonstration is often to alert the public to anxiety by amassing large numbers of people and to do that in a particular place. For example, a demonstration about the closure of the Swindon railway workshops is most appropriate outside those workshops, but the police on their own judgment could, if they wished, change the location of such a demonstration. Therefore, once again the police are being forced by the Government into a political role that is not of their choosing.

It is especially regrettable that the Government have decided to extend these restrictions to picketing. At present the code of practice on picketing under the Employment Act 1980 says:

"The police have no responsibility for enforcing the civil law."

The White Paper will turn the civil law into criminal law.

The right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior), when he was Secretary of State for Employment, said on the Second Reading of what is now the 1980 Employment Act that control or limitation of picketing had "absolutely nothing to do with the police. It has nothing to do with criminal law. . . . The police are in no way involved in this."

Later he said:

"The Bill does not put any additional burden on the police as it does not create any new criminal offence". — [Official Report, 17 December 1979; Vol. 976, c. 76.]

Those assurances are being totally abandoned by what the Government are proposing in the White Paper.

The Prime Minister recently made the slip in the House of talking about the criminal law on picketing. That is what the Government intend to create. This will almost certainly be unworkable in practice, but, even so, it will be a dangerous infringement of civil liberties and the right of peaceful dissent. It will place the police in the intolerable position of making political judgments about such activities. It will erode the independence of the police. It will turn the police into reluctant and unwilling agents of the Government's industrial and political policies. As Mr. Lesley Curtis pointed out yesterday to the Police Federation in Blackpool, it will continue the Government process of making the police the scapegoat for the failure of their employment laws.

The people want, and have the right to expect, a peaceful orderly society in which they are protected from disorder and intimidation and in which that protection goes hand in hand with the protection of the right to free and peaceful dissent. The White Paper does not provide a satisfactory basis either for democratic dissent or for peace in crime-free streets and neighbourhoods.

It is no wonder that simultaneously the Government have seen their record on civil liberties unprecedently condemned in today's opinion polls and have suffered a unanimous vote of no confidence on their law and order policies by the Police Federation.

Mr. Brittan: With regard to the point made by the right hon. Gentleman about louts and hooligans and incitement to racial hatred, I am grateful for his support.

With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's regret that there will not be power to ban processions on grounds such as incitement to racial hatred, this is something that we considered carefully, but it seemed to me that whether there will be serious public disorder is an objective matter on which the police can have a view, subject to the right of the Home Secretary to agree or not to consent to a ban. I think that to allow a ban on the ground that racial hatred will be stimulated involves making just the kind of judgment which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think, in the latter part of his remarks, was inappropriate. [Interruption.] It is not a question of saying, "It is for the Home Secretary," as I hear the right hon. Gentleman muttering. Under the existing arrangements, as he knows, it is for the police to initiate the request for the ban, and they have to decide whether or not to make such a request.

Dr. M. S. Miller (East Kilbride) rose——

Mr. Brittan: I shall not give way. I am answering a question, and it is customary on a statement to answer questions in the proper order.

With regard to the seven days' notice and advance notice generally, I think that the origin of substantial public support for something which has been patchy in different parts of the country was in Lord Scarman's report on the Brixton riots. As for the specific period of time, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) appeared to be commending 72 hours rather than seven days. The advantage of giving a longer period of advance notice, with the important exceptions that I mentioned in the statement, rests wholly with those who wish to engage in the march or procession, because it enables arrangements for the peaceful conduct of such a march to be agreed with the police. If the police seek to impose conditions which the organisers of the march regard as unreasonable, they will have the opportunity to challenge those conditions in court if they so wish.

On the more general objections of the right hon. Gentleman to the power of the police to impose conditions, I remind him that we are not talking about a law on picketing. I made it clear that I did not think it right to have a special law on picketing, on demonstrations outside embassies or on anything so specific. The general law should apply where serious disorder arises, whether on the picket line or not. Anyone who witnessed the scenes over the year of the miners' strike would regard it as irresponsible to take any view other than that.

With regard to the suggestion that there is an incursion of the criminal law into what is essentially a civil matter, the right hon. Gentleman is living in an unreal world. During the miners' strike criminal offences were committed daily on the picket line. The idea that one could just stand by, that the criminal law was not involved, that serious public disorder did not arise, and that it was simply a peaceful civil dispute bears no relation to what happened on the ground.

The police already have powers to deal with public disorder in regard to picketing, as elsewhere. They have the power to limit numbers. The extent of the police powers and their involvement was highlighted and clarified in the judgment of Mr. Justice Scott in the South Wales picketing case.

The provision of a specific power to impose conditions enables the matter to be defused in exactly the same way as with marches and processions, and enables discussions to take place in advance to ensure that there will not be disorder on the picket line or anywhere else. Anyone who is seriously interested in industrial relations being conducted in a peaceful way should wholeheartedly welcome the proposals. Those interested in peaceful picketing have nothing whatever to fear from them.

The right hon. Gentleman, in his criticisms, wholly ignored the considerations which have to arise before conditions can be applied. There has to be either serious public disorder or a serious threat to the disruption of the life of the community, or the coercion of an individual. Anyone who thinks that it should not be right, subject to the law, to impose conditions when assemblies lead to those threats, has failed to learn the lesson of recent years.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): My right hon. and learned Friend makes the point that there is no purpose in changing the laws or providing additional powers if the real problems lie in enforcement. Therefore, may I ask him, in relation to what seem to be sensible and moderate proposals for change—in contrast to the view taken by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman)—whether the police believe that the changes will help them in discharging their responsibility for avoiding public disorder?

Mr. Brittan: My right hon. and learned Friend is correct. Throughout the review I have concentrated on the question of practicability. All sorts of suggestions, perfectly understandably, have come from all sorts of quarters, with which I was not able to agree because they did not seem practical. In deciding what was practical we were involved in close consultation with the police. The answer to my right hon. and learned Friend's question is that the proposals are put forward as a practical scheme, on the basis of close consultation with the police.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): The Public Order Bill was introduced in 1936 at the specific request of the Labour party, following its autumn conference, to deal with the problems arising from the demonstrations in Cable street and Oswald Mosley's party. In 1978, in a small way, we began to reassess the public order legislation in the light of the marches problem at the time. I welcome any reassessment of the problem of public order. There is need for reassessment from time to time.

The 52-page report was talked about for six years. It was discussed in a Green Paper and in the Law Commission's report, via Lord Scarman. There are still problems arising from marches, from the miners' strike, from the Libian embassy troubles and from the football hooliganism of recent weeks.

During the miners' strike I asked the Solicitor-General whether any of the powers available to the Director of Public Prosecutions or chief constables during that dispute proved to be unsatisfactory. The Solicitor-General told me:

> "I understand that each of the chief constables in the areas affected by this dispute has assured the Home Secretary that he seeks no change in the content of the criminal law."

I suggest to the Home Secretary that the matter could be dealt with in a much better way than he proposes by setting up a Special Select Committee to deal with all the issues. The chief constables' representatives could then come before us, as could representatives of the miners, and put their views before the Government decided on legislation.

Mr. Brittan: I respect the right hon. Gentleman's long experience in these matters. It is interesting to note that he did not mention that a Select Committee had deliberated on these matters in response to a Green Paper. When we have had a Green Paper and a response to it in the form of a Select Committee investigation, and we then publish a White Paper after a long period, I do not believe that anyone can fairly accuse us of rushing precipitately into anything.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that his decision to publish a White Paper on the present deplorable state of the law on public order will be widely welcomed? Does he agree that for far too long the judges have had to overcome intolerable difficulties in trying to interpret to juries the meaning and application of ancient common law offences, such as riot, unlawful assembly and affray, and that juries have had to suffer what Lord Scarman has called the forensic confusion caused by the obscurity and imprecision of the present law?

Mr. Brittan: I entirely agree with my hon. and learned Friend, and I welcome the opportunity that his question gives me to thank the Law Commission for its work in this area, which has laid the foundation for the changes which we are proposing in the area to which he referred. I think that the ancient laws have had their day and require modernisation. It is a question of practical importance as well as one of theoretical legal importance. I believe that the changes to be introduced will improve the flexibility of the law so that some cases can be tried more quickly before a magistrates court rather than always going to the Crown court.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): While welcoming in general terms the Home Secretary's expression of support for the guarantee of right of assembly provided by article 11 of the European convention, and in general terms the codification of the common law recommended by the Law Commission, may I express my surprise that he has thought fit to bring forward the White Paper at this time, when his admission to me at the last Home Office Question Time was that the operational lessons of the miners' strike had not yet been drawn, and that the Association of Chief Police Officers had not reached conclusions. As the purpose of the public order law must be to render more effective the operations of the police, his decisions are premature.

Furthermore, the White Paper does not deal with certain serious matters which arose during the miners' strike, including the extension of police powers to deal with breaches of the law which occurred in situations far from the scene of the apprehended breach of the peace; and, secondly, the extended use by magistrates courts of bail conditions, rendering group justice a nasty feature of our developing criminal law.

I welcome the Home Secretary's proposed extension to England of the ban on alcohol at football matches and, in general terms, the advance notice of marches. However, the proposed new ground enabling the police to impose conditions on marches and assemblies where there is serious disruption of the life of the community and coercion of individuals, seems to be a somewhat unnecessary extension of the law in view of the existence already of powers to deal with serious public disorder.

Mr. Brittan: The hon. Gentleman, with due respect, is not on to a good point in relation to the Association of Chief Police Officers' examination of the operational lessons of the strike. The chief police officers are looking at questions of practical policing. I do not believe that the lessons that they may draw from that—in which the Home Office will be closely involved—will be in any way inconsistent with the examination of the law on which we have embarked. As I have said, there has in any event been extensive consultation with the police in the course of the review.

As for the hon. Gentleman's complaint that the review does not deal with the extension of breaches of the peace of the kind that we saw during the dispute, that matter has come before the higher courts. They have clearly laid down a proper interpretation of the traditional, ancient and necessary power of the police to intervene to prevent a breach of the peace. Bail conditions perhaps go beyond a review of public order, but I take note of what the hon. Gentleman said about them.

Finally, and most important, the hon. Gentleman cavils —that is an understatement, because he objects to it—at the introduction of the extra provisions on serious disruption to the life of the community and coercion of individuals as grounds which entitle conditions to be made for static assemblies and processions. That comes from a member of the Social Democratic party, the leader of which rightly showed such enthusiasm in deploring the excesses of the past year. It is inconsistent to find the Social Democratic party spokesman on these matters adopting a contrary view.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that many people will welcome the moderation of the White Paper? Is he further aware that many people were concerned when the Libyan march took place after a warning to the authorities the night before that there might be serious trouble, which resulted in the tragic death of WPC Fletcher? It appeared afterwards that there were no powers to stop, limit or control such a demonstration outside the Libyan embassy. Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the proposed powers to be given to the police in cases where serious disruption is likely to change the location of a demonstration will effectively put an end to any serious risk in a future situation outside such an embassy which might threaten the life of one of our police officers?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for his kind remarks about the White Paper's moderation. It is a moderate document. None the less, it seeks to fill some important gaps in the law and to learn some important lessons from recent events.

With regard to demonstrations outside embassies, I shall not comment on particular circumstances, especially the state of knowledge as to what was likely to occur at the Libyan people's bureau. However, if the police have reason to believe that there will be serious public disorder, disruption to the life of the community or coercion of any individual, in demonstrations outside embassies, those extended criteria will enable the police to take necessary action, including moving demonstrators, or requiring them to move, to avoid disorder.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): Does not the White Paper have a great deal more to do with suppressing those who dare to disagree with the Government than with preventing disorder? Is the Home Secretary aware that the overall majority of marches and demonstrations are entirely peaceful? If someone hits someone else on a march or damages property, he is guilty of criminal offences that already exist, and can and should be prosecuted. That is the law as it now exists. However, under the proposals in the White Paper, even if the march is entirely peaceful, one can still be committing a criminal offence if notice has not been given to the police. That will happen even if there is no incident on the march. Again, even if there is no incident on the march, one can still be guilty of a criminal offence if the march dares to deviate from the route laid down by the police.

Does not the White Paper seem to sum up the Government's attitude that democracy is all right as far as it goes, but must not be allowed to go too far? One can vote once every five years, but the rest of the time one must shut up and stay at home. If one dares to show one's dissent, one will be hedged around with criminal laws even if there is no violence to people or property.

Mr. Brittan: I utterly and totally disagree with what the hon. Lady has said. I note with interest not only that her remarks are contrary to many of the things that have been said by other Opposition Members, but that the examples that she gave of the wickedness of the proposals do not match in any way the criticism that she makes. She says—and it sounds very nice—that the object of the exercise is to suppress those who dare to disagree with the Government. I do not see that giving notice of a march that might disrupt the lives of fellow citizens and, by the giving of notice, enabling proper arrangements to be made for its peaceful conduct, is suppressing the right to disagree with the Government. It is providing a venue, an opportunity and a vehicle for that disagreement to be expressed in an orderly way. If the hon. Lady does not want that, she is completely out of touch with the wishes of the vast majority of people.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): With regard to peaceful picketing, should not the House recall that the recommendation of the National Union of Mineworkers is that the maximum number of peaceful pickets should be six, and that such picketing has nothing whatsoever to fear from the White Paper? It is the mob rule and mob violence that we saw in the recent strike that need to be stamped out, and that should have the support of hon. Members in all parts of the House.

Mr. Brittan: My hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right. Nobody who wishes to picket peacefully has anything to fear from any of the proposals in the White Paper. Nobody who wishes to criticise the Government, or, dare I say, the Opposition, however strongly, has anything to fear from the White Paper. The only people who, rightly, will regret the White Paper are those who wish to turn disagreements into turmoil and democracy into mobs.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that certain ethnic groups will be dismayed at his unwillingness to grasp the nettle by banning marches by groups the object and raison d'être of which are solely to stir up trouble? Surely the right hon. and learned Gentleman realises that there are such organisations. It is not difficult to discern their motives, because they have displayed their spleen and venom on several occasions. There is no difficulty in identifying them and banning them from deliberately creating trouble.

Mr. Brittan: I naturally deeply respect and understand what the hon. Gentleman says. Of course, one is bound to be sympathetic to the thinking that lies behind his question. However, after long and anxious consideration, I have come to the conclusion that it would not be right to go down that route, because I believe that however obvious and evident it may be to us that a particular group or organisation is nothing other than an evil group or body, to translate that essentially political judgment into something that would lead to a breach of the criminal law is not something that we should do lightly. Obviously, the hon. Gentleman has had only a short time to look at the White Paper. If he looks at the proposals designed to tighten the law on incitement to racial hatred, he will find that they meet many of the concerns to which he gave voice and will lead to a substantial improvement in that direction.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I fully understand the importance of the statement to hon. Members and their constituents. However, there is important private Members' business to follow. I ask hon. Members to be brief in their questions.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that those interested in the maintenance of public tranquillity will be reassured that there has been no over-reaction in the document to the unhappy events of the past 18 months? Will he consider the impact on public order of those sections of the Representation of the People Act which enable candidates to make use of schools, no matter what impact there is on public order in the area? The British National party came to Leicester with many of its supporters and caused tremendous problems in my constituency. Is there any hope that my right hon. and learned Friend can hold out to my long-suffering constituents in that regard?

Mr. Brittan: I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will look carefully at the part of the White Paper that deals with that specific issue. Again, I was tempted to go down the road that he suggested, but, in the interests of the very moderation and desire not to over-react that he commends, I shrank from interfering with the electoral process in the way that he would wish me to do. My hon. and learned Friend is right. We were called upon to do several things, such as giving a banning or notice power in relation to static demonstrations, which we have sedulously avoided.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is the Home Secretary aware that more than 90 per cent. of marches and demonstrations take place with advance notice to the police and that every demonstration that I have organised has been planned in conjunction with the local police to ensure that it was organised properly? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware, however, that the proposal in chapter 4 of the White Paper will affect, for example, groups of parents wishing to protest about a road accident forming up together to walk to the council house and ask for a zebra or pelican crossing, or groups of workers wishing to protest about a closure notice walking a few hundred yards to the factory headquarters? Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman appreciate that his proposal will criminalise people who organise demonstrations of that kind if they do not give advance notice?

Mr. Brittan: When the hon. Gentleman has considered the White Paper more carefully, he will realise that there is an exemption for exactly the kind of situation that he describes. Of course there will be occasions on which spontaneous protest is necessary, or is felt to be necessary, and provision is made for that.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): If conditions imposed as a result of intimidatory picketing are breached by large numbers of pickets, what will be the liability under civil or criminal law of the trade unions which organise such intimidatory picketing?

Mr. Brittan: In terms of the criminal law, if a breach of the conditions takes place, anyone guilty of participating in or organising such a breach will be guilty of a criminal offence. There may be evidential problems, especially in relation to those who do not have the courage to turn up on the spot but organise everything from behind, but there is no doubt about the potential criminal liability. As for the implications for the civil law, I should like to reflect on that aspect.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Despite the Home Secretary's knee-jerking rhetoric about civil liberities, does he accept that the bulk of the White Paper amounts to the criminalisation and social control of dissent? Does he accept that manifestations of direct democracy should be part of any healthy democratic society and how does he relate that to the powers under paragraph 3(1) of the White Paper, which will be used on the spot by the police in relation to processions and static manifestations? Will he also explain why he has not taken powers on under paragraph 5.9 to deal with broadcasting in relation to racial hatred?

Mr. Brittan: It seems to me that if anyone is displaying a knee-jerking reaction it is the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas). There is no question of criminalisation of the exercise of civil liberties, and I do not believe that any rational person reading the document would think so. No one on this side of the House needs any lessons from the hon. Gentleman on the importance of civil liberties or the value of freedom of speech and assembly as a central feature of our democracy. On his specific point about the imposition of conditions, I think that the circumstances in which they can be imposed are entirely reasonable, and I remind the House that they will be subject to challenge in the courts.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): As one who disagrees with the Government from time to time, may I warmly welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's statement and the publication of a very constructive White Paper? Does he accept that the majority of people in this country will welcome the fact that the Government are prepared to stand up for the interests of the vast majority of law-abiding people, who are sick and tired of being intimidated and inconvenienced and having their property damaged by people who get away with blue murder under cover of demonstrations and marches?

Mr. Brittan: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments, both for the warmth of his welcome and for its scarcity value.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): As the Home Secretary referred earlier to ancient laws which had had their day, why did he go back 93 years in Scotland in relation to the seven days' notice required for marches?

Mr. Brittan: It is a logical fallacy to suggest that if some laws are out of date because they are old, all laws that are old must be out of date.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the whole country will welcome his assurance that those involved in peaceful picketing have nothing to fear? But what of unions which encourage mass picketing? Has any consideration been given to the possibility of their having to bear the expense of policing mass picketing? Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that ratepayers had to find a great deal of money to finance the policing of mass picketing during the miners' strike?

Mr. Brittan: In this context, I should draw attention to the decision of Mr. Justice Scott in the South Wales picketing case, which set out many circumstances in which mass picketing itself could amount to a criminal offence under section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875. As for payment of the costs arising from a breach of the law, I draw my hon. Friend's attention to our tentative suggestion in that area, which has proved to be one of the most difficult aspects. The House will find that certain passages in the White Paper have green edges. That is one of them, and we shall welcome the views of all concerned in the coming months.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): As these extraordinary and extreme proposals effectively put the traditional rights to free assembly at the discretion of the police, and as there is to be only six weeks consultation and the police have yet to report on the operation of the miners' dispute, and given that there are as many views as there are policemen as to what constitutes serious disruption to the life of the community, will the Home Secretary take the advice of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and set up a special Committee of the House to review the proposals in detail, and especially the view of some of us that the proposals constitute a breach of the European convention on human rights?

Mr. Brittan: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman seems able to reach instant decisions on what constitutes a breach of the European convention. It takes most people, including the Commission and the court itself, somewhat longer. The extravagance of the language used against the proposals in today's exchanges exactly matches the lack of specific examples of what is supposed to be so dreadful about them.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burnt Wood): I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's recognition that enforceability has been the problem, but I am not clear about the situation in relation to section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875. Will the proposed changes allow those responsible for organising mass intimidation to be brought to account, because that did not happen during the miners' strike, and that is what the people of Britain want from the new measure?

Mr. Brittan: Section 7 is unaffected by these proposals, but it means that intimidation is an offence. During the miners' dispute, many people were charged and prosecuted for breaches of section 7 of the Act. The problem with regard to the organisers—I believe that this is what my hon. Friend has in mind—was not a lack of law, but a lack of evidence in most cases. It was made perfectly clear that where evidence was available there were no holds barred in terms of any no-go area for prosecution.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the Home Secretary give two assurances? First, before proceeding to legislation, will he seek as wide a consensus as possible on all the proposed restrictions on the present rights of protest and assembly, given that these are above all the rights and freedoms of minorities to protest against authorities? Secondly, will he ensure that the police are required to consult local authorities before imposing conditions, and that if any conditions are imposed the full power of judicial review will be available if people require to use it?

Mr. Brittan: With regard to the widest possible consensus, I hope that the House will feel that the spirit of the White Paper itself reflects a desire to create and build on such a consensus. As for the imposition of conditions, I can certainly give an assurance that our intention is precisely to ensure that judicial review will be available. With regard to police consultation with local authorities before imposing conditions, I imagine that in many cases, though not necessarily in all, that would be done as a matter of practice. The hon. Gentleman must appreciate, however, that there may be circumstances in which, for example, because of the urgency of the problem, this would not be practicable or even desirable.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I welcome this review of public order, but what consideration has been given to making the organisers of marches responsible for the policing of marches? Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that in Leicester £30,000 was charged for sending police there, and that policing a march in the Dorking area against Beecham Pharmaceuticals cost £6,000? What is the present rule, and will it be possible in the future for a chief constable to go straight to the Home Secretary if he believes that there is a threat of serious disruption, rather than having to go through a council which, for political reasons, may refuse his request?

Mr. Brittan: I am not proposing a change in the procedure for applying for my permission in the only area in which my permission is required—the actual banning of a march. I know of my hon. Friend's concern, and we have discussed it in relation to a particular case. He will recall that when a chief constable makes an application, even the most unpromising local authority is not usually reluctant to put it forward, and I believe that we can deal with the matter in that way.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Does the Home Secretary recollect that serious disorder took place inside and outside a school which was recently let to the British National party for a meeting in connection with an election? Does he recall that a majority of the Bradford city council felt compelled to offer that school to the BNP under the Representation of the People Act? I urge him to reconsider this matter to allow local authorities discretion to refuse facilities to organisations which, by their declared aims, are Fascist and racist, and whose public activities are widely offensive and threaten public order.

Mr. Brittan: No one dislikes or hates that particular organisation more than I do, but it is vital not to be selective in our use of civil liberties and our protection of them. Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes of the United States Supreme Court said that the real test of a society's commitment to civil liberties was its readiness to provide freedom for the thought that we hate. We must continue to provide that freedom.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): What criteria will be used for on-the-spot decisions on the size and location of static demonstrations, and what training, experience or qualifications do police officers have for making such on-the-spot decisions?

Mr. Brittan: The criterion will be the one set out in the White Paper—the threat of serious public disorder—which applies at the moment and which enables conditions to be imposed by the police in respect of marches. In addition, there are the criteria of serious disruption to the life of the community and coercion of an individual. I do not believe that the application to static demonstrations of a criterion which already exists in respect of marches and processions, and the extension of the others that I have mentioned, will fail to be usable in practice.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): Will the Home Secretary deal with two specific points? If the proposals in the White Paper are implemented in legislation, is there not a danger that the law of conspiracy will be extended, and would that not be directly contrary to the trend of judicial decisions emanating from the Criminal Law Act 1977, which specifically limits conspiracy to certain statutory conspiracies? Secondly, as has already been said, does this not create an enormous problem of obtaining evidence in furtherance of a conspiracy, with a further waste of resources?

Mr. Brittan: I do not see why the use of the law of conspiracy should be increased because of the proposals in the White Paper. If the hon. Gentleman has a point which I have overlooked, I should be grateful if he would write to me about it.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): When an important White Paper is issued which covers Scotland as well as the rest of the United Kingdom, it is unsatisfactory if no Scottish Office Minister is at the Dispatch Box to answer our questions. It is also unsatisfactory when Scottish Office activity is confined to a briefing of the press in Edinburgh.

May I assume that the Home Secretary is on this occasion in a position to answer for the Scottish Office? On that optimistic assumption, why has section 3(2) of the 1936 Act been repealed when section 3(1) has survived in relation to Scotland? When is the Scottish Law Commission report, which is specifically referred to in the White Paper, likely to be forthcoming? Has any consideration been given to importing criteria against which to measure the possibility of a ban on a procession under section 63 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, which will remain the main controlling legislation for Scotland?

Does the Home Secretary accept that many people in Scotland believe that it is serious when an individual going peacefully to his place of work to exercise a traditional right may be guilty of a criminal offence merely by exercising that right? Is there not a danger that this will place the police in the unenviable position of having to take decisions which, whatever they may feel, will be seen as being quasi-political and which could pitch them into the storm centre of controversy? Surely the real test is whether these powers are enforceable and whether they will improve the crisis situation which the police have had to face during the last year or 18 months. Is not the legacy of the White Paper's muddled thinking that the police will be given painful choices and have to face difficult dilemmas, rather than useful powers, which they will not necessarily want?

Mr. Brittan: It is precisely because I have had in mind the practicability of any new decisions which the House might take that these powers are limited and circumscribed in the way proposed. That general point is, I believe, taken care of, although I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's anxieties.

I shall write to the hon. Gentleman on his first point — [Interruption.] I am sure that that is the wisest course. I am not able to say when the Scottish Law Commission will report, but for reasons which are different from the answer that I gave to his first point. The White Paper makes it quite clear that the regulatory arrangements affecting local authorities are regarded as acceptable, subject to the supplementation of the further proposals covering England, Wales and Scotland.

House of Commons (Members Access)

5.16 pm

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful to you for calling me to raise it. I wish to draw your attention to the Sessional Order dealing with the duties of the Metropolitan police, which is passed at the beginning of each Parliament. It is of direct consequence to an incident that happened to me this morning, on which I seek your guidance.

The order states:

"That the Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis do take care that during the Session of Parliament that passages through the streets leading to this House be kept free and open and that no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House".

At 10 o'clock this morning I was knocked down on the crossing between St. Stephen's Entrance and Westminster Abbey. You may be aware that this is a studded crossing, which is not classified as a proper pedestrian crossing. Having reported the accident to the Chief Superintendent of Police based here, I am informed that this crossing becomes a legal crossing when a Division is in progress, when the police can keep an eye on the traffic to enable hon. Members to get to the Division.

This crossing is used by many hon. Members and secretaries. As you will know, Mr. Speaker, Abbey Gardens and Dean's Yard contain many offices for secretaries and Members. Can you advise us on what can be done, following an investigation in consultation with the Serjeant at Arms and the Chief Superintendent of Police, to make this crossing subject to the legal requirement that cars and cycles should stop? On road safety grounds, there is surely a need to protect hon. Members going to and from their place of work.

Mr. Speaker: The whole House will be sorry to hear of the hon. Gentleman's accident—[Laughter.] Order. This is not a matter of amusement. I shall look into the matter.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that the whole House will be delighted to know that my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) is slowly being restored to the rudest of the rude, following his accident this morning.

As a frequent user of that road, I endorse the point that my hon. Friend made. Because of the enormous build-up of tourist traffic, coaches and pedestrians, in the access areas outside the House, it is becoming increasingly hazardous to cross this road. I very much hope that the warning sign on that crossing can be made much clearer, even to the extent of erecting signs on lamp posts stating, "Caution. MPs cross here."

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is there no limit to the pomposity of some hon. Members, who waste our time with such trivia? If the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) had been in collision with a vehicle of his own size, it would have been a Sinclair C5, and he would have come off best again.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the House will not treat this as a matter for hilarity. I have said that I will look into the problem. A great many hon. Members cross that road.

Auld Report Debate (Selection of Speakers)

5.20 pm

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Barnet, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, relating to next Monday's debate. It is the custom of the House that the Chair always exercises fairness in calling hon. Members from each side to speak in a debate. On this occasion the debate will be of a cross-Bench type. At the heart of the question there will be a matter on which hon. Members on both sides will have set opinions. May we be assured that there will be a balance in the debate so that the different points of view, whether from this side or from that, can be heard? Secondly, if the Chair is aware that a large number of hon. Members wish to take part in the debate, will the ten minutes rule be operated?

Mr. Speaker: That is a hypothetical point at the moment, to the extent that I do not know how many hon. Members will wish to take part in the debate. In an issue of this kind, however, I carefully weigh the balance of opinion as well as the balance of the parties. I shall consider carefully the question of a limit on the length of speeches when I have some idea of how many hon. Members wish to take part in the debate.

Personal Statement

5.21 pm

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On Tuesday, at Question Time, I asked the Prime Minister a question which reflected upon the activities of an hon. Gentleman while in the Falkland Islands. I now understand that my question was based on an erroneous press report.

As we are all men and women of honour in this House, and as I would never wish to make an unfair point against the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), if it is possible for me to withdraw the question, I unreservedly do so.

Mr. Speaker: I think that honour has been satisfied.

Adjournment (Spring)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House at its rising on Friday 24th May do adjourn until Monday 3rd June, and the House shall not adjourn on Friday 24th May until Mr. Speaker shall have reported the Royal Assent to any Acts which have been agreed upon by both Houses.—[Mr. Durant.]

5.22 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): The Leader of the House will probably already be aware that in the elections that took place yesterday in Northern Ireland—despite the difficulties encountered by many electors in casting a lawful vote, which were the subject of an exchange between myself and the Prime Minister some hours ago which I believe was heard by the right hon. Gentleman—the Ulster Unionist party scored a significant success that confirms the outcome or verdict of the 1983 general election as reflected in the composition of the House.

You might wonder, Mr. Speaker, why an event that is naturally the cause of such satisfaction to my right hon. and hon. Friends by whom I hope shortly to be joined upon this Bench—at any rate, after today—should be relevant to the motion before the House. The point relates directly to the business that needs to come before the House in the next two months, before and after the recess, and to which the Government will need to give attention shortly, including during the recess.

It was declared to be the object of the Ulster Unionist party, when it sought election in 1983, to see an end put to the system that is colloquially known as direct rule and under which the constitutional arrangements in that Province are tentatively renewed from year to year by the annual renewal of the Northern Ireland Act 1974. There are two principal aspects to direct rule, as that falls to be considered by such annual renewal. One is the manner in which the law in that Province is made by the Secretary of State and by the authority of the House, which might be colloquially summed up as government by Order in Council.

The second aspect is the absence from the Province of local government in the ordinary sense of the term as it is without question enjoyed and required by the inhabitants of the rest of the United Kingdom. It was to the second of those deficiencies that the attention of the electorate in Northern Ireland was directed in yesterday's election, because, so far as the Ulster Unionist party was concerned, it was a local government election about local government. We declared to the electorate that we were seeking their vote as evidence of their demand and right to enjoy in Northern Ireland democratic elected local government as it is enjoyed, and covering the same circumstances that it covers, in the rest of the United Kingdom.

It is that request and petition—that is the appropriate language to be used by those who approach this House—that we are able to renew, and do renew, as a result of the outcome of the test of public opinion that has just taken place.

The annual occasion for the renewal of the 1974 Act falls in June or early July. The actual date has, I believe, varied from one year to another. However, it would be in our view inconceivable that once again, for the twelfth time, this annual lease should be renewed without any indication that in the subsequent 12 months, and early in those 12 months, it was the intention of the Government to seek the necessary authority from this House—in so far as it is necessary—to deal with the two glaring deficiencies summed up under the title of direct rule.

That is not something that can suddenly or lightly be enterprised or taken into account. It is no indiscretion to say that we have been aware in recent months that the Secretary of State and his advisers, as well as the authorities of the House, have been directing their attention to the modalities by which these two grievances could be removed, Northern Ireland could have its laws made by this House in the same way as the rest of the kingdom, and its inhabitants could enjoy the advantages of responsible elected local government wherever they live. However, if that process has been slowed down or held up, as I believe it may have been, to await the outcome of yesterday's elections, there is every reason why it should now go full steam ahead. If there is to be a renewal in the conventional repetitive terms again in 1985, what is required is that it should be accompanied by a clear indication by the Government that they are taking steps, and seek renewal only on the basis that they are taking steps, to remove those two stigmata of direct rule from that part of the United Kingdom.

That is something which is not only desirable and necessary—as I believe no hon. Member would be disposed to dispute—on its own merits. I do not think that any hon. Member of the House would seriously argue the case that a part of the kingdom should be legislated for in a different way from the part that he himself represents. Nor do I think that any hon. Member could say that the benefits of local government that his constituents enjoy ought to be withheld from the constituents of any other hon. Member. It is not just a matter of equity and the common implications of membership of the Union which is symbolised and realised by the existence of this House; it is also directly related to stability and confidence in the Province.

The new Secretary of State—I hope that I do not need to apologise for using the word new, as we all find that we learn slowly and painfully in Northern Ireland—has been devoting his attention, not unnaturally, as he is duty bound, to anything which would assist the undoubted growth of confidence and stability which has been observed in the Province in the past six months. In Northern Ireland, it is not only the words of the Government but also the actions of the Government which are evaluated, and it is for this reason that we sometimes find it evidence of incomplete understanding that Ministers should repeat and rehearse what are called statutory guarantees, when Northern Ireland is indeed an integral part of the United Kingdom.

In this matter, as in others, deeds speak louder than words. The deed which I ask the Leader of the House to bring, once again, to the attention of the Secretary of State and the Cabinet is the temporary and provisional nature of the arrangements for the government of Northern Ireland which have subsisted since 1973 and which have been renewed only on an annual basis. One may ask what would be the conclusion drawn by an ill-wisher of the Union—someone who not only hoped but believed that it might somehow be part of the Government's intention that the Union should be dissolved. What would be such a person's interpretation if he saw that the Government's acts were to insist on keeping that Province on an annual lease—a provisional arrangement, annually renewed—as if there were to be some new and drastically different dispensation still to arise during the 12 months ahead?

I have to say—I think not for the first time, but I can now do so with new authority and emphasis — that nothing could repress such a view more effectively than to see that the Government at last were proceeding to give Northern Ireland constitutional normality in the two outstanding respects in which its constitutional arrangements are at present abnormal. That would mean our no longer having the annual proceeding which reminds everyone in Northern Ireland of the temporary basis upon which the link between that Province and the United Kingdom subsists.

Incidentally, we should no longer have the quasi-farce of the time of the House being taken up in duplicating, in the form of Orders in Council, legislation which has already passed this House in the form of a Bill. No longer would hon. Members representing the Province be denied the opportunity of participating fully in the process of legislating, to which they are, as Members of Parliament, called. No longer would the inhabitants of the Province have the just grievance that they do not have local representation and local responsibility for administration wherever they live.

I do not believe that these matters are unfamiliar to the Leader of the House. For many years he has followed with interest and close attention and, some of us usually felt, with real sympathy, the agony of that part of the United Kingdom. He will have shared, therefore, our sense of growing relief at the increasing stability and confidence which has come to that Province in recent months. I feel sure, therefore, that my plea will not fall on deaf ears when I ask him and his Cabinet colleagues to direct their attention to this matter with urgency and not to wait until they are overtaken by the immediate necessity of the annual renewal of an Act which ought no longer to be necessary and which ought to be removed from the statute book.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): I hope that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) will allow me completely to change the topic from a matter which clearly concerns him greatly, to one of equal concern to me. The announcement yesterday of 4,800 redundancies in British Rail Engineering Ltd. has confirmed the worst fears of my constituents — that the Swindon railway works will close.

Before the House rises for the Whitsun recess, this matter should be considered by the Government, on whose behalf I hope the Leader of the House will listen carefully to what I have to say. The matter seriously and severely affects 2,300 of my constituents who work for BREL. They have given outstanding service in a willing spirit of co-operation and in an atmosphere of excellent industrial relations. This closure could raise male unemployment in Swindon and surrounding areas by nearly 50 per cent., releasing a pool of highly skilled men into a local economy that has only limited need for those skills. Many of the men who will lose their jobs have little or no chance of finding another on account of their age.

The rumours that the Swindon works might close have been circulating for many years, and the desire of BREL management to wind down its Swindon operations has been known since the 1960s, along with the decision to concentrate only on repairs and refurbishment instead of new build. Recent investment in modernised rolling stock built at other works has been good for the railway, good for Britain, but a disaster for Swindon as the new trains do not need as much repair as their predecessors. Similarly, the programme of asbestos removal is coming to an end.

During the past few months, therefore, I have urged BREL, British Rail and the Government to keep the Swindon works alive by increased export activity and new projects. I have asked them to examine very critically the arguments put forward for closure and stressed to them the high standards maintained by the Swindon work force. I have been joined in this effort by people from all sectors of the Swindon community and from all parties working in co-operation. Several months ago, it looked as if we might have won a reprieve from closure. Yesterday, sadly, it was confirmed that this is not true.

This is the 150th year of the Great Western railway and the vision of Brunel, which created Swindon as a railway town. In the anniversary celebrations scheduled for this summer I had hoped to be able to wish the Swindon railway works another proud 150 years. The badges and stickers are already printed in readiness for the celebrations. They say, "GWR 1835-1985." It now looks rather like a tombstone — born 1835, died 1985. The loss of the Swindon works will be mourned in a very real sense by every man, woman and child in the town.

However, it is more productive now, rather than just indulging in eulogy and obituary writing, to talk about the future. Swindon has become a phenomenal growth area in the past two decades, as a result of the town actively recruiting new industries. A vast wealth of new jobs have been created in all sectors of the economy, leaving the town no longer wholly dependent on the railway. That diversification will to some extent cushion the blow of the loss of the works. Yesterday, I spoke to the town's industrial adviser, who said that he knew of manufacturing and engineering concerns in Swindon which were already prepared to employ some of the men from the railway works. However, no matter how healthy the economy in Swindon is, we shall need help to weather the crisis, as will the 700 workers in Glasgow, and other workers throughout the country who will receive redundancy notices during the next two years. In Swindon the problem is not so much the lack of jobs as the lack of jobs to match the skills of the people in the railway works.

I am heartened to see that British Rail is creating Swindon Holdings, a new enterprise board, to find jobs for these people. However, the level of investment must be substantially higher, if that effort is to succeed. It should be coupled with additional support for job creation and small business start-up schemes through existing organisations, such as the Swindon Enterprise Trust.

I have also asked employment Ministers for a mobile job centre to be available to give individual workers practical advice on job opportunities, the enterprise allowance scheme, and how to use redundancy money as capital to start a small business. I have asked that the redundancy payments be as generous as possible, with the preservation of full pension rights, and that they meet the standards set in offers to other nationalised industry workers this year. For those who do not want to take redundancy or another job, I have asked transport Ministers to ensure that a worker who wishes it is offered redeployment either to another works or another part of

[Mr. Simon Coombs]

British Rail. British Rail Engineering Ltd. has said that it hopes to be able to place a substantial number of the Swindon work-force in another job, and I fervently hope that that is the case.

Furthermore, I have asked the Government to consider any available opportunity for a private buy-out of the Swindon works as a going concern. A company from across the Atlantic or elsewhere in the world may welcome the opportunity to get in under the European Community tariff barrier and to branch out into new projects, which only an independent company which is of fighting weight can undertake profitably. There are still untapped export opportunities as various Third-world countries upgrade their rail system.

Earlier today I met the United States Secretary of Transportation, Elizabeth Dole, at Westminster. We discussed, among other matters, the proposed closure of the Swindon railway works. I must explore every possible way of protecting the jobs of this skilled and committed work force. I was therefore grateful for the opportunity to bring Swindon's plight to the attention of somebody who may be able to offer advice and help in the rescue operation. She promised to help in any way that she could.

Provided an independent works were allowed to tender competitively and on an equal basis with BREL, it could be a profitable concern, and continue to provide many jobs. The Great Western railway survived for 112 years as a private company until nationalisation in 1947. I might add that nationalisation led to the largest job losses ever in the Swindon works. A private buy-out may sound over-optimistic, but while I admit that it is a long shot, we must not discount any possibility which might save 2,300 jobs. It is equally important to try to save the exceptional pool of talents and skills present in the Swindon workshops.

The unemployment problem in many areas is largely caused by a training gap. Employers often cannot find workers with specialist skills. It is wrong to assume that the training gap is merely another way of saying that there are not enough computer programmers. Skill shortages also exist in the more traditional occupations. For example, in some parts of the country there is a shortage of qualified welders. It would be best, therefore, if the vast skill resources at Swindon could be kept together and preserved. I have asked the Government at least to keep the forge and the spring shop at Swindon, both of which are essential to BREL's future. Furthermore, the greatest care must be taken to ensure that the work force has access to every available retraining opportunity, which will enable as many as possible to find skilled jobs in growth industries. If this programme of enterprise promotion, training and job counselling is followed, I have no doubt that Swindon and the railway workers can survive this crisis in time.

However, the Swindon railway works means more than the jobs and livelihoods of 2,300 families. The works central to the town's history, heritage and identity. Even the borough crest contains a railway engine. For everyone working in BREL in Swindon today, there are at last five former railwaymen, either retired or made redundant in past years and now in other areas of work. However, they are all railwaymen first, last and always, even if they have been working in another trade for 20 years or more.

Many thousands more are wives, mothers and children, and the Great Western heritage is also in their blood. The young upwardly mobile office workers and professionals who earned Swindon a mention in the YAP handbook are the sons and daughters of railwaymen. Indeed, everyone in Swindon is in some sense a child of the railways, either in fact or only in spirit, because if there had been no railway works, Swindon would still be a small insignificant market town on the top of a hill, and not the high-tech success story of today.

It is important that we preserve a railway presence in the town. I am glad that British Rail western region has moved its headquarters to Swindon, but it would be sad if all that remained of this proud history were administrative offices and a railway museum.

Even if it is not possible to retain the works as a whole functioning unit, BR should at least ensure that the most historic workshop buildings are preserved. Listed building status is not inconsistent with their potential use as small industrial or commercial units or offices. That way, future generations of Swindonians would be reminded of their past, while they build the Swindon of the future.

Both the heritage of a town and the way of life of 2,300 families hang in the balance. The matter should be given urgent consideration by the House. Although I have outlined what I believe to be a good damage limitation programme, it cannot be beyond the wit or will of all those involved to devise a means to save these jobs and to maintain the works as a centre of engineering excellence. However, time will be of the essence, and we must make an immediate start.

5.47 pm

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Like the hon. Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs), I wish this matter to be debated as fully as possible. Some of his remarks will strike a responsive chord in Swindon and the House. He implied that railwaymen regard themselves as railwaymen throughout their lives, no matter what job they may have to do. Certainly, I worked in the railway industry until I was elected to the House in 1974. I shall always regard myself first and foremost as a railwayman. I am, indeed, the son of a railwayman.

This is a sad day for all who care about the railways and the future of this once great industry. Only a few years ago it would have been unthinkable to imagine a British Rail without Swindon. There has been a workshop there since 1843. Despite the ravages of time, the changes in our economic outlook and policies, and the Governments who have come and gone since then, Swindon's railway connections have remained. Yet earlier today we heard that after all that time Swindon is doomed.

Although the hon. Gentleman quite properly said that now is not necessarily the time to live in the past, it would be churlish not to pay tribute to the men and women who, over 150 years, made British Railways—I use its old title to describe all the former railway companies, in particular, Great Western railway—as great as it is.

The Government's reasons for the closure of the Swindon works and the running down of British Rail Engineering Ltd. are nonsensical. There is no doubt that modern rolling stock gives greater reliability and that the productivity of those who work within BREL, including those in Swindon, has increased dramatically in recent years. But to trot that out as an excuse for a further rundown in BREL's capacity is specious nonsense and an avoidance of responsibility by Ministers.

New rolling stock and locomotives are nothing new in British Rail. The process of redevelopment and re-equipment has been taking place since the second world war. The 1955 modernisation plan forecast wholesale changes in British Rail. Many changes came to pass, but they did not require a wholesale reduction in the staff of BREL. Before this Government, the future of the Swindon works was never in doubt. Manpower requirements at Swindon have varied over the years——

Mr. Coombs indicated dissent.

Mr. Snape: I shall take the grin off the hon. Gentleman's face. This is no laughing matter. We are talking about his constituency. In the lifetime of the Labour Government there was no threat to the survival of Swindon works. I stand by that because it is true. If the hon. Gentleman has a shred of evidence to show that that is not true, he should produce it. Of course there is none.

Over the years, modernisation plans have come and gone, but they have never prejudiced or menaced the future of the railway workshops, such as those in Swindon. The Government's argument is that new rolling stock needs less maintenance and that the rate of productivity means that capacity for carriage repair and maintenance work, such as that carried out in Swindon, is redundant.

I wonder how many Ministers travel by rail. Certainly the Prime Minister does not. Transport Ministers always say that they have given British Rail all the investment that it has requested, that their desks are clear and that there are no more investment projects before them. That is true, as far as it goes; but an enormous part of the railway system is being neglected by British Rail management. It desperately needs modern rolling stock. British Rail employs some of the oldest and most decrepit rolling stock in service anywhere in the Western world.

British Rail managers, for reasons best known to themselves, concentrate only on those services that they call inter-city—an appalling misnomer, because many services that connect cities are not classed as inter-city. Last Friday I travelled on the 15.25 train from Leeds to Stalybridge. It is part of the service between Hull and Liverpool, which are two cities, yet the service is not part of British Rail's inter-city network. The rolling stock was the filthiest and most clapped-out that it has been my misfortune to travel on for many years.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): The hon. Gentleman should come to Holyhead.

Mr. Snape: I understand what the hon. Gentleman means. I occasionally visit north Wales, although I have not been to his constituency for some years. I am sure he will agree that the rolling stock on those lines needs not refurbishment, but complete replacement. Yet, because the management of British Rail believes that those lines lose money, they are not part of the inter-city network about which it boasts. Those lines are lumped together in the clapped-out mass known as other provincial services. The management intends to run those trains, which are already clapped-out and a positive disincentive to rail travel, into the ground and then to withdraw the services because there will be nothing to replace them.

That is one reason why the engineering capacity of the British Rail workshops has been run down in recent years. We have a crazy transport policy, and British Rail management connives in the running down of services that it considers do not make a profit and, therefore, in its eyes, have no long-term future.

Ever since the Government took office, alternatives to the rundown of BREL, including the closure of Swindon and the other closures that were forecast in today's statement, have been available. Indeed, they were published by BREL. In 1980, British Rail produced a rail plan projection, which forecast that, by the end of 1984, BREL would employ 47,000 people. At the time, it employed 36,700 people. The management of BREL was forecasting expansion, not contraction.

I must ask the hon. Member for Swindon: was there no modern rolling stock around in 1981? I have already said that 10 years after the war, somewhat belatedly, the first modernisation plan was published. We have had 30 years of modernisation and replacement, yet only four short years ago BREL management forecast an expansion in engineering capacity. What has gone wrong since then is that the Government and the present management of British Rail have connived in running down the industry.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that, after the trauma of the closure of Horwich—my hon. Friend will be aware that I started my career there—it was rumoured that Swindon would be the next in line? Despite the need to replace rolling stock, can one not draw the conclusion that, if closures continue in this way, BREL will disappear? Instead of expansion, there will be contraction, and it will the end of BREL as we know it.

Mr. Snape: My hon. Friend is right to remind us of the fate of the Horwich works. At the time, railwaymen were told, "Provided that you accept this closure, that should be the end of it." That has been the story at BREL and on British Rail's operational side for many years. No one believes management any more. It is no wonder that morale in the industry is at rock bottom. No one believes Ministers, or the management, when they talk about the future. They have been assured time after time, "Accept this one last closure and, although fewer people will be employed in the industry, they will at least be properly paid and will have a future." It has never been true, and it is not true now.

The decisions that affect the livelihoods of those at Swindon and elsewhere have been taken on an ad hoc, almost day-to-day, basis. That is one reason why BREL is in its present state. Another reason, as my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) implied, is that it is the Government's intention to privatise anything that they can get their hands on to make a bob or two for the Treasury. Those of us who are interested in such matters are in no doubt that privatisation is intended for British Rail Engineering Ltd. However, before privatisation, it is necessary to get the constituents of the hon. Member for Swindon out of the way and on the dole.

British Rail Engineering Ltd. intends to slim down—to use its favourite euphemism — to about 16,000 employees before it is privatised some time in the next two or three years. If the hon. Gentleman's constituents are being sacrificed to that ideological goal, that is being done regardless of whether there is any alternative employment for them.

Mr. Coombs: The hon. Gentleman has been carping at me for so long that there are now more points than I could possibly answer in one intervention. When my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport with responsibility for railways and I travelled by train to Swindon to see the railway works 18 months ago, we were clearly told that the fear of closure had been over the railway works for the past 20 years, under Governments of both political parties. The hon. Gentleman spoke of the rundown of the numbers of people as opposed to the planned expansion, but that expansion was planned because repair work was expected to increase. Instead, the number of new build operations has increased, there has been less repair work and, therefore, the number required in the repair works, such as Swindon, has been reduced. Normally, the hon. Gentleman is better informed than this. I hope he will accept that what I say is true and not continue to suggest that the threat of closure has occurred only in the past two years.

Mr. Snape: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. The last major closure at Swindon was in 1962, when the old carriage and wagon capacity was closed. That was in the immediate aftermath of Dr. Beeching's report, and a Conservative Government were in power at the time. Unlike the hon. Member for Swindon, I do not wish to make a political point about the 1960s, but only 5,000 were left at the Swindon workshops after that closure in 1962.

The hon. Member for Swindon will accept that I have been to Swindon on many occasions over the years. The last time was about a year ago. For many years there have been fears in various parts of the workshops at Swindon about the future. Jobs change and, as the railways evolve, things are done differently. It has been necessary for people to be redeployed and in some cases made redundant. However, I repeat that never during the period of the last Labour Government was the continuance of Swindon as a railway centre in any doubt.

I also repeat that one of the things that has precipitated the latest crisis at Swindon is the decision by the British Railways Board not to carry on with the asbestos removal programme for its older diesel multiple units because it says that it can manage without them after 1986. That is directly contrary to what it was saying two years ago.

I can illustrate why morale has justifiably plummeted within BREL. Earlier, I referred to the rail plan projection that forecast 43,000 people working within BREL. In 1982, another rail plan forecast that by the end of 1986 27,000 people would be working in the industry. That is a dramatic fall by any stretch of the imagination, and it shows that the Government have changed their policies, although never their philosophy, and decided to run down BR's capacity enormously.

Looking at British Rail's freight side, is it any wonder that places such as Swindon, Glasgow and Horwich are under direct threat? There is virtually no rail freight any more because BR's wagon-load fleet—the hon. Member for Swindon looks at the sky. I shall give him the figures.

Mr. Coombs rose——

Mr. Snape: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. He has had a fair crack of the whip and others wish to speak in the debate.

BR's freight carryings have virtually collapsed over the past four or five years, as a deliberate act of policy.

Mr. Coombs: As a result of the miners' strike.

Mr. Snape: It has nothing to do with the miners' strike. The British Railways Board took the decision to phase out its unbraked wagon fleet about five years ago. It decided not to replace those vehicles with modern air brake vehicles, because it decided to get out of the wagon-load business and to concentrate only on train mode traffic. Therefore, it introduced the speed link wagon flow system. That means that if one wishes to send a wagon-load of traffic from Swindon to Glasgow, for example, BR will say, "Thanks very much. Ring your local road haulier. We do not want to carry it."

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Quite right.

Mr. Snape: We do not expect any common sense from the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King).

That is the reason why not only is there no freight and Swindon is closing but juggernaut lorries infest the length and breadth of the land. That is the result of deliberate policy.

It is not only the Swindon works, serious and tragic though its position is, but other works that are directly threatened. Since the early 1960s, Scotland has lost no fewer than four of its five main workshops and thousands of skilled engineers have gone to the wall and lost their jobs. The one works left, Springburn, has its closure almost guaranteed because of the small number of staff left after the latest announcement. It is an appalling tragedy that an industry in which Britain used to set an example for the rest of the world is being virtually closed.

I know that the management of BR appears to be interested only in expense-account bottoms on Pullman seats, but most people would prefer a greater proportion of freight to be carried by rail for both environmental and social reasons. If we had a system of finance that properly compared the two different modes of transport, perhaps even Tory Members would see the common sense of the approach that I have tried to outline.

The Under-Secretary of State for Transport spoke earlier about exports, and here BREL has a good record. It has many contracts for railway equipment in various parts of the world. However, anybody who knows anything about exports will be the first to say that it is difficult to maintain one's export market and to bid for contracts overseas if, at the same time, one is running down home market capacity.

The Under-Secretary was asked whether he thought that the French or the Japanese would ever buy railway equipment from us. Neither of those countries ever buys anything from us, but for many years Britain has been in the forefront of railway contracts to the developing world. However, we are now being asked why, if our railway industry is not good enough to produce equipment for the home market, it is good enough for export. The announcement by BR's chairman that it is considering buying many of the 1,500 locomotives that will be required between now and the early part of the next century from the United States, does not endear him to the BREL work force. Nor does it augur well for the future of the railway workshops and the railway industry at large.

Even at this late stage, I hope that we have not passed the point at which it is no longer possible to say that BREL has a future. I fear that, under this Government, BREL does not have a future. The short-sighted policies that the Government are carrying through will mean the demise of BREL.

For all the riches of the British silicon valley, which stretches down the M4 motorway and includes Swindon, few of the skilled men and women at BREL will qualify for jobs in those new industries because of the enormous change in technology. I do not think that the electorate of Swindon will forgive the hon. Member for Swindon. I hope that the Tory party, which has brought BREL to the brink of penury, will pay the electoral consequences soon rather than later.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I remind the House that the debate is limited to three hours. If there is reasonable brevity, every hon. Member should have the opportunity to contribute.

6.10 pm

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I believe that the House should not rise for the Whitsun recess without considering the serious consequences of the strikes by schoolchildren. There have been demonstrations in various parts of the country—two of them extremely large. The aim of the strikes is to destroy the youth training scheme—a scheme that is fundamental to the future of the very children who were asked to demonstrate against it.

The most recent strike was organised under the banner of the School Students Action Committee. It was set up by the Young Socialists at their annual conference at Easter, and it is supported by the Youth Trade Union Rights Campaign. Both are Labour party groups. The central organisation was carried out by the Youth Trade Union Rights Campaign from its office in Labour party headquarters in Walworth road. It provided pupils throughout the country with 20,000 leaflets, published at Labour party headquarters, presumably with Labour party money. The Daily Telegraph suggests that the Labour party has provided that group with funds of about £4,000. That has not been denied——

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): More.

Mr. Greenway: That is significant. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to tell us how much more. That could be important to the discussion.

Mr. Nellist: I am prepared to intervene in the hon. Gentleman's speech, but I hope to make a speech myself. During the past four years the support given by the national executive committee of the Labour party and various trade unions, such as the National Union of Public Employees, to the campaign to win decent conditions for young workers on Government training schemes has exceeded £4,000, because it has involved subventions to organised lobbies of this House three years ago and in February, as well as conferences in Manchester and other parts of the country.

Mr. Greenway: I am talking about the strikes by schoolchildren. Although the hon. Gentleman broadened his remarks, I presume that a great deal of the money that he mentioned funded the organisation of those strikes. If the funds exceeded £4,000, that only helps to underline the serious nature of what the Labour party is doing.

The hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields) are joint presidents of the Youth Trade Union Rights Campaign, and I understand that each of them contributes £40 a week to its funds. They are obviously heavily committed to its cause. I understand that Militant has a keen interest in it.

Mr. Nellist: We contribute £20 a month each.

Mr. Greenway: That is £40 between them. But what is a few pounds? It is the principle that is important. The country will recognise that substantial sums of money are being used to stir up unrest among children at school. They are being stirred up by people who are not schoolchildren, but who are in their 20s, 30s, and 40s.

On Merseyside, the strike of 4,000 schoolchildren took the form of a march to a rally addressed by the hon. Member for Broadgreen. It is a serious matter when Labour members of the Liverpool education committee vote unanimously to legalise truancy by guaranteeing the children immunity from victimisation.

I suppose that that means that if headmasters or teachers sought to bring the children back to reason, to talk to their parents about the silly action that they have taken in absenting themselves from their valuable studies for their future, or to punish them in any way, the Labour members of the Liverpool education committee—and they are in the majority — would ensure that they were not punished.

Hampstead school in London became heavily involved in the strike, and 4,500 pupils joined in the march. The car windows of two teachers were smashed and windows in the school were broken. After that exhibition, Paul Lennox — the chairman of Hampstead and Highgate Labour party Young Socialists — congratulated the Hampstead children on being "about the best organised in London in making the strike a success."

The Socialist Workers party was also involved. It issued a leaflet to the school on the very next day, headed

"School kids fight back against YTS slave labour."

It stated:

"The School kids strike was really one in the eye for Thatcher and her slave labour scheme. The panic it created amongst the headmistress and the school authorities shows our potential power."

That is militant speaking, is it not? It continues:

"However, a one day strike will not defeat the Tories and all the crap they throw at us. To do this we need organisation in local schools to discuss how to build our own futures."

To attempt to subvert schoolchildren in that way is not only deplorable but dangerous, both to the children and to the future of our country. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science should come to the House and assure us that the matter will be dealt with and that such organisations will be kept away from schools.

I am not suggesting that there should not be free debate and argument in schools about everything that is going on, including the YTS. Of course there should. But for people in their 20s, 30s, 40s and beyond to manipulate children — that is what they are doing — is disgraceful, unforgiveable and a serious abuse of both education and democracy. Anyone who says that it is not obviously does not have any intention of giving the children the right to their own opinion—something that they are demanding from this House for themselves.

In some places the strikes were organised to such a pitch that some pupils were observed following pre-arranged signals. Young people are being manipulated by outsiders. I hope that by speaking strongly the Labour party will disown and throw out such groups. It has been suggested that the Labour party did not know what was going on inside its headquarters. That is questionable, but if it is true, it shows the total incompetence of the Labour party and its complete unfitness for government.

I want to compare the recent school strikes with those in 1972, which I remember well because I was then the deputy headmaster of a comprehensive school in King's Cross, which had 1,100 boys—[Interruption]. The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) will have his chance to speak. I hope that he is not supporting Militant in its exploitation of children, but I should not be surprised if he were.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) rose——

Mr. Greenway: I shall not give way. I think that the hon. Gentleman will be seeking to catch your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

In 1972, an organisation called the National Union of School Students was started at Rutherford comprehensive school in Marylebone road. It is a small comprehensive with about 700 boys. That organisation was started on the pretext that children were being forced to wear uniforms. The group organised a strike designed to end the wearing of school uniform and also to end the use of the cane. In a short time the use of the cane will be optional. It is significant that the recent strikes in Liverpool and Hampstead had as part of their aims an increase in the school uniform grant. Times have obviously changed.

In 1972, as I saw with my own eyes, groups of schoolchildren marched from one school to another over a period of three or four days calling children out on strike. The children got into a serious state of riot, and the more they took to rioting, the more serious and frightening the situation became.

Those behind the recent strikes of schoolchildren were attempting to unleash something that they could not control, a process that could be damaging to the nation, the children and our whole way of life—indeed, to our very democracy and our ability now to be debating the matter in the House. Such activity is outrageous and should be ended forthwith.

The aims of the national Union of School Students, the School Students Action Committee and the Youth Trade Union Rights Campaign are anarchistic, as are their publications. the House should not go into recess until we have examined the serious state of affairs resulting from this exploitation of children. That is why I have raised the matter.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): I shall not comment on the subject that was raised by the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway). In other circumstances I would have dealt with the issues raised by other hon. Members, particularly that raised by my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) about the crisis affecting British Rail workshops, and the effect on the workshops in Glasgow, where there will be job losses of more than 1,000 and where the viability of the remaining workshop must seriously be in question.

We have been warning the Secretary of State for Scotland for several months of the impending crisis. I regret that there has not been the slightest sign of his doing anything to try to avert the redundancies and, in particular, to protect the situation in Glasgow. However, that is on a par with the general neglect of the Government of the whole of the railway industry and in their attitude towards redundancies on the railways and in manufacturing industry more generally.

I wish to raise another subject of importance on which it is urgent to have a response from the Government before the House rises for the Whitsun recess. I hope that the Leader of the House is, to some extent at least, briefed on the matter, because yesterday I gave notice to the Scottish Office of my intention to raise it, when I drew attention to the fact that the Department of Health and Social Security was also involved.

The issue that I raise is a scandal involving the exploitation of housing benefit by slum landlords in Glasgow and elsewhere in the west of Scotland; and, for all I know, the abuse may be occurring in other parts of the country. It has been exposed in Glasgow this week by the Evening Times in a series of articles. I pay tribute to that newspaper and to the two journalists involved, Mike Hildrey and Jim Morrison, who have acted in the best traditions of investigative journalism. By their exposure of abuses of the housing benefit system in Glasgow by slum landlords they have performed an extremely useful public service.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall) and I have been much involved in the matter in recent days, although I accept that the problem concerns hon. Members who represent other constituencies. I shall give two examples of what is happening, both of them from my constituency.

One case concerns a house which I have seen in recent days. The living conditions there are absolutely abominable. It is a tradgedy and disgrace that any family, much less a family with four young children, including a baby, should be living in such conditions. The name of my constituent is Mr Hamilton, who lives in Vicarsfield street in Govan.

For that deplorable property — in my opinion, accommodation that is completely unfit for human habitation — Mr. Hamilton is paying the landlords, Norman Properties (Glasgow) Limited—I shall come to that company in more detail shortly—£120 a month rent for a room and kitchen, to which must be added charges for rates and other matters. There is no kitchen, no proper bathroom and no hot water. The whole place is in an absolutely deplorable condition, yet Norman Properties is charging Mr. Hamilton that amount of rent.

Another case, also outlined by the Evening Times, is in an area of my constituency that I know well. Equally deplorable conditions apply. A single young person living in the house is being charged a staggering £196 a month, exclusive of rates, common charges and building insurance. As I say, the conditions in that property —I accept that the same can be said of properties in other constituencies—are deplorable.

This involves the exploitation of tenants who are, in most cases, disadvantaged for one reason or another. In any event, nobody should be allowed to live in such conditions, much less at rents of that magnitude. The rents in the cases to which I have referred, and in many others, for properties owned by this company are 10, 15 or 20 times higher than what would be fair rents under the fair rents system.

The whole position becomes obscene when we learn that the two directors of Norman Properties, Mr. and Mrs. Solomons, live in an area of Florida which is inhabited largely by millionaires. They are living in tremendous style off the backs of tenants, constituents of mine, and others in Glasgow, who are living in the most appalling conditions.

The company is supervised and run in Glasgow by their son, who also lives in considerable style in Glasgow, also on the basis of exploiting tenants living in absolutely abominable conditions. I find it difficult to speak calmly about the loathsome behaviour of the people running this dreadful company, and a number of other companies are involved in this racket.

The racket involves the rents being paid out of the public purse, for we are dealing with people who are unemployed and on supplementary benefit. The rents are being paid by the Government, by the DHSS, through the agency of the district council, which now administers housing benefits following changes made in recent years. These changes, which were pushed through in utter chaos by the Government, put the responsibility for these matters on to district councils, away from the DHSS.

I shall describe the way in which the system works. The DHSS certifies that the tenants, being on supplementary benefit, are entitled to housing benefit. The certificates go to the district council and the money for these exorbitant and extortionate rents are paid by the district council. All of the money for the rents in these cases is refunded to the district council by the DHSS.

Under this system, neither the DHSS nor the district council checks the properties to see whether they are habitable. Nor does anybody check to see whether the rents being charged bear any relation to the condition of the property. The DHSS hands over responsibility to the district council, after paying to the company to which I have referred — and other firms which are in on the same racket—eight, 10 or 12 weeks' rent in advance. That is paid to the landlords before the tenants move in.

There would be proper safeguards in an ideal world. The housing benefit regulations contain provisions to reduce rents if they are excessive and the Rent Act enables a tenant to apply to a fair rent tribunal. These safeguards have not worked. The provisions covering high rents should be enforced by the district council. The housing benefit chaos caused by the Government is linked to the financial penalties imposed on a district council if it tries to enforce housing benefit provisions. Enforcement adds to administrative costs, only some of which are refunded by the Government.

Many tenants live in fear and are harassed and intimidated by their landlords. The typical tenants are unemployed and receive supplementary or other benefits. Some are not secure tenants, but are tenants under a variety of arrangements and dodges designed to escape the security of tenure provisions of the Rent Acts. These tenants have rental agreements running for six months or 12 months at a time. This all means that they face the maximum psychological pressure. The tenants know that if they make waves their landlords may attempt to evict them. For those reasons, the district council has found it difficult to apply the excessive rent provisions. If the council applies those provisions, tenants might be placed in an even worse position and might be evicted.

Norman Properties and other companies like it behave in an uncompassionate and cruel way towards their tenants. There is no question of dealing with tenants as ordinary human beings. They take the maximum amount of money from the taxpayer and do not give a damn for the tenants living in their properties.

The tenants can apply for a fair rent under the legislation, but, because of their fear of intimidation and harassment, it is unrealistic to expect them to take the initiative. There is no financial incentive for them to do so, because the rent has not been paid by them. It has been paid out of the public purse. Typically, the landlord asks for the rent to be paid direct to him, so the money does not even go through the tenant. The district council pays the rent direct to the landlord—another twist in the system exploited by the landlord. Landlords often send notices saying that the tenants are in arrears in paying their rent. I believe, from the evidence presented to me, that many of those notices are fraudulent and dishonest.

Another irony of the system is that if one of these unfortunate people happens to get a job he no longer has a home because an ordinary wage is not sufficient to pay the rents that are demanded, and paid out of the public purse. In some cases, people are too frightened to obtain employment. I have seen evidence that the landlord to whom I am referring in this case offers houses at lower rents to working people than to the unemployed, but even for those who work the rents are still exorbitant.

I am in favour of both the district council and the DHSS operating the existing laws rigorously. This is beginning to happen, but a change in the law in Scotland is needed to enable local authorities on their own initiative to go through the fair rents procedure. In England, section 68 of the Rent Act 1977 allows a local authority to step in to reduce a rent—not, however, to increase it. In Scotland a local authority has no locus in the matter, and this is another reason why it is reluctant to act.

The response of the landlords—loathsome creatures that they are—to the Evening Times articles has been to try to brazen things out. The response of the DHSS has been extraordinary. When asked why the DHSS should pay large sums of money to landlords in these cases, a senior DHSS official in Scotland made this remarkable statement:

"Value for money is of no interest to us."

I trust that that view does not reflect official Government view.

I am glad that Glasgow district council has taken action. An all-party motion was passed today by the council condemning what has been happening and asking for the loophole in the Rent Acts to be closed. The district council has decided that it will not pay any more rent to Norman Properties. The council will have to take certain legal action and encourage tenants to go through the fair rents system if it is to maintain its attitude. The district council needs the co-operation of the DHSS, and this is where the Government come in. It is no use the district council saying, "We shall not pay these extortionate rents any more," if the DHSS keeps paying deposits or making other payments, thereby allowing exorbitant sums to be taken from the tenants—or, more accurately, from the public purse.

The district council has said that it will ensure that tenants are not put at risk because of any action that they have taken. Some of the abuses of the system were drawn to the Government's attention in the evidence given by the district council in July 1984 to the Housing Benefits Review Board.

[Mr. Bruce Millan]

I am glad that the police have been involved in this matter. A raid has been made on the premises and some documents have been taken away. So far as I am aware, no charges have been laid, but there is certainly evidence in some of the documents that I have seen of fraudulent practices affecting my constituents. I hope that the full force of the law will be brought down on these miserable landlords.

The Government's response has been the most extraordinary part of this case. Today, the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland with responsibility for housing matters — the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram) — made a complacent and insensitive statement. I am sorry that he is not in his place to hear what I have to say about him. He played down the issue, saying that he did not think there was a substantial problem. He said that the action of the DHSS was a matter not for him but for other Ministers and that he did not have any interest in it. He said that he did not have any evidence that there were widespread abuses. I understand that today the Evening Times has called that passing the buck. It is the most extraordinary example of that practice that I have seen. We are talking about public money. The Government are always asking us to save money. Local authorities and everyone else are lectured about that.

The money comes from the Department of Health and Social Security. Large sums of money are involved. No public purpose is being served. The money is lining the pockets of unscrupulous landlords. The Government must make a pledge to amend the Rent Acts. It would need only a simple one-clause Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Shettleston and I do not intend to let the matter rest. If the Government will not introduce legislation, we shall see that a Bill is introduced and put into effect. If the Government can introduce emergency legislation on rates, they can introduce a simple one-clause Bill on this matter. It could go through the House quickly, with unanimous all-party support. It would not take up much of the House's time. What I have described is a scandal. I hope that the Government will take urgent action to deal with it.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): The House should not adjourn for the spring recess until we have debated the state of the nation in its religious, moral and political aspects. We are debating on Ascension day, one of the great Christian festivals.

Recently, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, who holds that office with such charm and distinction, was asked how we should commemorate the ending of the last war 40 years ago. He replied, rightly and properly, that we might do it in the same way as we celebrated VE day—"by going to church." I hope that we shall do that in St. Margaret's, perhaps in the late summer when the ending of the terrible war in the far east will be remembered.

The Government are doing the right things politically and economically, but they do not always claim moral authority for what they do. Inflation is evil and immoral. It is a form of theft by the Government from the citizens. It is a form of dishonesty at the highest level. However, our opponents claim that Government policy is wrong. They wish us, once again, to reflate, with all the ghastly consequences that we have so often seen. The Government are correct to resist calls for reflation. We must wait for unemployment to fall—hard though that is—as it surely will fall, but we must not ruin our chances of recovery or make all our sacrifices of no avail by printing money once again.

I am disappointed that the Government sometimes appear as economists, calculators and supporters of laissez faire, when we are all aware that they are spending billions of pounds on public works and state benefits. Despite their rhetoric, the Government have not reduced taxation or public expenditure by very much. We are still protecting the poor, as Archbishop Laud and the Earl of Strafford did in the 17th century. We are not harsh Whigs, as our opponents claim, only looking after our own.

The people who complain now are from the well-heeled middle class. Our support comes more and more from the working class. There is no alternative to present Government policies if we are to catch the richer nations which are leaving us far behind. In no other way can we produce the wealth to pay for our welfare services.

The Government have at least two chances to show that they have a moral interest. One is by not allowing the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill, introduced by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), to lapse. I know that there are difficulties and precedents to overcome, but Government support would give a great signal to Christians everywhere in the kingdom that the Government are on their side.

The second opportunity is in the new arrangements for Sunday trading. I am not a supporter of the Lord's Day Observance Society. I am a cavalier, not a roundhead. I believe that the Sunday trading laws, with all their anomalies, need amending, but I do not want a continental Sunday in England. To me, the main point of Sunday is for all Christians in this land to go to church to worship God. Anything that stands in the way of that should be resisted by the Government.

Market forces are all very well. I believe generally in the good sense of market forces, but Christian forces should also be taken into account by the Government. Many of our social problems—the increase in crimes of violence, rape, drug-taking, and so on—stem from the lack of a religious and moral lead. The huge numbers of divorces and broken homes stem in part from a lack of sexual morality. The Government try to deal with some of those problems with the means that they have at their disposal. We heard some of those means proposed this afternoon by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. The Government's efforts would be much more effective if there were a moral claim behind their actions.

Like others, I was greatly relieved by the recent impressive and moving service in Westminster abbey. The sermon of the Archbishop of Canterbury was right for the occasion. It is right and essential that from time to time we have public ceremonies. They bring us together as a nation and show us and people throughout the world what type of people we are.

The Government are also under attack for their defence policies by a small but noisy minority. One would have thought that the years of peace under NATO would have quietened those critics. In his sermon, the Archbishop of Canterbury said that it was right to resist Nazi aggression by force, yet CND supporters and others are not prepared to stand up to Soviet aggression. They press their views on the majority with a self-righteousness that I find displeasing. From time to time they use violence, as do the women at Greenham common. They make an absurd differentiation between nuclear and conventional war; but conventional war is also horrible, as those of us who experienced it can testify.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Stokes: I shall not give way. We have little time for the debate and we have been asked to make short speeches. I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman served in the war.

I am sorry that we have not been given an opportunity before the recess to debate relations between church and state. At a time of moral chaos and confusion it is important that church and state should speak with one voice. Despite most people's generally increasing prosperity—apart from areas of unemployment—there is increasing crime, violence, lawlessness, broken homes, divorce, one-parent families and a lowering of standards of honesty and decency. Those matters cannot be dealt with by the Government and police forces alone. The Government must proclaim a moral standard. Leadership in those matters is required at every level. In particular, there must be leadership and a good example for the young to follow. Such leadership is being given by countless parish priests and by many people involved in voluntary bodies, but the bishops and the higher clergy seem strangely silent on those matters.

I know that it is easier to point to the state of affairs in central America, South Africa or other faraway places than it is to attempt to rebuke sin at home. That is what the bishops should be doing. They should be pointing the way to salvation through Christ and his church.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Stokes: I shall not give way. I have almost reached the end of my speech and the hon. Gentleman may himself be called.

Several new bishops are about to be appointed. It is devoutly to be hoped that they will be men of faith and courage, able to give a lead to the mass of the people who are now being brought up in a largely heathen society.

Another matter that will come before us soon is the review of social security benefits that is being undertaken by the Government. We are enjoined in scripture to look after the fatherless and the widows; but that does not mean that, for instance, the father of a family should not seek to provide for his wife and children. The state, in seeking to provide a safety net for the sick, the old, the infirm and those who cannot obtain work, must not weaken the personal responsibility of the head of the family.

Too often the so-called one-parent family, which costs the state so much, is the result of selfishness or self-indulgence by one or both parents. I hope that the bishops and the higher clergy will not rush to condemn the Government's new proposals for the social services. They should consider the Pope's stern words recently on all these matters in Holland.

If the Government's new proposals about social benefits are wise and in accordance with Christian principles, as I believe they will be, surely the Government should not apologise for them, but proclaim them for their moral soundness.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I regret the failure of the House to debate before the Whitsun recess the erosion of political values and the decline of pluralism in politics. I am glad to be able to link what I want to say with the Home Secretary's quotation earlier from Oliver Wendell Holmes about the need to permit and encourage views opposite to one's own. I welcome that, not least because it makes a change from the equally valid quotation from Voltaire on the same subject which we tend to bandy about.

Although hon. Members of both Conservative and Labour persuasions assent to the acceptance and even encouragement of values different from their own, the reality of what they do is different. The Conservatives as a party have made almost an industry of the exposure of what they believe to be illegitimate public expenditure.

The Conservative Centre for Policy Studies has recently published two booklets. "The New Corruption" seeks to identify what is happening in Labour-controlled councils where people who are employed by one authority are members of other authorities. I have much sympathy for councillors who have the problem of finding employers willing to allow their employees to have time off to serve on local authorities. The Conservative party implies that that is almost illegitimate.

The other pamphlet is called "Quangos Just Grow—political bodies in voluntary clothing". The self-same endeavour to draw out antipathy to what is happening in Labour-controlled local authorities was copied in Yorkshire by a leading member of the Conservative party, Lucille Campey, who produced a regional version of the list in the pamphlet. Unfortunately for her and her cause, the list included voluntary groups so patently beneficial to the community that the document was undermined. I pay tribute to the other Conservatives who, at a meeting of the Yorkshire regional Conservative party, criticised the document. It is interesting that the author herself was defeated by a Liberal at the recent county council election.

When matters are raised in this way Labour councils retaliate and assert that they are only doing for their class what the Conservatives have done for their supporters. Therefore, they intensify the exclusivity of their policy. The paradox of the two approaches is that each provokes the other. Exposure of what is referred to as the new corruption breeds retaliation. Both sides are culpable in the diminution and erosion of political values. The result is deteriorating and dangerous political circumstances in which subservience to an exclusive partisan philosophy is necessary for grant aid from central or local government. We ought not to think about the House going into recess, even for a short period, until it has debated certain issues that are fundamental to our democratic values.

The recent sad case of the National Council for Civil Liberties is a vivid example of what is happening. In one sense I am glad that it happened so publicly, because I hope it will be a warning that will be heeded elsewhere. I am not optimistic, particularly when I read in a letter to The Guardian from the professor of politics at Leeds university a defence of the view that, once a majority within an organisation has taken a legitimate decision, the minority must accept it. It is precisely because of the danger of the tyranny of the majority that a body such as the NCCL is needed. For instance, many ethnic minorities have experienced to their cost over the years the crucial difficulty of obtaining civil rights for themselves within a majority community.

The dangers of the misuse of power are immense. In my own local authority, the Labour controlling group trundles out Labour representative after Labour representative to open community facilities officially. At times it seems that only the repainting of a room is required for it to be opened officially by another representative of the controlling party who will cut a tape or make a speech. That is happening even when opposition members of the council have been involved with a project in their own community for many years. Even in such cases Labour members with less involvement carry out the official duties. I believe that is deliberate and that it is done for a purpose.

In Leeds, as elsewhere, partisan literature is produced and distributed at public expense, with a stream of photographs, articles and other material promoting only one party. That is being deliberately extended with individual newsletters for separate party constituencies. It is as if the people who have control over the use of resources in an authority are frightened of genuine debate and need instead to use public money illegitimately as a substitute for argument.

The Conservatives, of course, are not blameless. They are catching up fast. For instance, a leaflet produced recently by Cardiff city council is conveniently in bright blue. That is the first time that has happened. The document carries a message making essentially political points about finance, although it has been paid for by the rates.

The usual Conservative response is to control, constrict or abolish that with which it disagrees. That began with the ending of school milk in 1971, and continued with the Housing Finance Act 1972, the control of local authority rents in 1972, the removal of many water authorities from democratic accountability in 1974, and the removal of health powers, including ambulances, from local government in 1974. More recently we have had increasing direction of health authorities from the centre and the rate-capping of authorities that the Government believe are spending illegitimately. The latest action is the current effort to abolish the metropolitan county councils and the GLC.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was, as usual, clear and absolutely honest when he was quoted in The Guardian on 16 May:

"The Labour party is the party of division. In its present form it represents a threat to the democratic values and institutions on which our parliamentary system is based. The GLC is typical of this new modern, divisive version of socialism. It must be defeated. So we shall abolish the GLC."

I reject that view and regard it as exceptionally dangerous to our whole democratic process. If a political movement cannot win support for its view at the appropriate level, it is illegitimate to use Big Brother to enforce its opinion. All of us in politics need to enhance political debate, and that involves encouraging the expression of contrary views.

For five years before I came to this House, I had the honour to be the general secretary of the Bradford Metopolitan Council for Voluntary Service. They were five fascinating years. It was a tremendous experience and highly educational. It did more for me, I suspect, than my 20 years in politics before that. Working under a Conservative-controlled council, then a Labour-controlled council, and latterly under a balanced council, I found that the voluntary sector was able to innovate. It became more aware of what it could do, it showed resilience under the severe pressures of high unemployment and declining industry, and, above all, it learned how to be involved properly and democratically in the political process of the city.

I believe it is no accident that within the latest urban programme submissions from local authorities to the Government, the highest proportion of voluntary sector schemes come from two balanced councils—the London borough of Brent and Bradford city council. However, I do not believe that all are bad or badly motivated in other parties. On either side of the political divide there are people whose commitment is genuine, and that is why I raise these matters on the Adjournment today.

I believe that the Leader of the House is committed to pluralism in politics. We have a very fair response from him at business questions. I believe that he wishes to do his best to raise the standard of debate on serious issues inside and outside this House. I hope that, by raising matters in this way, and saying that I do not believe we should start the recess before debating them, I shall secure some favourable comments from the Leader of the House later in the debate.

An entrenched Labour supporter, Professor Bernard Crick, has written on the same problems with great force. In The Observer of 21 April 1985, he wrote about the local government powers that are to be taken if the current legislation goes through. He said:

"I honestly say that I could fear my own party as much as the Thatcherites if she gets her way on this. There are great dangers in riding so roughly over constitutional conventions."

I agree with something that Professor Crick wrote on another occasion—that political values will always be keenly fought. There is little possibility of achieving a consensus on those values, but within our parliamentary democracy we must have a consensus on procedures. Unless we distinguish between those two objectives, I fear that our whole democratic process and political debate will decline so far that it may well become impossible to retrieve it, and we shall have strife across an ever-widening political divide. For that reason, I believe that the House should not adjourn in the way that is proposed.

7.3 pm

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Mon): On occasions such as this, when all of us ask the Leader of the House not to allow us to go into recess—but would be universally horrified if he said that he would not—there is an opportunity for us to deliver all those speeches that, frustratingly, we have not been able to deliver in former debates because we have been squeezed out, or for whatever other reason. I shall leave the House to determine for itself on which occasion I might have delivered this one.

Perhaps we should not go into recess at a time of such great political uncertainty. The actions of some politicians would be more understandable if they had taken place in March rather than in May, unless, unknown to me, hares have changed their habits.

Is not political philosophy sound? The Labour party has stood on its head over the sale of council houses, and I greatly welcome that, but it seems it is more successful than Paul Daniels in making policies disappear. Indeed, rather than forming a party called Centre Forward, perhaps it should form a party known as Goalee Group, because it is so used to scoring its own.

The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) has now regurgitated the philosophy of nationalisation of land, which many of us thought had been buried years ago. According to the newspapers today, when he was asked what the attitude of the Labour party would be to his proposal, he said that it would be like meeting an old friend whom one thought was dead.

The problems to which I have referred are not to be found exclusively on the Opposition Benches. On the Conservative Benches is a new group which is highly critical of Government economic policies. At the same time, Ministers are telling us that all is well.

Perhaps this week's Economist, which has on the front page the caption "The voteless boom", may have got it almost right. It has an uncanny knack of noting the perceptions of people and translating them into words. We shall have growth of about 4 per cent. this year—the fastest since 1973—when the International Monetary Fund forecasts that growth in the United States and Japan is decelerating, and stagnant in Germany at just over 2 per cent. In Britain, investment in manufacturing is increasing, yet there is a danger that the judgment of The Economist may be right when it states:

"At bottom, though, voters are unimpressed by the Government's economic record, and for one big reason. Unemployment is still rising."

I speak with some passion on that matter, because I have the privilege of representing a constituency which suffers from 23 per cent. unemployment. We know that many demographic features have resulted in an increase in unemployment — the baby boom of the 1960s, the number of part-time women workers, and several other factors which I shall not go into in detail because that is not the gravamen of my speech.

It is right to remember also that employment is increasing, and perhaps we do not hear enough about that. Yet the canker of unemployment remains. It is important that all of us — particularly people in the country — should remember that the old belief that if the country is doing well the people are necessarily better off and happier, is no longer true. Undoubtedly some people are, especially those in work and those who are still obtaining wage settlements in excess of the rate of inflation. But that serves only to create greater division between the employed and the unemployed. That is why the forthcoming review of tax and benefits is so important.

A major service of simplification and integration could be achieved through a tax credit system—a reform for the future which was heralded many years ago. Yet we see only one form of benefit, child benefit, which was meant to be the start of a series of benefits in moving towards the concept of an integrated tax credit system. I hope that the Government will grasp that nettle. I hope that our present Chancellor of the Exchequer will go down in history as a great reforming Chancellor, with a vision of the future as to where benefits and tax should be integrated to the advantage of people as a whole.

Modern technology is at present another source of unemployment. Whatever it may provide by way of greater employment in the future, at present it is seen as destroying jobs, yet we must embrace it if we are to move forward. There was a welcome announcement yesterday that inventors in academic and Government laboratories are no longer obliged to give the British Technology Group first refusal in the exploitation of their ideas. They can now negotiate exploitation through their university or through their own endeavours. That is a welcome step forward, although I believe that in the United Kingdom we still have not got absolutely right the empathy and relationship between academic research and commercial exploitation which is so successful in the United States. Therefore, we need to move forward on that point as well.

Without undermining our economy through massive expenditure leading to raging inflation, there has to be a duty on Government to use every endeavour to encourage greater employment. However, that is not exclusively a Government responsibility. There is a responsibility on those in work, and particularly their union representatives, to ensure that we do not lose competitiveness by increasing unit labour costs. Wages are still increasing in real terms. Those who seek to force through high wage claims in excess of the rate of inflation are entrenching unemployment for others.

There are two ways in which the Government can help to increase employment without risking greater inflation. The first is to reduce the cost to the employer. The Budget was a welcome acknowledgment that that is a good way of trying to increase the number of people who are employed. The cuts in employers' national insurance contributions announced in the Budget are a great help, but that could have been done far more imaginatively. Measures such as greater cuts in or total exemption from the costs of employing people in areas of high employment such as Anglesey and other parts of Wales, and also for young people under 20, could have directed the assistance to where it was most needed. That is what is needed now to ensure that we do not have unemployment black spots. There are several of those, regrettably, which lead to great misery and frustration, and an increasing sense of despair among our people. I should like to see a reduction in the costs to the employer on both a geographical and sectoral basis.

The other way to try to overcome unemployment is to help the growth of small businesses. The Government have tried many schemes. I pay tribute to those attempts. I hope that I am allowed to refer to the Principality, from which I come. It is good to see the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) in his place. He will know what I am talking about. Wales is the land of small businesses. In 1982, 83 per cent. of manufacturing local units in Wales employed fewer than 200 people, a total of 31 per cent. of the Welsh population. Some 6,000 new small businesses were started in Wales between 1980 and 1983. The Small Firms Information Centre has been dealing with constantly increasing levels of inquiries, from 6,500 in 1978 to 16,500 in 1984.

My concern is whether such small businesses have sufficiently easy access to funds for setting up, investment and expansion. The United Kingdom has fewer Government agencies than elsewhere to aid the development of small businesses. I welcome the establishment of the Welsh Development Agency's venture capital fund, which now stands at £5·5 million. I congratulate the chief executive of the WDA, Mr. David Waterstone.

Let us look at where that finance is likely to go. The criteria for lending are a minimum of £50,000 and a maximum of £500,000, on a strictly commercial basis. The fund will aim to lend to less risky projects that are available and want to generate capital gains, and not income. The security requirements are strictly commercial. Normally, the fund will prefer existing companies looking for project financing and require accounts going back as much as two to three years. I do not complain about a Government fund having to be careful where it puts its money. Nevertheless, that does not answer the problem of where the small business that wants to raise £15,000 or £20,000 is to obtain money in a way that it can afford.

The loan guarantee scheme was another attempt to ensure that money could come to small businesses. It was set up on the Government's initiative with a view to promoting the initiatives from the public to start their own businesses. However, I hope that I am not regarded as unduly critical when I say that the loan guarantee scheme has done far more to help the banks than those who might get the money. It has given the banks the guarantee rather than the people who might wish to have access to the money. In general, the clearing banks that have become part of the scheme would have lent the money to the same projects in any event. They have simply been made more willing to do so as a result of the scheme because of the extra security that the scheme provides.

I suspect that every hon. Member could go around his constituency and find bank managers who, sadly, are not sufficiently trained in matters of commercial judgment to be able to make such a judgment properly when somebody comes along to ask for finance for a new venture. In rural areas one sees bank managers who are far too ready to lend money on the security of land. Now farmers are confronted with the problem of being heavily mortgaged, then they are suddenly confronted by cuts in milk quotas and so on. Bank managers have been prepared to lend money, but on safe security rather than to ventures that may have desperate need of money to be set up and to employ people.

I make no complaint about that, because it is not the bank's own money. It is the bank's investors' money. Those who leave their money in the bank would not be satisfied if they thought that the bank was making increasingly risky investments in companies. However, that does not alter the fact that that is not a ready source of available finance for small businesses.

Government grants are available. They are multifarious, and they are welcome, but we have seen moratoriums on Government grants, which make it difficult for people to rely on them. The frustration about that is manifest in many areas.

We have plenty of access to expertise from the management point of view. There is the Welsh Development Agency in Wales. We have an economic development unit and a business agent in Anglesey. All are prepared to go out and give the benefit of their experience in business, to help small businesses in planning their marketing technique and such matters. However, those people cannot offer money on terms that small businesses can afford. Effectively, the only way in which a small business can have access to finance is on strictly commercial terms with a bank, and that is very difficult.

In order to overcome that problem, we need either a Government fund offering small loans to small businesses on favourable terms — I would not favour that route because it is a Socialist route, which would build up many difficulties — or we need to shift the whole emphasis away from trying to give tax concessions to companies, to giving them to those who wish to invest their money in them. My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) has tabled a new clause to the Finance Bill, which is along those lines. It would enable small and medium-sized companies to issue tax-free bonds. The business expansion scheme adopted that concept. However, much more can and needs to be done to ensure that we can go down that route.

It is unfair for us to expect institutions that are dealing with other people's money to take risks in lending finance to small businesses. It is not unfair — indeed, it is necessary — to shift that risky burden to the investor himself. If one give fiscal incentives to the investor, the investor will respond, as the recent dramatic increase in the over-the-counter market has shown only too well. We must make it clear, however, that we are concerned about economic policy, not for its own sake, but purely as a means to achieve the happiness and unity of our people. We must make it clear that we are focusing our attention on that.

Politicians and people alike are aware of the need for a new vision of society for the 1990s and the turn of the century. That vision must be of a contented and not a divided society. That is why we must concentrate on the problem of unemployment. With a little more imagination and inventiveness I believe that we can provide that vision —but time is very short.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I hope that the House will not adjourn for the Whitsun recess without considering the collapse of the Insurance Corporation of Ireland, and especially its London operations, which will have great consequences for all of us unless we address ourselves to what can be done to tighten the regulations governing the City in this respect.

The whole House will agree that the London market is a major insurance centre and that anything that happens in it is thus of great importance. Provisions for supervision and regulation have greatly increased in recent years, and the Department of Trade and Industry has been charged to investigate whether there are sufficient solvency margins. The powers have evolved and expanded through various Acts of Parliament. The Insurance Companies (Amendment) Act 1973 gave the Department its present wide powers of intervention and the Companies Act made it compulsory for companies to be authorised by the Department and for management to be in the hands of fit and proper people. In addition, regulations were introduced providing that all authorised insurers must submit detailed annual reports to the Department. I am pleased to say that virtually all those developments have been consolidated in the Insurance Companies Act 1982 and in the 1981 regulations, so the basic framework is in place.

The question that needs to be answered by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is whether the 85 people in that section of the Department can deal adequately with 850 authorised insurers and the extremely detailed returns submitted, some of which run to 100 pages or more. How can all those submissions be adequately investigated by so few staff?

In the EEC, solvency regulations are largely left to the insurance licensing authorities of individual member states. Each member state then looks at the companies which have their head offices in that country, but it is also necessary to consider the activities of branch offices and whether the reserve ratio is satisfactory.

That is the background to the collapse of the Insurance Corporation of Ireland. The corporation has branch offices in London, Bristol and Manchester and, I believe—the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) will correct me if I am wrong—two offices in Northern Ireland. My greatest concern is about the London operation, which accounted for 70 per cent. of the corporation's worldwide network, including Europe, the United States and Ireland. The corporation's United Kingdom business made losses of between 25 million and 125 million Irish punts and perhaps much more, but some suggest that the losses may be as high as £500 million sterling, and even people who take a conservative view believe that the losses are at least £150 million.

How did such a collapse occur? The corporation gave the London office immense powers over the way in which it conducted business in an area in which there had long been a great deal of overcapacity — the reinsurance market. As a result of that overcapacity, very low rates had been quoted. The established companies in that area, however, were seeking to stabilise the rates and to achieve a more sensible relationship between the rates and the returns likely to accrue rather than constantly cutting rates to get business at any cost. That is the jungle into which the Insurance Corporation of Ireland—a small, perhaps rather naive, company—plunged and took on business that other companies were not prepared to take on and at rates which one commentator described as suicidal. As a result of that madness, it ran into its present troubles.

Although the Insurance Corporation of Ireland is a small company in United Kingdom terms, it is the only indigenous Irish company engaged in reinsurance. Why it allowed its London management to make such disastrous decisions, I do not know, but it certainly led the corporation into severe difficulties.

When the Irish authorities examined the figures submitted to them in July 1984, they realised that something was wrong because there was insufficient provision in the 1983 accounts to meet outstanding claims on the corporation's Irish business. The authorities were extremely worried and began to inquire into the London branch activites. The management offered assurances that all would be well, saying that there were difficulties but that measures were being taken to put things in order, and the parent company—the Allied Irish Bank—said that it was committing itself to 23 million Irish punts to cover the shortfall and to bring the corporation back to solvency.

In November 1984, the Irish authorities expressed concern about the thirteen fold increase in underwriting losses which had occurred in three years as a result of the London branch's activities. At that time the DTI was asked what the situation was. It is obvious that during that period the Department must have received the June figures. According to the Irish press, even when asked in November 1984 what was happening, particularly in London, the Department gave the all clear and said that the operations were fine. In fairness to the Department, it denied that it had said this, but it certainly felt that the company could carry on.

It is now a matter of record that the company collapsed. Consequently, I hope that the questions that I shall ask will be answered by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. Is it true that there will be an inquiry into this company, particularly into its United Kingdom operations which caused the losses that occurred? Will such an inquiry be undertaken by the DTI? If so, what will be its terms of reference? Will its findings be published? Does the DTI consider that there are any gaps in the disclosure requirements for insurers with head offices in the United Kingdom or those which have branch offices in this country? Does the DTI consider that further powers, over and above those which exist in current legislation, are required to enforce its statutory supervisory functions? It is obvious that something was lacking in this case.

This matter is of particular concern as more and more insurers are setting up operations in the United Kingdom. It is therefore essential to know what is happening so that investors and employees can be kept informed. It is immensely important that the DTI should obtain all the data which are necessary to judge the operation of these companies.

Are the present disclosure requirements adequate? Changes are occurring in the market. It is vital to look at the reinsurance market, where the Irish company's troubles arose, because other companies have experienced difficulty due to competition and cuts in the rates that are charged.

The London market is a major international insurance centre. We must ensure that our house is put in order if that is what is required. We require more information in order to do so, because we have a responsibility to ensure that any insurer who operates in this country fulfils the strictest possible criteria so that we can prevent a collapse similar to that which occurred in the Insurance Corporation of Ireland. We require such information not to restore confidence in the industry, but to ensure that it is monitored and that such a collapse cannot occur again. I therefore hope that we shall be given the information that I have requested.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): Earlier, the Chair made a plea for short speeches, and that is advice which I intend to take.

The House should not adjourn for the Whitsuntide recess until we have discussed the problems caused by gipsies—if I used the proper noun, I would say the problems caused by itinerants—who take up residence on land without the owner's permission.

This is a nationally recurring problem which warrants action because of the nuisance which is caused, because of the criminal damage which often takes place and because of the acts of dishonesty committed by many itinerants, such as theft, burglary and offences involving motor vehicles. These offences are committed by people who pay neither rates nor taxes but who can make life a misery for those who do.

This problem affects businesses as well as house owners. A short time ago I received a letter from Derby Glass Windows, which states:

> "This letter concerns the premises we have on the Derby Trading Estate, Stores Road, Derby, with the re-appearance of the 'gypsies' onto this site.
>
> We are experiencing totally unhygienic conditions here, with the land around our factory being used as toilet areas with human excreta all over the place. In addition, considerable damage is being done to vehicles left parked on our property, i.e. broken-off radio aerials, windscreen wipers stolen and petrol syphoned out, so much so, that these vehicles are having to be removed each night to other premises within our organization.

[Mr. Greg Knight]

As you will appreciate we have had this problem in this area on and off over the past twelve months and taking into account the amount of rates that we pay to the city, we feel that something must be done immediately to alleviate this situation."

Some time after that, the Derby Evening Telegraph reported:

"Scavenging itinerants have brought traffic chaos to Derby's Raynesway tip", and it went on to say:

"police had to be called to the tip after complaints from irate members of the public. The tip had to be closed until order was restored and the traffic jam the itinerants had created could be cleared".

These problems are by no means peculiar to the city of Derby, and we are entitled to ask what can be done to alleviate them.

Some people would argue that it would help if a district could obtain a designation under existing legislation. I accept that it would help to some extent, but at the end of the day we must realise that the current law is not satisfactory and that further action is needed.

As a result of a well-known case in which a man named Fagan broke into a famous bedroom, there was a review of the law of trespass of residential property. However, what I feel is needed—I think that the House would accept this—is a review of the law of trespass generally in order to prevent people from setting up mobile homes at will on another person's land and causing unnecessary nuisance, annoyance and disturbance.

The problem in Derby is currently not quite as bad as it has been in the past, but it recurs month after month, year after year without any general improvement. Action is needed to tackle the problem. I hope that the Leader of the House will agree to draw my remarks to the attention of the Secretary of State for the Environment before we rise for the Whitsun recess.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Four hon. Members are still seeking to catch my eye and I understand that the first Front Bench speaker intends to reply to the debate at about 8 o'clock. The arithmetic is obvious, and I hope that hon. Members will play fair.

7.38 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I shall try to be brief, but the subject I wish to raise is important and I hope that the Leader of the House will draw it to the attention of the Home Secretary and the Prime Minister. This issue, which has recently featured in the news, is the problems faced by the Tamil people in Sri Lanka and the British Government's relationship with Sri Lanka.

I am sure that hon. Members will have seen today's report in The Guardian that 10 Tamils were killed in a backlash to a massacre. The Times also reported:

"Tamils massacred in ferry attack".

Such stories have emerged almost daily from Sri Lanka over the past few months.

It is important to raise this subject, because the Prime Minister recently visited Sri Lanka. It is interesting to contrast her attitude towards the denial of human rights in Sri Lanka with the attitude of the Foreign Secretary during his visit to Poland. The Foreign Secretary visited the grave of Father Popieluszko and waxed lyrical about the need for improvements in the human rights record of the Polish Government. In her visit to Sri Lanka, the Prime Minister refused to meet the human rights activists. She refused to meet those who are trying to draw attention to the denials of justice there and made no mention of the fact that a Catholic priest, Father Bastian, was gunned down on 6 January.

The crisis dates back to the summer of 1983, when there were enormous riots in Colombo and other cities in Sri Lanka and thousands were killed. The chauvinist-inspired riots were promoted by the army, the police and the security forces. However, the origins of the crisis date back further still. The British Government, or past British Governments, have had a role to play. Sri Lanka is a former colony. British companies made a great deal of money out of the Ceylon tea trade and other trades with that country, and on independence in 1948 a defence treaty was signed with the country. Successive British administrations in that country, I believe, deliberately divided the Sinhalese and Tamil people. That division has been exploited ever since, to the benefit of the current Government of Sri Lanka.

The reporting of events has often been limited. In 1958, massive violence throughout Sri Lanka was largely unreported in the Western press. The language question has been a major factor in Sri Lankan politics. There is now no official language, but there are incredible discrepancies in the use of the languages. For example, 99 per cent. of the army speak Sinhalese, yet soldiers are sent into Tamil areas allegedly to control the situation.

In a series of contitutional changes forced through the Sri Lankan Parliament, the Government have removed the civic rights of Mrs. Bandaranaike, the former Prime Minister. A referendum was carried out to extend the life of the Government. A Prevention of Terrorism Act, passed by Parliament, has damaged civil rights in the country. Although many people have been killed by the security forces during the present crisis, until 1984 there were no proper inquiries or post mortems after those deaths.

Perhaps more significantly, the constitutional amendments put through Parliament by the current Government have introduced the sixth amendment to the constitution, which demands that allegiance be sworn to the unity of the Sri Lankan state. The main opposition party representing Tamil people, the Tamil United Liberation Front, could not sign that allegiance because its party's policy had become one of supporting separatism. In such a disturbed situation, it is a serious matter that the largest party representing the Tamil minority is not even allowed to be represented in Parliament. The British Government have had a hand in that. They have had a role to play.

My hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) and the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) recently visited Sri Lanka. An interview with my hon. Friend in the Tamil Times on April 1985 noted that the purpose of the visit was to investigate allegations of human rights violations. My hon. Friend was asked :

"What is the situation in this regard?"

He replied:

"As our report will make it clear, there is evidence of substantial violations of human rights in Sri Lanka. First of all, the Tamil people are being forced out of their homes by the government from the Prohibited Zone area and they have been turned into refugees in their own country. They are living in churches, temples, schools and garages. According to the government itself, there are about 100,000 refugees and that clearly is a conservative estimate. We were informed that Tamils are leaving at a rate of a thousand every day by boat to South India. There has been a complete dislocation of the fishing industry on which the coastal people largely depend. The Prohibited Zone includes thickly populated areas and it has brought about unimaginable hardship and disruption to the life of the Tamil community.

In addition, my hon. Friend described how the Jaffna peninsula in the north of the country had become a security zone. There have been other reports of other violations of human rights in Sri Lanka from the International Commission of Jurists and from Amnesty International.

I visited Sri Lanka in April 1984. I was there for a week and met representatives of the Government, of the Opposition parties and, of the trade unions in Colombo. I also went to Kandy, to Trincomalee on the north-east coast and to Jaffna, where I experienced for the first time what the curfew and the presence of the army mean to the people.

The Government appeared to be entirely cynical about the round table talks which they were supposed to be having with opposition groups about a new constitution. The Government were quite prepared for the oppression by the army in Jaffna, and the killing of so many people, to continue. Naturally, the response of the Tamil people and parties is to call for the development of an Eelam state.

There is an international aspect. Trincomalee was a major harbour during the second world war, and could be one again. The United States Government give considerable support to the Government of Sri Lanka. A "Voice of America" radio station is being constructed there. According to a report in The Observer on 4 April, a special task force of police commandos at the disposal of the Sri Lankan Government have been trained by ex-SAS people from this country. The United Kingdom continues to give aid. The Prime Minister attended the opening of the Victoria dam and pledged further aid for the country. There is a military training arrangement and British Government support for police training in this country.

In an interview on the BBC overseas service, the Prime Minister said:

"Democracy should not be given to those who wish to impose their will by force . . . but work with minorities who seek to work democratically."

The Government of Sri Lanka are not working democratically. They are oppressing and isolating the Tamil minority. The British Prime Minister appears to be incapable of understanding that.

On his return from Delhi, Mr. David Lange, the Prime Minister of New Zealand, said that there would have to be an international task force of some sort to maintain peace and order in Sri Lanka.

The British Government should respond to certain basic requests. First, the arms deals must end. The training arrangements must end. Support for the Sri Lankan Government must be discontinued. Secondly, the aid programme must be reconsidered. Aid is clearly being used—as a propaganda weapon as much as anything else—to prop up the Sri Lankan Government.

Thirdly, an enormous number of refugees have left Sri Lanka for India and other places, and a large number of Tamil people in London and other cities in this country have been allowed temporary and exceptional leave to remain here. Those people are at permanent risk. They are dangling on the end of a string. The British Government should recognise that those Tamils who have expressed a fear of returning are genuinely afraid of the consequence of returning to Sri Lanka and look to the British Government for permission to remain here permanently.

A Tamil woman whom I have known for some time spoke to me recently. She asked me not to reveal her name because of the possible repercussions. She told me that, in her family village, eight male members of her family were burnt alive during a recent raid by the army during which 38 other people were also killed, while the remaining villagers took refuge in the one remaining temple. The other temple had been burnt down during a previous army raid.

The issue is serious and important. The British Government, if they seriously support the call for human rights, and they are seriously interested in violations of human rights in other countries, can and should do something immediately to help the refugees from Sri Lanka and cease supporting a Government who use as a major propaganda weapon the approval that they have obtained from the British Government.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): I do not think that Parliament should go on holiday until I have had a chance to reply to the what the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) said two hours ago about the action on April 25 by 250,000 school students against mass industrial conscription by the Government onto the youth training scheme.

We heard an amazing speech from the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Stokes). He should be renamed the Tory Member for Stonehenge, East, given the progressive nature of his views. He talked about the so-called violence——

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: If the Boundary Commission hears you, that is what it might call his constituency.

Mr. Nellist: I do not need any interruptions from you, sunshine.

The hon. Member talked about the so-called violence of Greenham peace women. The Leader of the House might have noticed early-day motion 702 concerning the Waffen FCS of Tory students at Warwick university who have recently produced a song book, with the official logo of the Conservative party on the cover, which calls for the murder of the Greenham peace women. I should like the Leader of the House to comment on whether he thinks that gives the Tory party an acceptable modern image.

The hon. Member for Ealing, North, who is not with us at the moment, correctly said that the strike by school students was called——

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): He is coming in now.

Mr. Nellist: All right, I can see.

The hon. Gentleman said that the strike was called at the Labour party Young Socialists conference at Easter by 200 school students. It was backed by the Youth Trade Union Rights Campaign of which I am the honorary president. The hon. Gentleman said that I gave a certain amount of money to that campaign. He is absolutely right. I have given it £20 a month since I came to Parliament two years ago. I also give the Labour party £20 a month and my constituency party £80 a month. I give the Labour party Young Socialists £20 a month and I gave the families of striking miners £30 a week during the strike. I came here to live on ordinary workers' wages, unlike the millionaires and near-millionaires who occupy Conservative Benches.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I do not think that I have ever been called sunshine before.

Mr. Nellist: Have you finished?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have not started. Will the hon. Gentleman get on with his speech?

Mr. Nellist: The hon. Member for Ealing, North also mentioned leaflets that were issued in parts of London and which he said came from the Socialist Workers party. He tried to besmirch the Labour party Young Socialist-backed Youth Trade Union Rights Campaign on account of the content of those leaflets. The 25 April strike was not anti-school, anti-teacher or anti-parent. It opposed YTS conscription and the Government who have destroyed the hopes of a generation of school leavers, 500,000 of whom have not worked since they left school under the Tory Government. It is an insult to 15 and 16-year-olds to portray YTS as a passport to jobs.

Mr. Greenway rose——

Mr. Nellist: If the hon. Gentleman had been in all evening I should have given way, but time is short. In 1974, 5 per cent. of 16-year-olds not in full-time education were unemployed. That figure rose to 23 per cent. last year, and another 45 per cent. were on YTS. That means that 68 per cent. of 16-year-old school leavers are without a proper job. The majority of the increase has occurred during the past six years.

When Tory Members talk about school leavers being given lessons in politics, they should bear it in mind that the first lesson is given by the Tory Government, who refuse to guarantee them a right to a job when they leave school. The second lesson is coming up, with the so-called Fowler reviews. If YTS is so wonderful, why are the Government proposing to deny 237,000 16 and 17-year-olds the right to supplementary benefit and to conscript them onto that scheme? They are being conscripted onto a scheme which pays £26 a week. If that allowance had been increased in line with inflation or earnings during the past six years, it would have been £40 a week. The Government have robbed people on YTS of £14 a week.

The hon. Member for Ealing, North made allegations of truancy. It was not truancy on 25 April. It was organised, disciplined and responsible political protest. Where was the hon. Gentleman's protest in 1981 when every schoolchild in the country was given a day off school for the royal wedding? What damage did that do to their education? Not one Tory Member protested about every schoolchild having a day off when Charles and Diana got married in 1981. It is a bit ironic that headmasters complained about a half-day strike in England and Wales as disruptive of education and then handed out 10 or 20 times that denial of education by suspending children from school as punishment.

The Youth Trade Union Rights Campaign supported school students in a half-day strike by 15 and 16-year-olds. They are this year's school leavers. The strike was not aimed at 11 and 12-year-olds. Come the summer, 300,000 or 400,000 youngsters who have left school will not find one Tory or Liberal Member of Parliament worrying about the fact that they are permanently out of school, permanently out of education and permanently on the dole.

The strike was in support of Labour party policy established at last year's party conference by the Youth Trade Union Rights Campaign for a minimum allowance of £55 a week on YTS, the right to join a trade union, a safe scheme fully covered by health and safety legislation and the right to a job at the end of the scheme. There will be a growing desire among those youngsters for a right to decide. If the Tories say that they are only to be chucked on the scrap heap of unemployment at 16, I shall maintain that they are old enough to have the vote. There will then be 2·7 million other voices joining those who are rising up against the Government.

It is far better for Labour Members, trade unionists, parents and others to support a half-day strike by young people and to draw them into the Labour trade union movement in opposition to the Government's plans for mass unemployment than to condemn that generation of school students to glue sniffing, heroin addiction or a repetition of the riots of 1981. That is what lies ahead of the kids leaving school this year and it is engendered by the demoralisation and despair of mass unemployment. The responsible action of those youngsters of 25 April brought them into the orbit of the Labour trade union movement.

I issue a warning to the Leader of the House and Tory Members. If the Government do not withdraw their plans for mass conscription onto YTS, come the autumn, two things are likely to happen. First, the protest by school students is likely to be four times the 250,000 who came out in April. Secondly, I have argued for three years that trade unions should ensure that YTS is not a scheme of exploitation of youngsters and that they have decent rates of pay, the right to join unions and to be safe. If, however, the Government introduce mass conscription for two years, my voice will be added to those who say that trade unions should boycott the scheme and ensure that it is brought down. That is responsible political progress against the Government which avoids the despair of drug addiction, suicides and a repetition of the riots of 1981. It deserves the support of every Labour Member.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): I should like my right hon. Friend to reconsider his proposals for the spring adjournment, because an important matter faces the Government in the context of the European Economic Community. I know that my right hon. Friend is well aware of it and I shall be most interested to receive his response.

My right hon. Friend will know that the committee which rejoices in the name "Ad Hoc Committee for Institutional Affairs", but which is more colloquially known as the Dooge committee, has drawn up a report which is to be considered by the European Council at its meeting next month. The report contains some important recommendations for the reorganisation of the institutional affairs of the EEC. It is based on an assumption that the fault or problem of the lack of what is called progress in the EEC is caused not by lack of political will but by lack of institutional arrangements. I do not want to digress into that argument, but if we work on the assumpiton that the problem of the EEC is institutional—I do not—it will be most important for the Government to take up a position on the matter as early as possible and in as organised a way as possible. I like to think that that will be done with the support of the House. That is why I want the House to have an opportunity to discuss it. I cannot go into any detail in the time available, but I should like to highlight two principal matters.

The first concerns what are called the principles of voting and covers the vexed question of majority voting as against the unanimity or veto principle in the EEC. It is interesting to read the Dooge committee report as opposed to reports of it. Page 25 says:

"The majority of the Committee favour the adoption of the new general principle that decisons must be taken by a qualified or simple majority. Unanimity will still be required in certain exceptional cases, which will have to be distinctly fewer in number in relation to the present Treaties, the list of such cases being restrictive."

That is an intriguing example of Eurospeak, which contains a germ of a problem. In some circles there is a wish to move towards majority voting, with the possibility of a veto in exceptional cases.

More important, under the title of "The method" on page 33, the Dooge committee proposes that a conference of Government representatives of the member states should be convened in the near future. That proposal will face my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister when she goes to Milan. The conference will be asked to negotiate a draft European union treaty based, among other things, on what is known as the Spinelli draft treaty and the Dooge document. The conclusion of the recommendation states:

"The very decision of the Heads of State or of Government to convene such a Conference would have great symbolic value and would represent the initial act of European Union."

I hope that my right hon. Friends the Leader of the House and the Prime Minister will think long, hard and carefully whether to accept the terms of reference of the suggested conference in the terms in which it is put in the Dooge committee report, and to go to such a conference, which will involve a pre-commitment to the idea that we need to progress to the so-called European union. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will respond to those questions this evening.

8 pm

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): The term normally applied to debates on these occasions is "wide-ranging", but the speech of the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Stokes) dwarfed our proceedings. In the space of six minutes he managed to cover bishops, defence, embryos, Sunday trading, the economy, the social security review system, lawlessness, violence and morality. It was an exercise in flexibility, if not in profundity. I was saddened for him when I heard his description of the moral chaos and evil society to which he sees our country reduced under the Administration that he supports.

The hon. Gentleman was guilty of a slight understatement when he said that he was sorry that the Government had not reduced taxation much. Reality hardly bears out his comment because taxation, far from being reduced, has increased by £21 billion a year since the Government came to office. The financial chaos produced by the Government is such that one must earn more than £18,000 a year to reap any benefit under their tax cuts. Despite cuts in every other area, they felt able to give £3,000 million a year to the top 5 per cent. income earners. I have no intention of pursuing all the remaining points made by the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) also made an intriguing contribution. He said that investment in the United Kingdom was increasing, but he overlooked the fact that since 1979 it has fallen by 41 per cent., or £3,100 million. It has subsequently recovered a pathetic 7 or 8 per cent., but it is still one third below its 1979 level. The hon. Gentleman said that employment is increasing, but male employment continues to fall. Any increase in jobs, as has been revealed by the current edition of Lloyds Bank Bulletin, is in part-time jobs, most of which are for women. Although one is glad to see those opportunities, we are seeing a poor trade-off of part-time jobs being created and full-time jobs disappearing.

I understand why the hon. Gentleman is not eager to return to his constituency and why he would prefer it if we incarcerated him in the House. During the past 12 months unemployment has increased by 9·4 per cent. in his constituency under the Government whom he supports, and it has increased by 16 per cent. since June 1983. Unemployment stands at 22 per cent. in Holyhead. The hon. Gentleman said that Wales had become a land of small businesses, which used not to be true. That is true now because the Tory Government have killed off the larger businesses. According to the latest edition of the National Westminster Bank Review, 30 per cent. of manufacturing employment has disappeared since 1979.

The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) made an intervention which purported to be in defence of education. It was a bit ripe coming from a supporter of a Government who have done more than any other to destroy public education, force teachers into direct action, which is not their natural instinct, massively downgrade teachers' pay relativities, drive the best teachers from the profession, and leave state schools short of books, while receiving £12,000 million a year in oil revenues from the North sea.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) revealed a singularly disturbing position relating to the exploitation of our desperate housing shortage. He highlighted the consequences of the Government's failure to sustain a building programme. The result is that people are thrown into the hands of parasites, such as the Solomons, who sound utterly evil. I hope that they will evenutally get their just desserts. However, that is the reality of the market-place economy. It is exactly the sort of morality that the Government seek to encourage in the economy and which the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge deplored. We expect the Scottish Office to introduce legislation to ensure that the same protections are available in Scotland through local authorities as are already available in England and Wales.

I shall take the advice of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who said that we all learn slowly and painfully in Northern Ireland. I admit that I do not claim great expertise in that area, and I shall leave it to the Leader of the House to deal with the right hon. Gentleman's points, most of which were directed at the Government.

We had two speeches about today's announcement of the cuts in British Rail. My hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) apologised to the Leader of the House, because he could not be present for the wind-up. He is presenting medals at a cup final of the unemployed in Birmingham. He and the hon. Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) highlighted the tragic position created by the announcement, not only in Swindon, but in Glasgow. As the hon. Gentleman suggested, it is poetically sad that on this, the 150th anniversary of the Great Western railway, we witness effectively the closure of the railway town of Swindon. As a youngster from south Wales travelling through Swindon to London and looking at the great yards there, I always saw it as the symbol of railways in the United Kingdom. The House must make it clear to British Rail that we find it utterly unacceptable for it to place orders for 1,500 locomotives overseas. We cannot accept that. It is no good saying that foreign countries have the know-how. As my hon. Friend said, if we do not start to develop the know-how, we shall never get an opportunity in the export markets, to which British Rail Engineering Ltd. is supposedly looking.

It seems strange that, having built the railways of the world, we must now go abroad to buy a few locomotives. We were the workshop of the world, but now we have had our first deficit on manufacturing trade since the Napoleonic revolution. In 1980, the Government inherited a surplus of £1 billion of non-oil visible trade, which in the space of four years they managed to turn into a deficit of £11 billion. I hope that the Government will ensure that whatever help can be given is given to Swindon and Glasgow.

As my hon. Friend intimated, the position is in contrast to the forecasts of BREL as recently as 1981, and is an indictment of our low level of economic activity, against expectations, caused by the Government's policy of continuous deflation.

This has been a fascinating debate. I apologise to those of my hon. Friends whose speeches I have not been able to mention, but I must now give the Leader of the House an opportunity to answer everyone.

8.9 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I agree with the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) that this has been a wide-ranging debate. Therefore, I hope that he will allow me to comment on his speech indirectly through the medium of the speeches made by Back-Bench Members.

I begin with the first contribution to the debate, from my right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), about the Northern Ireland Act 1974, the means whereby it is renewed annually and his desire that the Province should be allowed to return to constitutional normality, thus enabling its laws to be made by the House in the same way as laws for the other parts of the Union are made, and that it should possess responsible local government. I have no doubt that, in that context, he would wish us to consider the fact that the Province is now fully represented in the House. Those who have been privileged to come here to represent the Province have done so with such attention and zeal that it gives the most effective demonstration to other hon. Members of the true desire of those from the Province to have the full and unblemished status of members of the Union. I shall communicate his observations to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) mentioned a problem that affected his constituency, although I suspect that it goes rather wider. It would not surprise me if, in due course, we discovered that the practice was happening outside west central Scotland. He said that the problem was given effective exposure by the investigative techniques of the Evening Times. He aired the problem most effectively, albeit to a somewhat thin House. None the less, no one could but be seized of the social issues implicit in what is happening. It would not be appropriate for me to comment on the details, not least because I have been advised that there may be legal proceedings against the company at the heart of the reports, but I understand exactly the points that he made and his anxiety that there should be legislation on the matter. I shall ensure that his comments are reported to my ministerial colleagues in the Scottish Office.

I very much appreciated the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Stokes). Of course, they excite some hilarity, but every time that someone has something worthwhile to say in the House, it almost certainly excites a reaction. If it is just one more example of the consensual porridge, it passes undigested and unnoticed.

I could pick out several points that my hon. Friend raised, but perhaps he will allow me to confine myself to his concern about powerful forces in society—one could call them the moral forces in society—and about the limited extent to which they can be conditioned by Government or by the police. He is right in that context to point to the tremendous potential power that could be effected by the churches. I was interested to hear him emphasise the fact that the church at parish level was proving much more effective in giving leadership in such matters than was the church at episcopal level. I shall not enter into that highly dangerous controversy, but I shall say this. When one considers the importance of the church in influencing social affairs, I think, among others, of Bishop Temple, whose ability to impart social influence was matched by the extent to which he secured respect in spiritual matters. That is a healthy reminder in the context.

My hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs) and the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) mentioned the proposed closures and redundancies affecting British Rail Engineering Ltd. at Swindon and possibly elsewhere. My hon. Friend the Member for Swindon made an effective and moving speech and mentioned the serious constituency interest that is involved. His speech was the more impressive because it mentioned a future in which there was a diversification away from the existing dependence on railways, as well as a proper recognition of the part that the railways have played hitherto.

The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East said that he could not be here for the conclusion of the debate, and I have a note from him to that effect. I am not in a small-minded mood this evening, but he could have confirmed without doubt that he would make the journey by rail. However, he chose not to do so. I say that because there was much discussion about the extent to which we all use the railways.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) and the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) formed a charming partnership, from contrasting positions, in talking about the school strikes and the role of Militant Tendency in promoting them.

Mr. Nellist: Where is he?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman's sparring partner explained to me that he cannot be here, and I am sure that we all charitably understand why.

In the absence of my hon. Friend, may I say that I believe he overdoes his anxieties on this problem. I do not look across at Militant Tendency and see its representatives as the Jesuits of Socialism, who say, "Give me the child and I will give you the man." However, they become a little carried away about their role in the political scene as the leaders of those children's crusades. As I listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East, my unease was somewhat reinforced. I am one of his greatest fans, and I hope that he will long be here as the acceptable face of Militant Tendency. There is a studied avoidance of subtlety in his comments that I find very encouraging.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) made a charming and philosophical speech about the importance of pluralism in politics and the problems of dealing with minorities. For a party which believes that it is liberating itself from a minority status, that shows a certain lack of self-confidence. However, I leave that to one side. The hon. Gentleman was right to say that one of the most difficult tasks in the House is balancing our procedures so that minority interests believe that they have legitimate representation. I hope that he will be encouraged by the fact that we shall soon present Standing Orders on Opposition time.

I should tell the hon. Gentleman that the most hard-done-by minority in the House of Commons are Government Back-Bench Members—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] If I cannot play to my own gallery on this occasion, when can I? I make that observation because it is a factor that is overlooked when we try to construct a balance that enables the good conduct of our procedures.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) made a powerful speech about unemployment and the importance of measures to secure its reduction, not least in his constituency. He explained why he cannot be with us now. His arguments were beguiling, although I was not all that convinced that we should have as much regional differentiation in fiscal matters as he advocated. However, his approach to the problem was constructive, and it enabled him to make in this debate a speech that I am sure he would have made otherwise in an economic debate. He invited us to guess in which debate the speech would have been made if he had not used this useful opportunity for Back-Bench Members.

The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) was worried about the insurance industry. As a good Socialist, he talked about the Insurance Corporation of Ireland rather than about Lloyd's. That point was made by one of my hon. Friends earlier this afternoon, but all aspects of the problem and of our position as a nation harbouring a successful service sector turn upon there being confidence, which occasionally has to be restored by Government involvement. The hon. Gentleman is inviting that, and I shall see that his remarks are put to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) raised the problems of itinerants. I cannot think of any topic more likely to release a flood of letters should one have that particular problem in one's constituency. I speak from recent experience, and I can understand why my hon. Friend has sought this occasion to raise this topic. However, I am anxious not to say anything that means that I shall be the recipient of another dose of correspondence on this matter, but I shall see that my luckless colleague the Secretary of State for the Environment is appraised of the point raised by my hon. Friend.

The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) has explained that he cannot be here. I make no complaint, because he is not here to interrupt me. He made a moving speech outlining the tragedies between the communities that have befallen Sri Lanka. I shall see that his speech is drawn to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) drew the attention of the House not only to the content of the Dooge committee report, but to the fact that the very modalities may imply commitments that are not perceived in the House. I am pleased that he has drawn my attention to that point, and I shall see that it becomes the possession of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary.

Perhaps it is appropriate that I should conclude with the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire because it demonstrates the characteristics of these debates. They stretch from perhaps the most mundane, albeit important, constituency interests to the wider international affairs that are at the heart of our proceedings. If the motion is passed, we shall have the chance to go away and have a break of 10 days or so and come back to that fragile period of June and July when all the really hardened parliamentarians look forward to blood sports at their most gory.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House at its rising on Friday 24th May do adjourn until Monday 3rd June, and the House shall not adjourn on Friday 24th May until Mr. Speaker shall have reported the Royal Assent to any Acts which have been agreed upon by both Houses.

Orders of the Day

Administration of Justice Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

8.22 pm

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

In introducing the Second Reading debate on this Bill in the other place, my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor described the Bill as covering a wide range of disparate subjects with, like Mr. Churchill's blancmange, no central theme. The House will well appreciate the force of this description—the 62 clauses and eight schedules of the Bill will make a number of small, helpful, uncontroversial and unconnected changes as well as, more substantially, extending the Law Society's disciplinary powers and enabling licensed conveyancers who are not solicitors to undertake conveyancing for reward. I will not delay the House with an exposition of the overriding aims of the Bill or of the sources from which its provisions are drawn. Although it has no central theme, it will introduce a number of changes of a good legal housekeeping nature and other changes in the law that I hope will be welcomed in all parts of the House.

A number of moves and proposals are in train to improve the existing system of professional discipline imposed upon solicitors and the handling of complaints against them. The proposals contained in part I are perhaps the most important and immediate of these, but they are by no means the only significant ones.

There is a simple reason for this. The Government do not seek a direct role in this area. We believe that the existence, strength and vitality of the independent legal profession, and public confidence in it, are fundamental to the freedom under the law on which our parliamentary democracy depends. It is therefore to the Law Society that we must look to maintain the high levels of conduct, the standards of service and the collective discipline that we expect from solicitors. It has a central, but far from sole, function in the operation of the present arrangements for preserving those standards, and with that goes an obligation to ensure that those arrangements are working effectively and to propose or make improvements and extensions when that is necessary.

The Law Society is making efforts in three directions. First, over recent years it has set about improving its in-house arrangements. Secondly, it seeks the agreement of Parliament for extending and improving the existing legislation. Thirdly, it is planning for the future.

On the first of these—what the society has itself been doing—there has been criticism that the society has not been as active or as positive in response to criticism of solicitors as it might have been. To some extent, that is the result of the limitations of its statutory role—investigating, adjudicating and "prosecuting" before the solicitors disciplinary tribunal allegations of professional misconduct by a solicitor—which the Bill seeks to extend. In part, it follows from the way in which the society has seen it right to operate that role. For instance, where, as often happens, a case involves allegations of professional misconduct as well as matters that fall to be resolved by a court, the society had until recently taken the view that the professional proceedings should not progress until the court action had been determined.

In many cases that must be right, as simultaneous proceedings would be difficult and carry risk of mutual prejudice. The society has also rightly been very conscious that it is only to a court action that the client can look for damages, and it has been anxious to do nothing that might adversely alter that right. But any such suspension must always involve some delay. The reasons for it are not always understood and it is not invariably necessary. The society has therefore decided that the existence of court action should not be an automatic bar to disciplinary proceedings, each case being considered in the light of its particular circumstances.

The society has also been seeking to improve and strengthen both the resources devoted to handling complaints and their presentation to the public. More staff, of higher grade, have been taken on. Working procedures and management responsibilities have been clarified and strengthened. Work is now assisted by computer. The phrasing of letters to the public and published pamphlets has been reworded, in consultation with the consumer bodies.

The society has recognised the importance for some people of having someone with whom to talk through their problems, and to organise the more complex ones in ways that a complaints system can handle, and it is setting up an interview panel for this purpose.

The quest for improved standards is not confined to this sector. The society is about to publish the first batch of written professional standards covering wide areas of a solicitor's practice, as recommended by the Benson royal commission. Improvements are being sought in professional education both generally and in specialist areas, through initiatives such as the new continuing education service and the development of a practice management service.

The Law Society has therefore demonstrated its desire and ability to discharge its public responsibilities in a determined and up-to-date way within, as it were, its own walls. But much of the disciplinary system is provided for by statute and any change therefore requires primary legislation.

The society has therefore made proposals for changing the statutory provision, and the Government have decided that it would be in the public interest to help forward those proposals by finding space in the legislative programme for them. We have therefore accepted responsibility for the proposals contained in part I of the present Bill.

Perhaps one of the two most far-reaching changes in this part is contained in clause 1, which introduces a new section 44A into the Solicitors Act 1974, making a major addition to the range of available remedies where something has gone wrong between a solicitor and his client.

I think I should point out here that the various sanctions that a solicitor faces are greater in variety and power than those ranged against any other profession. First, the High Court has an inherent jurisdiction over him as one of its officers and may strike him off the roll or penalise him in costs. The keystone of the professional disciplinary system is the statutory solicitors disciplinary tribunal, which deals with cases of conduct unbefitting a solicitor. It has both solicitor and lay members and is independent of any other organ.

The more minor misconduct matters may be dealt with by the Law Society, which has a range of remedies, such as the imposition of conditions on practising certificates. It also investigates and acts in the majority of cases before the tribunal. But that has been the limit of the society's disciplinary role hitherto, and recourse for a financial remedy has been by way of an action for damages before the courts, or seeking to have the bill reduced by the formal process of a remuneration certificate or taxation.

All those measures provide necessarily diverse remedies for what are inevitably diverse problems. But there has been an important gap, because all the measures in this list tend to be of greater use where the problems are serious, and where comparatively large sums of money are at stake. Where this was not so—either because the financial loss has not been great enough to warrant an action for negligence, or perhaps because inadequate service would not even have given rise to a cause of action —there was no help through the courts, and no place in the society's powers for it to assist either.

Clause 1 makes a significant change to that position by extending the society's regulatory powers to give it a wholly new function. Where work has not met the standard which could reasonably be expected of a solicitor, the society will be able to order that he should reduce or repay all or part of his bill, or carry out specified items of work.

The society is already planning to publish—before this new jurisdiction comes into force — written professional standards. Those cannot realistically hope to cover the whole wide and diverse area of practice, but they will cover most areas and provide important clarification of what is expected of a solicitor and, therefore, provide important background to the new jurisdiction.

Failure to comply with the society's order will be a disciplinary matter to be dealt with by the disciplinary tribunal, whose orders are enforceable as if made by the High Court. I should perhaps mention that we hope that it is possible to improve the Bill by simplifying the disposal of cases that give rise to misconduct and the new shoddy work jurisdiction, and an amendment will be brought forward in Committee.

Clause 2 makes a significant contribution to making the society's investigation of complaints more effective by inserting a further new section into the principal Act, under which the society may compel a solicitor to produce his case files. Under the Solicitors Act 1974, that power is restricted to cases where there has been undue delay in dealing with a matter, so that the files can be given to another solicitor to complete the work. It is now extended to cover cases in which it is necessary for the society to examine papers for the purpose of investigating a complaint. That power will provide a useful evidential tool in matters of misconduct, but, equally importantly, will be the starting point in investigating complaints of shoddy work.

Perhaps the other most significant development is in schedule 1. Hitherto, the only involvement in the existing system of persons who are not lawyers has been outside the Law Society. The solicitors disciplinary tribunal must, as I have indicated, sit with at least one lay member. Overseeing the whole operation of the society is, of course, the lay observer, who has powers under the 1974 Act to investigate the society's handling of a complaint and makes an annual report to the Lord Chancellor, which is laid before Parliament.

Under the Act, the society is obliged to consider any report or recommendation received from a lay observer and to notify him of any action taken in consequence. The society has decided that it should take these developments a stage further, believing that it would help in discharging its duties in the public interest to have a wider measure of representation in the committee or committees which investigate and adjudicate on complaints. Schedule 1 provides for the society to appoint to those committees as full members both solicitors who are not members of the council and laymen from outside the profession. It is intended that the Master of the Rolls should make the nominations. In fact, he has already put forward his first list of names in advance of the legislation, and the society has invited those people to take part in meetings. They have been doing so since last November, and have been playing an increasingly valuable role.

Apart from the provisions relating to bad work, the Bill also makes changes in the arrangements relating to practising certificates. Section 12 of the 1974 Act gives the society a discretion to impose conditions upon the annual practising certificate. That discretion can at present be exercised only when a certificate is next applied for, not in relation to the one currently in force.

The power is extended by clauses 3 and 4. First, it will now be exercisable where a solicitor has failed to provide accountants' reports within the time required. Secondly, the Act is amended to make it clear that the society has power to impose as a condition on a certificate specified steps—which may or may not cost the solicitor money. For instance, the society would be able to require that a practice management service should be consulted and its recommendations complied with, or that retraining be undertaken. Thirdly, in circumstances where urgent action is appropriate, the society is now enabled to impose conditions on an existing practice certificate, and it will not have to wait for its expiry to impose them on the next.

Clause 6 and schedule 1 make minor amendments to the existing legislation.

Those are, in brief, the most significant of the immediate steps that the society has taken, or for which it is seeking the approval of Parliament. But that is not all that is in contemplation. The society has drawn up plans, on which it is now consulting interested bodies, for a system of arbitration for small claims for damages, which may well be a useful addition to the existing repertoire of remedies. That—like all the other changes in train—will, however, sharpen the need for dissatisfied clients to be adequately advised of the range of available remedies and to select the one which would be most appropriate. To ensure that that is done, the society is reviewing the operation of its negligence panel, whose ability to provide experienced and sympathetic advice to those who have problems in this area has been one of the more welcome developments over recent years.

The society has commissioned management consultants to advise it on its functions and structure. They have been specifically asked to consider in general the way in which complaints against solicitors are handled. Hon. Members may be aware that the consultants have recently issued a consultation paper, which canvasses a number of options in this area and in others, which are now being evaluated.

All of those show something of the new enterprise in this area, together with a number of major contributions to the remedies available to dissatisfied clients, which will be a major improvement in the services available to the public.

Part II of the Bill establishes a framework for enabling non-solicitors to compete with solicitors for conveyancing work. It gives effect to the main recommendations of the Farrand committee's first report, which was published last September. The House will recall that the Farrand committee, as it became known, was established in February of last year following the withdrawal of the House Buyers Bill, which had obtained a Second Reading in this House some two months earlier. The committee was asked to advise on the tests of competence and other requirements needed to ensure adequate consumer protection when non-solicitor conveyancers were permitted to compete for the work.

Despite the untimely death of its original chairman, Professor Street, the committee produced its report remarkably quickly. On all substantial matters, the committee was unanimous in its conclusions. That was a considerable achievement when one remembers the wide variety of interest groups that were represented on the Farrand committee.

The committee's terms of reference, which were of course agreed by the sponsors of the House Buyers Bill, reflected the concern, which I believe is shared by all in this House, that care must be taken to ensure that consumer protection is maintained when competition is extended in the area of buying and selling houses.

The Government are committed to increasing competition wherever possible. That policy applies to the provision of services, such as conveyancing, as well as to consumer goods. We have already made significant progress. During the last year or so, the greater freedom given to individual solicitors to advertise their charges has provided an unprecedented stimulus to increased competition. Charges have fallen by about 30 per cent. The Bill injects a further element of competition by extending the right to undertake conveyancing for reward to properly qualified non-solicitors.

But, in extending competition in that area, we must, of course, be careful not to sacrifice consumer protection. For the vast majority of the population, house purchase represents the single largest investment of their lives. It often involves the commitment of their entire life savings and a substantial portion of current income for many years. It is thus essential to maintain protection from incompetence and dishonesty. Some restrictions of competition in that area are, therefore, necessary.

The approach taken by the Farrand committee is, in our view, the right one. In paragraph 1.35 of its report, it said:

"The risks to the consumer are too great to permit market forces alone to control entrance to . . . the conveyancing market. Our approach in considering the safeguards needed for non-solicitors to undertake conveyancing has thus been to propose certain essential restrictions on competition, although these are intended to go no wider than is necessary to ensure adequate consumer protection."

The rules to be made under part II of this Bill will set the necessary minimum safeguards sufficient to protect the consumer without undermining the impact of greater competition.

Clause 8 establishes the Council for Licensed Conveyancers, which will be responsible for ensuring the competence and integrity of those who seek to practise as licensed conveyancers. The following clauses give the council the requisite powers and responsibilities. It will be for the council to determine such matters as the necessary training and financial requirements and rules of conduct. The rules made by the council will require the Lord Chancellor's concurrence. That will enable us to ensure that the requirements set by the council are neither unduly restrictive nor inadequate to protect the consumer.

It remains our intention to legislate in the next Session with regard to the position of employed solicitors working for banks, building societies and other institutions.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman say whether the Government have formed a view of the recommendations in the second Farrand report and whether they will look with favour on the inclusion in the Bill of some of those recommendations, which seem necessary if the benefits of the first report are to be given full effect, particularly to reduce the cost of conveyancing?

The Attorney-General: That is a lengthy report of well over 100 pages, with many extremely detailed recommendations. I suggest that the present measure is large enough as it is. The second report is still under consideration, there being a great deal in it. There is no intention to increase the size of this measure to reflect the second report, which was published only at the beginning of this year.

The form of that legislation—I am speaking of next Session — will take into account the need to protect consumers against prejudice resulting from any conflict of interest and will be drafted in the light of our recent consultations on that subject, which to some extent reflects the anxiety shown on Second Reading of the original measure. Consideration will also have to be given to the differences in Scots law and practice in this area.

Before I leave this subject I should mention clause 5 which falls into part I of the Bill. This clause rationalises the restrictions on conveyancing for reward. First, it extends the restriction to the preparation of the contract —which is the stage at which protection is most needed — and, secondly, it makes it clear that no offence is committed where a qualified person directs and supervises an employee to carry out conveyancing work.

The licensed conveyancing provisions of the Bill will introduce greater competition into the provision of conveyancing services. Solicitors are now competing actively with each other. The Bill injects an additional element of competition, and it does so without lowering the standards of consumer protection.

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): Last year the Government gave an undertaking in a written answer that they were in favour of banks and building societies undertaking conveyancing. There is considerable speculation in today's press whether that undertaking still holds. Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman prepared to say officially that the undertaking still stands, but that he is considering the method by which it can be brought about, not the principle underlining the issue?

The Attorney-General: I cannot give that undertaking, because, as I said earlier, anxiety was expressed by hon. Members on Second Reading about what could be a conflict of interest and the need to protect the consumer.

I am not saying that every speaker in that debate took that view, but it was expressed clearly and powerfully, for example, by the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), on behalf of the alliance by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and by many other hon. Members.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) rose——

The Attorney-General: I am dealing with the last intervention. I promise to give way to the hon. Gentleman.

We want to get this matter right. I can only say that we shall introduce legislation, but that the exact scope of it is not at the moment decided.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I was alarmed to hear that the right hon. and learned Gentleman could not give an undertaking. But that may be unnecessary because the Solicitor-General has already given such an undertaking. He gave it to me on 12 January 1984 in a letter in which he wrote:

"We are committed to legislation to enable solicitors employed by organisations such as building societies and banks to undertake conveyancing."

On that basis I agreed to withdraw my Bill.

The Attorney-General: The undertaking in writing to which the hon. Gentleman refers — and the hon. Gentleman has played a considerable part in the progress that we have made—was contained in a letter from the Solicitor-General to him which I do not think has been published. That letter, although committing the Government to legislation to enable solicitors employed by organisations such as building societies to undertake conveyancing, sounded several warning notes. For example, it said:

"A consultation paper will be issued early next month . . . So far as conflicts of interest are concerned, our provisional view is that we can rely primarily on appropriate amendments to the Solicitors Practice Rules."

The letter made this important point, which was expressed in the clearest terms to the hon. Gentleman:

"Our view is that, provided the potential conflicts of interest can be avoided, it is right to enable all employed solicitors to do so."

That is to convey. The consultations then took place—

Mr. Austin Mitchell rose——

The Attorney-General: I am answering the hon. Gentleman's last intervention. When I have finished, he may intervene again.

The consultations have been taking place. They have reflected largely the anxieties expressed in the House, and, as I say, the scope of that Bill is still under consideration.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I agree that points were made about the process of consultation and about possible conflicts of interest. However, the impression given in the letter was that those could easily be got round and that they presented no real problems. The letter went on to make points about seeking views.

However, in answer to a parliamentary question, the Solicitor-General did not say "if" about banks and building societies doing conveyancing. He used the word "when." The commitment in the letter dated 12 January, on which the whole agreement was based—it was the foundation on which we built the agreement — was, "We are committed." It is impossible to be more definite than that.

The Attorney-General: "We are committed," said my hon. and learned Friend, but we shall consult, and it is worth re-reading what was said in the debate to see exactly what views were expressed. If one says, "You have given a commitment, and you have said that you will consult, but you have said that you will not stick to the commitment whatever the consultation produces," then one is talking about empty consultation.

It might help if I were to repeat what I said on the subject. I said that the form of that legislation would take into account the need to protect consumers against prejudice resulting from any conflict of interest and would be drafted in the light of our recent consultation. That is the position. That fairly sets it out, and there is nothing that I can add to it.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): That is a different argument from that used by the Government, for example, on the measure to abolish the GLC. There they made a commitment which, in spite of any consultation, they regard as unmoveable. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows the view that I took on the previous occasion. He should now tell the House honestly, "We have changed our position," rather than pretend that the position then and the position now are the same, because they are not.

The Attorney-General: I shall say this just once more, and then I should like to continue my speech. We have not changed our position. We said in the letter to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), "This is our intention, but we shall consult." The powerful speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon would have alerted anyone to the fact that this is not an easy issue and that we must examine it carefully. That is the position now, and that is all I can say about it.

It is also the Government's intention to enable solicitors to act in corporate form rather than simply in partnership with other solicitors as is the case now. Clause 28 will enable licensed conveyancers to operate in this way, and it is right to open up this possibility to solicitors as well. An amendment will be brought forward in Committee.

Part III of the Bill contains provisions relating to legal aid. Clauses 36 to 40, which implement a recommendation of the Royal Commission on legal services, introduce changes in the way in which legal aid complaints relating to solicitors and barristers are handled.

At present legal aid complaints—which arise, by and large, from a practitioner's failure to comply with the legal aid legislation rather than from an assisted person's dissatisfaction with his advisers — are considered by tribunals established under the Legal Aid Act 1974. Those tribunals have been used hardly at all in the last 12 years. That is because, first, the Law Society and the Bar Council regard legal aid complaints as extremely serious matters relating to professional conduct and therefore to be treated as such, and, secondly, there is some concern that the constitutions and procedures of the relevant tribunals might offend against the rules of natural justice. The Bill therefore transfers the jurisdiction to the solicitors disciplinary tribunal and a senate disciplinary tribunal, at the same time empowering those tribunals to reduce or cancel legal aid remuneration or to exclude a practitioner from undertaking further legal aid work.

Such legal aid complaints will usually relate to matters, such as failure to respond to inquiries from the legal aid area office, which do not directly concern the client. The sanctions that the tribunals may impose will therefore be intended more to safeguard the interests of the legal aid fund than to give some benefit to the assisted person. He may nevertheless benefit, since the reduction or cancellation of the practitioner's remuneration will reduce the liability of the fund and thus the client may recover some part of any contribution he has paid or be subject to a smaller statutory charge.

These changes will enable legal aid complaints to be considered in a more effective and fairer way and will ensure that the professional disciplinary tribunals will have available a wide range of sanctions.

Clauses 41 and 42 also amend the Legal Aid Act 1974. Clause 41 will enable the Lord Chancellor to align the capital limit of eligibility for assistance by way of representation with that for legal aid proper. That is, the capital limit involved will be £3,000. The difference between the limits is at present £765 and £3,000. Clause 42 overcomes a difficulty in making payments out of the legal aid fund for urgent work done before a legal aid order is granted. That aspect was crying out for reform, and I am sure that that measure is supported by every hon. Member.

Part IV introduces a number of changes relating to the procedures and powers of the High Court and county courts. I do not think that it is necessary for me to go through those on Second Reading, except to point out that clause 48 is a technical revision which corrects a defect in the provisions enacted in 1982 relating to the right of certain financial institutions, such as banks, to deduct a prescribed amount towards the adminstrative expenses they incur in giving effect to the recovery of a judgment debt garnishee order.

Clause 50 will enable the Lord Chancellor to contract out the keeping of the register of county court judgments. That is a task presently carried out by the Lord Chancellor's Department, which can equally appropriately be carried out in the private sector and enable staff to be redeployed to other work in the Department. Clause 50 will therefore enable the Lord Chancellor to enter into an agreement as to the keeping of the register by a body corporate. The Lord Chancellor will still be able to maintain by regulations control over services and fees.

Clause 51 corrects the present anomalous state of affairs under which the High Court and the county courts do not have the same powers to grant lessees relief from forfeiture for non-payment of rent.

The final part of the Bill passes under the description of "Miscellaneous and General"—often known as the rag-bag provisions. I shall not attempt to identify a common purpose for its contents—I do not think that I could—which cover such diverse subjects as limitation periods in defamation actions, appeals to pension appeals tribunals and the constitution of juvenile courts. They have one common feature. They are all helpful, all make the administration of justice more effective and all are, I hope, uncontroversial.

That completes my description of what is in the Bill. I am sorry that it has taken a little time. I have already referred to two new clauses which are to be brought forward in Committee. Two others will be proposed at that time. The first will fulfil an undertaking given by the Lord Chancellor that a new clause would be brought forward which would make provision for the reimbursement of costs incurred by reason of the death or incapacity of a judge. The Lord Chancellor will be empowered to reimburse to each party to the action wasted costs up to a fixed sum. The second will afford magistrates in Northern Ireland a measure of protection from legal action in cases where they have acted without jurisdiction. That will give them protection similar to that which magistrates in England and Wales have.

This Bill will make a number of useful and, I hope, welcome changes in the law. It will increase disciplinary powers over solicitors, for the first time enabling the Law Society to impose sanctions for bad work. That has always been a missing link. The Bill will introduce a welcome increase in competition in conveyancing, but it will still ensure that the interests of the consumer are protected. It will improve the operation of the machinery of justice in a number of varied ways. I therefore commend the Bill to the House.

8.56 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I thank the Attorney-General for his exposition of the measures in the Bill. I thank him especially for giving us new information about the Law Society's attitude to the workings of part I. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman said, the two principal proposals are the new measures designed to deal with complaints against solicitors and the proposals designed to increase competition for house conveyancing work.

In principle, the Labour party is in favour of new machinery to deal with complaints against solicitors and of increased competition in house conveyancing work. However, we are unable to give the Bill an unqualified welcome on either of its main proposals. Our most serious reservations are over part I, dealing with complaints against solicitors. Many right hon. and hon. Members know from personal involvement in constituents' cases of the general public's concern about the difficulty in getting to grips with complaints against solicitors. Many right hon. and hon. Members know just how intractable these issues can be. I have a constituency case which, I believe, is a clear-cut negligence case against a firm of Newcastle solicitors. I have been vigorously pressing that case for the past year and a half, yet it is no further forward.

There is a widespread belief among our fellow citizens that members of the legal profession protect themselves from the rest of us. The National Consumer Council commissioned research from MORI to discover attitudes towards the solicitors complaints system. The survey found that only 15 per cent. of those polled thought that solicitors, or a solicitors' body, should investigate compaints. Of the rest of those polled, 24 per cent. opted for an independent body. They were followed by 11 per cent. who favoured some form of Government body, and 10 per cent. who wanted an independent person who was not a solicitor. When asked about the composition of a possible new complaints body, only 3 per cent. of those asked thought that it should consist entirely of solicitors; 60 per cent. thought that it should be composed of solicitors and other people, and 34 per cent. thought that it should be composed of people who were not solicitors. Nearly two thirds thought that it should be a mixed body consisting 50:50 of solicitors and non-solicitors; 36 per cent. thought that there should be a majority of non-solicitors, while a loyal 3 per cent. preferred a majority of solicitors. That is not a sign of public confidence in the present system.

Any new system created to deal with complaints against solicitors should meet the legitimate anxieties of the public. Part I does not do so. It amends section 44 of the Solicitors Act 1974, and it extends the disciplinary sanctions which the Law Society can apply. The Law Society will potentially be able to investigate a wider range of complaints, but there is still no clear definition of the difference between negligence and misconduct. I understood the Attorney-General to say that that matter would be considered. That is a welcome assurance.

The Bill contains no provision for compensation, and as I understand it, that matter will not be considered by the Government. What is far more serious is that the Law Society is left with an intractable duality of functions. It is the solicitors' professional body representing their interests, advising its members and making representations on its behalf. All of that is proper. The Law Society functions like any other trade union, but it also regulates the profession and makes decisions in disciplinary cases involving its members. To make matters worse, the multiplicity of avenues for complaints against solicitors causes confusion. In practice, it wastes the time, money, patience and temper of those complaining against the profession.

Two points stand out clearly. There should be one procedure for dealing with complaints against the profession. It needs to be accessible and to have its own staff and independent investigative powers. It should be able to impose its decisions effectively so that injustices are rectified as far as they can be.

The second point that stands out is that the procedure for dealing with complaints against solicitors cannot be run by their own trade union. As the MORI poll demonstrates, that is widely perceived to be unfair. I can see that any institution dealing with complaints against a professional practitioner needs to have professional advice. I can even see the case for members of the profession serving on the decision-making body. However, there must be a substantial lay involvement from an informed cross-section of our society if the charge of vested interest is to be effectively dispelled. That is the most contentious part of the Bill.

The issues with which we are dealing are no longer merely those of a private consumer seeking resolution of a grievance against the supplier of a service. Since the inception of the legal aid scheme, a substantial portion of legal services is paid for by the taxpayer. Those who have charge of the distribution and expenditure of public funds should be publicly accountable for that charge. Legal aid gives a new dimension to the different interests with a stake in the procedure for investigating complaints against solicitors. The state's duty to protect its citizens is augmented by its duty to protect the fruits of the citizens' taxes.

How likely is it that part I will provide a lasting solution to the problems that it seeks to address? Part I leaves key issues unresolved. It has been superseded, to some extent, by the findings of the report commissioned by the Law Society from Coopers and Lybrand. I have no doubt that we shall be discussing this matter again before too long.

I have mixed feelings about part II. I look forward to exploring what is proposed in more detail in Committee. The Opposition welcome in principle the Government's intention to open conveyancing work to those qualified to undertake it and to end the solicitors' professional monopoly. We welcome those measures.

There is a fear that Parliament will be setting up a new mini-profession which will blunt the competitive edge of the proposals contained in the Bill sponsored by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). I accept that there is a need for proper safeguards for the consumer and an overview of those who undertake conveyancing work. I also accept that the new conveyancers must be regulated by something more than their insurance companies.

I believe that the advertising of services will probably have as much impact on conveyancing fees as the proposals contained in the Bill.

The Attorney-General referred to a major issue which I feel remains outstanding. I am uncertain about the position of banking institutions and building societies under clause 28. I noted carefully what the Attorney-General said about the Government's intention to return to the House with further legislation. The opportunity to do in-house conveyancing must be attractive to those who are providing the mortgage. I can see the point about conflict of interest, and I wonder whether it is possible to make regulations to meet it.

On 16 December 1983 the Solicitor-General gave the House this assurance:

> "We therefore intend to introduce our own legislation where necessary to extend the right of conveyancing, not just of registered land, but of all land, to solicitors employed by, for example, building societies and banks, subject to safeguards."

Later, in response to a question from the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), he said—I shall quote the whole passage so that there can be no question of leaving bits out:

> "We are satisfied that it is possible and proper to legislate in respect of solicitors employed by building societies. That will need legislation. We think that it is right that solicitors employed by banks should be able to convey. Our mind is not closed to the possibility of solicitors employed by other institutions being permitted to convey, but in some cases there could be an insuperable conflict of interests. We shall investigate the possibilities."—[Official Report, 16 December 1983; Vol. 50, c. 1325-26.]

Do the Government stand by that statement in its entirety? There is no suggestion in the statement of any reservations about conveyancing by banks. All the reservations refer to other institutions which may be permitted to do conveyancing work. That seems to be under investigation still, and presumably consultations are taking place.

Mr. Weetch: Is my hon. Friend aware that the National Consumer Council and the Consumers Association have made very strong submissions that there should be adequate safeguards if building societies and banks are to be responsible for conveyancing property?

Mr. Brown: Yes; I am well aware of the submissions of those organisations. I find them persuasive, but until one sees the proposals one is not able to judge whether the safeguards are sufficient. Because of the assurances that have previously been given to the House I thought that there would be proposals for us to see, but there are not. That is why I ask the Attorney-General whether the commitment given to the House still stands, or whether it has been diluted in some way. It is not clear to me where we stand on the issue. Perhaps in the summation the Solicitor-General will be able to clarify the position for me. I cannot believe that the Government are reneging on the assurances that the House has been given. To my untutored mind it is not clear whether clause 28 already permits banks to do in-house work. The Attorney-General shakes his head, so I take the point.

I do not wish to go into matters that should be raised more properly in Committee, but I wish to comment briefly on some points. Clause 41 will allow the Government to increase the financially eligible level of capital for an applicant for assistance by way of representation under the legal aid scheme. This is a welcome reform which the Government were right to bring forward. At first sight I thought that the clause which enables the Lord Chancellor to transfer the registry of county court judgments to a company run by the users of that registry, was a concession to the privatisation enthusiasts on the Government Benches, but on a closer examination I see that the proposal has merit and may well result in a more efficient service.

Reducing the time limit for slander and libel actions from six years to three years also has merit. In my view these actions are only for the very rich or the very angry. I am disappointed that the Government did not feel able to undertake a more far-reaching consideration of the present state of the libel and slander laws. I am sure that other hon. Members will be sympathetic to the point of view that we may be missing an opportunity to deal with the issue of misrepresentation in the press and in broadcasting. An accessible independent tribunal which could adjudicate on such complaints would be a welcome reform. In particular, it would give the individual of ordinary financial means access to a remedy which is at present for all practical purposes denied to him.

We seem to be establishing a tradition in legal affairs debates that we comment on what is not in the Bill because it was removed in another place. I shall content myself with saying that the original clause 43, ending a citizen's rights to go to the Court of Appeal when a lower court says that he cannot challenge the decision of a Government body, was ill-considered by the Government. It was almost universally condemned, and I think that we are well rid of it. Although I appreciate the Government's concern to save money, it should not be done at the expense of the citizen.

Two other matters missing from the Bill—I suspect that it was never intended to include them—are the issue of law centre and advice service funding and, separately, other recommendations of the Legal Aid Advisory Committee contained in its 34th report. I accept that law and advice centres are funded from a variety of different sources, but surely the time has come for the Lord Chancellor to take an overview of what is being done and to try to co-ordinate the present endeavours.

With regard to the Legal Aid Advisory Committee recommendations, I think that it would be wrong of Parliament to shelve the results of the review of legal aid eligibility. The report contains some useful ideas which meet criticisms which have been made of the legal aid scheme and which would also enhance the provision of legal services.

The Bill is more to be commended for effort than achievement, and I look forward to making a constructive contribution to its progress through Committee.

9.11 pm

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): I want to say a brief word on part II of the Bill and first to congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General and his colleagues on having implemented their commitment on licensed conveyancing so quickly, so fully and in such a satisfactory manner.

The preoccupation with banks and building societies has perhaps taken people's minds off what has been done in the Bill. It provides for the matters for which the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) was principally pressing; it provides for what the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) has wanted for so long. Now they have got what they wanted. I hope that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby will feel that the taking over of his Bill by the Government has proved a worthwhile exercise and produced a solution which he will find very satisfactory.

I congratulate not only the Government but those who have co-operated with them in producing such a speedy solution—in particular the Farrand committee and the Law Society. We are all very ready to criticise lawyers but we should also be ready to give them a pat on the back when they co-operate so fully and speedily as here to introduce competition in their own field. I hope that we shall not lose sight of the great progress made in that respect, as it was the principal objective of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby.

I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend and his colleagues in the Government on being so cautious about the risks involved in going any further. Initially, as one remembers, there was a great outcry about the lawyers trying to look after their own interests. That always happens and there is nothing new about it. But when people got over that and had a close look at what was involved in giving powers to the banks and building societies, it was recognised that there really is a conflict of interest to be considered. Some credit must be given to the lawyers. All the lawyers I know who have been interested in the measure have recognised that conflict, and have then set about trying to find an answer to it, and if genuine safeguards to cover that conflict of interest can be found, so be it.

We hear a great deal about consumer interest. It would certainly not be in the interest of the consumer to open up new practices involving a conflict of interest acting to the detriment only of the consumer. There would necessarily be a conflict of interest between the bank or the building society in doing the conveyancing work, and the consumer whom they purport to be serving.

I cannot believe that either the hon. Member for Great Grimsby or the hon. Member for Ipswich want to do something which would be to the detriment of the consumer. Therefore, I hope that they will accept that there is here a serious point to be dealt with. I hope that they will also say that, while everybody should be looking for the answer, they must not and will not try to hustle the Government into doing something unless and until the answer has been found. If they can find it, let them find it. I promise them this. All the lawyers I know would be most interested to hear positive suggestions from those who want to get on faster on how the conflict of interest could be met. If and in so far as they are put forward, and from whatever quarter they come, they will receive the most interested and serious consideration.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I shall develop this point in my speech. I remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the idea of allowing solicitors employed by banks and building societies to do conveyancing was the Government's own idea, not mine. It was also the Government's own decision to extend that power to unregistered as well as registered land.

Sir Ian Percival: Be that as it may, all the more credit that they are now recognising that there is a danger of conflict of interest in all the areas referred to, and so have determined not to do something which could operate to the detriment of the consumer, and not to go ahead until the serious point of that conflict has been resolved.

I for one congratulate the Government upon the Bill. I hope that they will stand fast on this ground. It would be absurd to go ahead unless and until the answer to that conflict is found.

9.16 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The Administration of Justice Bill has been described as a blancmange. In fact, it is a curate's omelette in many respects. Even though it has been cooked at a low regulo, and at this time of night, it is good to see the serried ranks of lawyers on the Conservative Benches. I am not sure what the collective noun is—perhaps it is a charge of lawyers, all offering their services free of charge at a time when they are free from their work at the courts. However, the Bill is a mixed bag. I shall start with part I, but the substance of what I have to say concerns part II.

Undoubtedly part I fulfils a long-felt want. There is a growing dissatisfaction with all professions, not just the law, with the lack of redress for abuse. Let me take the medical profession as an example. A doctor who puts his hand on a patient's knee or who makes a sexual advance to the patient can be dealt with for professional misconduct, but a doctor who, through incompetence, kills the patient cannot be dealt with in the same way. If bad professional work is done by people such as doctors and solicitors, the answer is to make a claim for damages or professional negligence. That means getting another solicitor to fight the case, going through the uncertainties of the law. That is an inadequate means of redress. The Bill does something to rectify that. We have something that we should have in all the professions. I am glad to see it coming in the legal profession.

However, the Bill deals with the matter in a limited way. It does not cover arguments over costs. That was what precipitated action in the first place. The Glanville Davies affair, with the gross overcharging that went on then, precipitated much of the concern, yet that problem is not dealt with in this proposed legislation. It was a major scandal. The Law Society failed drastically to live up to its responsibilities, and it was dealt with only by High Court action, with enormous expense and delay. The matter is not covered by the legislation, which is supposed to be bringing the Law Society up to date. It does not provide for lay representation on important Law Society committees, which was a recommendation of the Benson commission. It recommended that laymen should be on the assessment committees reviewing costs, and they are not. Thirdly, it is permissive, because it is up to the Law Society to decide when and how to use it.

Fourthly, it does not solve the basic problem, because the Law Society is two different things—a trade union to advance the interests and purposes of lawyers and a servant of the public interest. When those interests conflict, the society cannot possibly carry out both functions. That is the whole point of asking for an independent means of review for disputes of this kind. A trade union cannot be a regulator and, if it poses as one, it cannot be trusted. That is why there have been so many complaints.

People do not see the Law Society as behaving objectively in the interests of the public. The MORI survey commissioned by the National Consumer Council shows this dramatically. The Law Society is not seen to be fair and it is not trusted. Yet that is the body to which these powers are to be given. Coopers and Lybrand management consultants are carrying out a far-ranging review of this type of problem. If they conclude that the Law Society cannot be both plaintiff and judge in its own case and cannot act as both trade union and protector of the public interest and that the only solution is an independent complaints procedure, all the effort that has gone into this legislation will be wasted. Moreover, what has been done today will stand in the way of the truly radical improvement that we believe is necessary.

There is an interesting contrast between the two parts of the Bill. Part II establishes a council for conveyancers, to be responsible for standards and discipline. Why cannot the legal profession have a body which functions in the same way and with the same semi-independent approach? It is not difficult to achieve. The Legal Action Group has put up a proposal. My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) introduced the Solicitors (Independent Complaints Procedure) Bill, which I am proud and honoured to have sponsored. The National Consumer Council has produced an excellent report entitled "In Dispute with a Solicitor". Others have suggested an ombudsman, which the insurance industry already has and the banking industry is trying to establish — not to mention the Daily Mirror, although that ombudsman will probably be in Liechtenstein.

There must be an independent body of some kind to deal with complaints from outside and to mediate between the interested party and the public. As the National Consumer Council has suggested, a legal council is needed through which all complaints can be channelled — a single, integrated body composed of laymen and solicitors and operating independently with a legal ombudsman. Until that is achieved, the flood of complaints will continue. When I introduced the House Buyers Bill I was astonished and horrified at the deluge of complaints about solicitors all over the country, many involving serious malpractices. One Member of Parliament cannot deal with all those complaints, and it is extremely difficult to get anyone else to deal with them. This Bill takes us only part of the way. We need a proper independent complaints procedure to deal with the problem and to provide the public with the satisfaction of knowing that their complaints will be independently assessed.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): How does the hon. Gentleman know how far we need to go before he has seen whether this scheme works?

Mr. Mitchell: I have already pointed out that the danger of an inadequate, halfway-house scheme of this kind is that it will block the further progress that is really needed. The general principle is clear. There must be an independent body. The Law Society cannot be both trade union and public protector, because that is an impossible role and it is bound to fail. Therefore, we must argue for what is really required rather than what the Bill proposes. That is certainly the view of Labour Members, and that is why the response to part I of the Bill from all the interested organisations whose views I respect, including the Consumers Association, the National Consumer Council, the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, has been to praise with faint damns. The Bill is all right, but it is just not good enough. That has been the general reaction to part I—to welcome the provisions but to stress their inadequacy. That is what we must do with part I.

It is a rare pleasure in opposition to have played a part in the paternity of legislation, and part II springs directly from the House Buyers Bill. I am pleased to acknowledge that fact. Originally the Government tried to praise my measure with faint doubts, perhaps even to kill it. They certainly tried to buy off support for it. But they have now come round to accepting the principle implicit in that measure — the ending of the monopoly and the enfranchisment of conveyancers.

There was no drive from the Lord Chancellor's department to end the conveyancing monopoly. It simply hid behind the Benson recommendations until my Bill was introduced and until, on 16 December 1983, it was carried. The House then expressed itself in favour of ending the monopoly which solicitors enjoyed in relation to house conveyancing. That led to two months of negotiations and discussions, at the end of which I withdrew my Bill in return for what I regarded—and still do so—as a series of absolute commitments, of which this measure is one but only one.

That commitment was to set up the Farrand committee to consider the tests of competence needed for non-solicitor conveyancers. All interested parties sat on that committee, and it did an excellent, rapid and important job. To report in September 1984 was a real achievement, and part II implements its recommendations.

However, not all the detailed qualifications are given. The proposal is to set up a council which will set out the qualifications, establish the standard of competence and all the rest. That is the sensible way of doing things, and it will be done with regard to Farrand's proposals.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) will refer to some of the problems. We have received representations from conveyancers who are already functioning about what will happen to them under the transitional arrangements. It could be argued that the framework is over-elaborate. Indeed, the Law Society and a number of solicitors are now rushing forward to praise what they attacked and condemned less than two years ago. I therefore get a mite suspicious that the framework might be slightly over-elaborate. It is certainly elaborate compared with the proposals in my Bill, which were basically designed to safeguard the money of customers.

There is a further problem about solicitors which can only be resolved afterwards. What will happen if people wish to practise as both solicitors and conveyancers? On 13 February a correspondent in the Law Society Gazette spoke of conveyancers as a sub-professional class, and suggested that fully fledged lawyers who wanted to practice as conveyancers should be barred. The consultation paper on the changes in the rules of conduct leaves this option open. Clearly, the Law Society has not yet decided on this matter, but solicitors should be able to register in both capacities, certainly in the early stages. That point should be clarified.

On what terms will conveyancers serve on building society panels? If they do not do so, that will impose an extra cost of about £70 to have the work done again by a solicitor. I see no reason why we should not legislate to provide that conveyancers should serve on building society panels on the same basis and with the same right of entry as solicitors. Personally, I should like to abolish such panels, but as they exist it would be wrong to give solicitors a monopoly and it would be right to put conveyancers on exactly the same footing.

There are problems about advertising. The conveyancing council should be able to compete with the type of advertising that the Law Society is now undertaking on a substantial scale. How will that be funded? Yet on the essentials my view is simple and straightforward. The House has expressed itself clearly as being in favour of the principle of breaking the monopoly and allowing conveyancers to operate, but many hon. Members also made it clear on 16 December that they were in favour of imposing some framework of qualifications as a safeguard for the consumer. It was right that we should delegate the job of deciding what those qualifications should be to a committee representing all the interested parties. In my view, we should accept that committee's decisions. It conducted a vigorous and stringent inquiry.

I cannot agree with many of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich. I see these measures as the logical culmination of our efforts to break the monopoly. It was a case of swings and roundabouts. The legislation represents a balance. Both sides have made concessions. The Law Society wanted conveyancers barred from commercial conveyancing, but the Bill makes no such provision. The Law Society wanted a line to be drawn between conveyancers and any association with estate agents. No such provision appears. What is provided for is a council that will rule in the light of circumstances. That is sensible. There are consumer representatives on the council. Almost half the representatives are not licensed conveyancers. The council will have to act liberally and sensibly because the future of the profession is in its hands, and it will be up to the council to make a success of it. That responsibility will guarantee that the council rules sensibly and that there will be a liberal interpretation of the framework.

Without a healthy, vigorous and profitable profession, everything will have been in vain. With the guidance of the Farrand report, and the representation that is provided for, the council will have the opportunity to regulate sensibly and to modify the regulations in the light of the circumstances of the time and the needs of the profession as it develops. The council will have to make a success of the profession.

There is the vexed question of existing conveyancers. I can see why there is a sense of frustration, but the problem is open to solution in the same way. We must provide for responsibility and public protection. The National Consumer Council believes that the council should be required to exempt those with sufficient practical experience. It will be possible, on a flexible basis, to make sensible arrangements and to consider deserving cases — people with competence, skill and experience—with a benign eye, and to do them justice. On that basis, I welcome the measure.

However, there is a wider question. We do not establish complete competition just by adding conveyancers to solicitors. We do not break the monopoly by widening it. There is still a monopoly — a monopoly of authorised persons rather than solicitors. There will not be the full and free competition envisaged in the Bill, which is essential if the lot of the house buyer is to be improved.

There is no provision for the establishment of a comprehensive service for the house buyer. It should be possible for one institution — whether solicitors with property centres, as in Scotland, estate agents providing a conveyancing service, or building societies — to provide a comprehensive service for a generation of house buyers many of whom do not share the long middle-class tradition of buying and selling houses with the aid of the family solicitor.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): Is not the difficulty that, if we are to protect the consumer, those who do the conveyancing must be qualified in some way and, if there is some form of qualification, a cartel or closed shop is automatically introduced?

Mr. Mitchell: The legislation provides for qualifications. Solicitors employed by banks and building societies to do conveyancing would have qualifications. I am talking about institutional competition and the widened monopoly being broken because organisations employ whom they want. Banks and building societies will employ solicitors to offer a comprehensive service. I do not want the professional monopoly that has prevented all change.

My Bill provided for institutional competition by allowing banks and building societies to do conveyancing on registered land. The Lord Chancellor — this is my interpretation — in an attempt to divert support away from my comprehensive measure, proposed that solicitors could be employed by banks and building societies to do conveyancing on all land. It was a gambler's throw. It failed, but it left us with his proposal.

After Second Reading, and during the negotiations about how to achieve my Bill's objectives, I felt that it was vital to sustain the Chancellor's commitment to widen competition. It remained the central objective, as it had been a central part of the Bill, to ensure that banks and building societies would be able to do conveyancing. I am satisfied that we got a commitment in absolute and inescapable terms. In view of our earlier discussion, I should like to put on record the first commitment given in the Solicitor-General's letter to me of 12 January, the terms of which were inescapable. He wrote:

"We are committed to legislation to enable solicitors employed by organisations such as building societies and banks to undertake conveyancing."

Sir Ian Percival: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we owe it to the consumer who, as he rightly says, will usually be wholly mystified, to ensure that his conveyancing is not carried out by someone who has an interest in conflict with his? How does the hon. Gentleman suggest that we provide that protection to the consumer if conveyancing is done by the bank or building society which would, as the lender, have an interest in the conflict with the consumer? How does the hon. Gentleman suggest that we provide that safeguard for the consumer?

Mr. Mitchell: I must emphasise that the proposal was the Government's. The Lord Chancellor is highly skilled in legal matters and has legal officers. They will have thought about that problem before the proposal was made. Such ideas are not clutched out of the air by those in government. The had thought about it. The letter continued to give the impression that it was a fairly straightforward matter to resolve. It stated:

"So far as conflicts of interest are concerned, our provisional view is that we can rely primarily on appropriate amendments to the Solicitors Practice Rules."

I agree with that. The letter continues:

"This might be supplemented, in the case of building societies, by a Code of Practice issued by the Building Societies Association and by a statutory requirement for societies to inform clients of the desirability of seeking independent advice where, for instance, the society wishes to impose a special condition on the loan. The Code of Practice, which might be policed by the Director General of Fair Trading or perhaps by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, could also prohibit societies from discriminating against borrowers who chose not to use the Society's conveyancing services."

It is a straightforward matter, and the way around it is not difficult. The Government are committed to legislation to enable solicitors to act in this way. The letter of 12 January is the foundation on which we erected the agreement, and is central to it. Without it, I would not have withdrawn my Bill. The written answer said:

"We will shortly issue a consultation paper on how best to ensure that conflicts of interest and anti-competitive practices do not arise when solicitors employed by banks, building societies and other organisations are permitted to undertake conveyancing."—[Official Report, 17 February 1984; Vol. 54, c. 347.]

There is no more absolute commitment than that. It is clear, absolute, straightforward and unequivocal.

Mr. Weetch: Does my hon. Friend realise that, when someone buys a house and employs a solicitor to undertake the conveyancing, that person not only pays his solicitor for the conveyancing but the person, usually the same person, who acts on behalf of the building society to check the deeds and the terms of the loan? In other words, one and the same person acts both for the purchaser and the mortgagee in the form of the building society. There are potential conflicts of interest in that. However, not until this convenient time have they ever been put forward in public.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend has contributed a major point, which is on my next page of notes. He is absolutely right. Conflicts of interest arise all the time, but the profession has accepted them as part of the norm and done nothing about them. Conflicts of interest must arise in the property centres being set up by solicitors. They are being set up in different parts of the country, and have existed for a long time in Scotland.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that point is bogus because both the building society and the client have an interest in getting a good title and, therefore, there is no conflict of interest?

Mr. Mitchell: There is a conflict of interest in that the solicitor is wearing two hats and fulfilling two different roles. That is clear. The fact that that argument has not been raised as a point to prevent solicitors from getting two sets of fees, makes it a little difficult to accept that argument when it is raised to prevent banks and building societies from conveyancing. I do not accept that conflict of interest argument.

[Mr. Mitchell]

I am developing the commitment made to me, on the basis of which I withdrew my Bill. The Lord Chancellor said:

"the Government — and I think with the assent of the Opposition—entered into certain commitments as a result of that legislation. We were in honour bound, having entered into those commitments, to do what we had promised to do."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 January 1985; Vol. 458, c. 825-6.]

Part of the Government's promise was to introduce legislation to allow banks and building societies to undertake conveyancing. There is no escaping that. They cannot fudge it. They are honour bound to fulfil that promise.

Clearly the Law Society will carry on a rearguard action, such as is being staged now, and will make a major point of conflicts of interest. In reality, however, it is a minor matter which affects a minority of cases. It is clear that the conflict of interest point was not raised when the position benefited its members—when they received two fees for doing one job. It can be dealt with straightforwardly by the practice rules, by the Office of Fair Trading and by an insistence that where a conflict of interest arises, the solicitor acting for a building society must tell the customer to consult his own solicitor. It is as easy as that to avoid conflicts of interest.

The minor point of difficulty, which I concede exists, does not obviate the principle, and was accepted, so as not to obviate the principle, by the Government when they persuaded me to withdraw my Bill. I cannot understand why it has become such a major point now.

I did not understand the Attorney-General to say that the Government will not allow banks and building societies to act. He reserved his position in view of the argument that we all know is continuing. But in view of the commitments made, if the legislation is not introduced, it would be dishonest, deceitful, mendacious and untrue. The Government will have conned me into withdrawing my Bill on the basis of promises that will not be fulfilled.

I know nothing of the internal workings of the Government, but some press reports have suggested that the Lord Chancellor, having introduced this proposal to persuade Conservative Members not to support my legislation, is trying to renege on his own commitments. I do not say that: the press does. The reports also say that he is trying to hedge round the legislation so that the principle is implemented in such a way as to make it unattractive to banks and building societies. One newspaper this morning suggested that one building society might do the conveyancing for another building society's customers. How ludicrous that would be. It is so comical that it cannot be seen as implementing the principle to which the Government are committed.

The press reports say that the arguments are continuing, but I believe that the Lord Chancellor is a man of honour. Indeed, Gilbert's Lord Chancellor in Iolanthe said:

"The Law is the true embodiment
Of everything that's excellent.
It has no kind of fault or flaw,
And I, my Lords, embody the Law."

Therefore, it is a monstrous slur on someone who embodies all those qualifications to imply that he is indulging in sordid politicking and trying to rat on specific promises made on his behalf to me, on the basis of which I took action which is now irreversible. I do not understand how the press can assert that a man in such a position would behave in that way. It is a monstrous slur on the integrity of the Lord Chancellor. If the assertions are true —I am sure they are not—they would be a slur, too, on the Solicitor-General, who made those promises to me and who might think that, if they are not fulfilled, it is a resigning matter. His word has been betrayed.

Mr. Weetch: I took it.

Mr. Mitchell: We all took his word. I am glad that the Attorney-General has merely reserved his position, because the legislation must come. It must confer the right to banks and building societies to operate in a way that is attractive to them, and it must widen the range of choice of the consumer. I look forward to that promise being fulfilled unalloyed, unadulterated, unweakened and in its entirety.

For too long house purchase has been a log jam, and the purchaser has been overcharged for conveyancing. That log jam was broken by the House Buyers Bill. Drastic changes resulted from the Bill, and I am delighted with what is happening in the house-buying market. There are new ideas and initiatives and a surge of action and change. It is estimated that conveyancing costs have decreased substantially by 20 to 30 per cent. That is a direct gain from the Bill. We have seen the attempt to try new initiatives, solicitors advertising, progress towards comprehensive services, solicitors taking up the idea of property centres in Wrexham, Crawley, Berwick and Lincoln on the pattern of the Scottish solicitors, computerisation brought into a sector where it is vital and can make a major contribution, conveyancing plans and packages for solicitors to make the whole operation more simple and straightforward, estate agents looking forward to employing conveyancers, and a whole range of choices and changes. It is a shake-up that directly results from the threat of competition. That threat has to be sustained. We are implementing part of it today in the Bill. The next step is to extend it to banks and building societies.

When this comes, it will be a real change, and the House will have made a contribution. We will have done something in this measure, and through the House Buyers Bill, to help our people in the most genuine, straightforward and necessary way. It has done something more relevant to the lives of people and to improving their lot than most of the other things that we discuss in the House. Therefore, I welcome that part of the Bill and the flood of initiatives that will follow.

9.50 pm

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): I declare an interest as a partner in a firm of solicitors. Before Labour Members jeer, I remind them that I am not part of the Law Society's rearguard action, as I voted for the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on Second Reading. I also remind him that a substantial number of Conservative Members voted for it.

I welcome the proposals to abolish the solicitors' conveyancing monopoly. It has been described several times today as a monopoly, but I feel that it is more of a cartel. Some 27,000 solicitors amd several thousand firms in competition with each other hardly smacks of monopoly. There can be only one test of whether the cartel should be removed, and that is whether it is in the public interest. It has been clearly demonstrated that the Bill's changes will result in cheaper conveyancing. I understand that solicitors' charges have dropped by about 30 per cent. since 1983, and that step is clearly in the public interest.

The proposal is that we have a council for licensed conveyancers and I agree with that. It could not be anything else. The standards of the council will be set by the council. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General has described, that is required—under clause 8. The clause goes no further, but I suggest that an exam of a similar standard to the solicitors' conveyancing exam should be a fair test if we are to have fair competition.

While I voted for the abolition of the cartel, I voted for the Bill only on a matter of principle. If the Bill had stayed in the same form as that passed on Second Reading, which I think everyone will agree was pretty ropey, I should have voted against it on Third Reading. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby has made much of the negotiations that he had with my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General in the months after he had obtained a Second Reading of his Bill. It is worth pointing out that the hon. Member got his closure motion by only one vote, so he hardly negotiated from a position of overwhelming authority.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: What was the majority for Second Reading?

Mr. Ottaway: I do not know, but I think that it was about 20 or 30.

The hon. Member hardly negotiated from a position of overwhelming authority, particularly when several hon. Members backed him that day simply on a matter of principle and not for the full force of his Bill.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: It is a curious suggestion, if the hon. Gentleman is making it, that commitments of honour can be diluted by an inverse ratio to the size of the majority.

Mr. Ottaway: I am not suggesting that. If the test of whether banks and building societies should have this right had been put to the vote, the hon. Gentleman might have had a different result.

Some of the problems that have been described if banks and building societies are allowed to do conveyancing are problems of conflicts. That has been pointed out by the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) who gave an example of a solicitor today acting for a borrower and a building society at the same time. However, what is being proposed here is slightly different. The lender's lawyer has never acted for both lender and borrower, because the lender is in a position of strength.

In response to the Government's suggestion that we allow banks and building societies to carry out conveyancing, the Lord Chancellor's Department issued a consultation paper that expressed concern "that the dominant position of certain lenders in the housing market might enable them to pursue anti-competitive practices."

It relied upon the Competition Act 1980 to protect against some of the unfair practises.

What the paper did not do was consider the suitability of banks and building societies to carry out conveyancing. However, the Benson report did that, and said:

"We consider, therefore, that even if it were possible to devise a suitable system for licensing and supervising conveyancing by building societies and banks that was not cumbersome and expensive such a development would not be in the public interest."

After all, we are talking about the public interest. The Benson report was right. I am not satisfied that the Fair Trading Acts could cater for that position. After all, that would be to ignore human nature. A man may go into a building society and ask for a loan, and on the way out be told, "By the way, we offer a conveyancing service." The chap is rather worried whether he will be given a mortgage, and it would require a very strong-willed person to resist the offer of conveyancing.

The real problem is that the banks and the building societies would be in a dominant position. With their tremendous financial reserves — £3 billion for the building societies — they will set up high-technology conveyancing shops. While in the short term that would be good for the consumer, it would decimate the solicitors' profession.

The local branch of the Law Society in Nottingham carried out a survey of the impact of banks and building societies carrying out conveyancing. A number of firms of solicitors have branch offices dotted around Nottingham. Many of them offer services in deprived and under-privileged areas. In reply to my asking one firm what would happen if it lost 50 per cent. of its conveyancing work, it said:

"competition from Banks and Building Societies could seriously affect the service we provide to the public in the area concerned. I give as an example details of percentages at our Bulwell Office; for the nine months to September, 1984, 50 per cent. of our work is conveyancing which produces 72 per cent. of our costs; legal aid work accounts for 24 per cent. but the costs from that only amount to 12 per cent.

This legally aided litigation work as you would imagine consists of a good deal of matrimonial and criminal work with other civil work included, e.g. accident claims. If the organisations mentioned above were to reduce the level of our conveyancing work then clearly we would not be in a position to provide the service we do now."

That is the most important point in the whole issue about banks and building societies.

Mr. Weetch: The hon. Gentleman is talking about the cross-subsidy that exists in a solicitor's office. Does he believe it fair that a young couple struggling to buy a house and pay the conveyancing costs should, through a charge like that, subsidise someone who is undergoing a divorce?

Mr. Ottaway: I am not suggesting that. We have all agreed that conveyancing charges have dropped. That solicitor was saying that if he lost his work, his business would have to shut down. This is a different matter altogether—he will not be offering any service at all. As the firms of solicitors shut, conveyancing practices will become concentrated in the building societies, and the net result will be a reduction in the level of competition.

The profession is not opposed to the Bill. Those who read the letters columns in the Law Society Gazette in 1984 appreciated that many solicitors did not feel hidebound by the stance of the Law Society but were prepared to go out and get business. Many of them were referring to new technology, software programmes and advertising. Indeed, a new lease of life was given to the solicitors' profession, and the hon. Member for Great Grimsby and the Government are to be congratulated on that.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Administration of Justice Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. —[Mr. Neubert.]

Mr. Ottaway: The Attorney-General described the miscellaneous provisions at the end of the Bill as covering a rag-bag of issues, as it were, in that they were all good in principle. Clause 53 is designed to reform arbitration law. Many people involved in arbitration in the City believe that the clause is right in principle but wrong in application. Other provisions in arbitration law provide for a default appointment of an arbitrator, whereas the clause provides for appointment by the court.

As Britain is a worldwide arbitration centre, many arbitrations that take place here concern parties overseas. It will be particularly difficult if one must apply to the court for a default appointment of an arbitrator to serve documents overseas. That will slow up the process and provide extra work for the courts.

I may be told that that issue would be better discussed on Report. I mention it now only because, in a speech yesterday, the Master of the Rolls said that perhaps more emphasis would have to be placed on arbitration to deal with the volume of work that is being experienced in the civil courts. Clause 53 will give the courts more work and will hamper the arbitration process, so it does not seem appropriate in the circumstances.

10.3 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The Bill, the provisions of which I broadly welcome on behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends, is a classic example of the deficiencies of our mode of seeking to introduce law reforms — what one might describe as lawyers' law reforms—in that it is limited in extent and deals with subjects some of which are by no means final in their shape and which, by virtue of their incompleteness, will require our attention before long. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) made much the same point when speaking about part I.

The distinguished legal correspondent of the Financial Times today commented on that in connection with the reform of commercial law and in his article almost despaired of the prospects of this country ever having modern commercial law. With respect to the provision of effective amendments to the law governing legal services, the same sort of criticism could be made when one recalls that some of the recommendations of the Evershed committee in 1953, which have commanded widespread support, both among the legal profession and those who represent consumers, still have not been implemented.

The time has come to ask whether we are approaching legislation in these areas in the most effective way. Many of these issues might best be dealt with by a new mode of legislation involving extensive pre-legislative committee hearings, so that a broad measure of consensus could be arrived at, thus avoiding measures of this kind clogging up the legislative machinery of the House. I say this by way of preamble because I am disappointed that the Bill, although long, does not deal with many important matters.

Part I enhances the capacity of the Law Society to deal with complaints against solicitors. This part of the Bill is broadly along the right lines. It is disappointing that the Law Society has not yet received the Coopers and Lybrand report which it initiated. When it does, it may be necessary to look again at the legal framework in which solicitors operate.

Like other hon. Members, I have been struck by the degree of public disquiet at the machinery for making complaints against solicitors. I believe that radical changes are needed. Unless the profession makes the changes itself, the case for an external independent examination of complaints will be strengthened—an examination of the type advocated by the National Consumer Council and a number of other bodies. I have some reservations about that whole hog approach. It would have unfortunate consequences on the organisation of the profession. The Law Society could well become simply a professional trade union, and that would not be in the public interest. Undoubtedly, a larger lay element is desirable, and the Law Society should consider that proposal.

Although I accept the broad framework which has been set out by the Law Society and the Bill, there are some questions about how it will operate in practice. Do the remedies provided fit in with other remedies at law—notably with a damages action for negligence or a solicitor and own client taxation? Let us suppose the Law Society considers that the complaint discloses negligence as well as substandard performance by a solicitor. The wording of the Bill suggests that the client would be advised to take legal action. The legal aid committee might well take a different view and feel that the case did not merit full legal aid.

The Bill's provisions envisage solicitor and own client taxation following a reduction of fees by the Law Society. What is provided is that the bill to be taxed will be the bill as reduced, not as originally presented. If, as a result of taxation, the bill is altered, is the Law Society to alter its determination? That procedure is unlikely to inspire a great deal of confidence. The Bill provides a valuable extension of remedies, but it does not go far enough. There is still no power to award compensation to an aggrieved client.

The Benson committee recommended—perhaps this will be used in terrorem — that a solicitor should undergo some form of compulsory retraining. The Bill does not say anything about the procedures to be exercised by the Law Society. There is a danger that the procedure could be so cumbersome that it would deter potential complainants. The Law Society must address itself to that matter. On the other hand, there is a danger that solicitors will not be able to rely on the procedure. It will be difficult for them to rely upon the independent judgment of the professional purposes committee if its members and staff have already been concerned with the investigation process.

Part II is more complete, and I can give it a more unqualified welcome, notwithstanding the lively and important debate that there has been about the position of banks and building societies. The ending of the property conveyancing cartel, as the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) put it, is broadly welcomed by both sides of the House.

The movement that has been under way since the House Buyers Bill was introduced in 1983 has had a beneficial effect on conveyancing charges. Whether conveyancing is made cheaper and more efficient will depend not just on the establishment of a new profession but on whether important recommendations contained in the Farrand committee's second report are adopted. For example, it proposed that vendors should be required to supply purchasers with replies to local searches and standard preliminary inquiries with the draft contract. I acknowledge that many of the recommendations are detailed. It would be sensible to give effect to them, but they will require major legislation.

That is a further illustration of the point that I made earlier about the desirability of considering alternative means of giving effect to what the House is likely to regard as desirable after careful consideration. It is a pity when the Lord Chancellor has so little time available that the Bill cannot take further the reform of the provision of legal services.

There are one or two matters which it would be desirable and in the interests of the consumers of legal services to include in the Bill. I hope that the Attorney-General will reconsider the case made most powerfully in another place by Lord Foot for granting legal aid in defamation cases. I do not propose to rehearse the cogent arguments that were put forward at some length. It is possible that we are in breach of our obligations under the European Convention on Human Rights—there is a case pending at the moment which may determine the point—by denying access to courts by refusing legal aid in such cases.

I should like to see public funds provided to pay the costs of determining points of law of exceptional importance. That is one of the Evershed committee's proposals which has long commanded the support of consumers of legal services and lawyers.

The Benson commission proposed that where the death or incapacity of a judge interrupted a trial or an appeal, the costs should be reimbursed. That is a highly desirable proposal, which should be considered. It has already been around for long enough without any action having been taken on it.

It will be easy for the Minister when he replies to the debate to say that there are many desirable things which the Government would like to see happen but that they cannot all be encompassed in one Bill. I accept that that is a procedural block, but I hope that the Government and those responsible for the machinery of law reform will apply their minds to how to bring about such changes without having to wait, in some cases, for decades.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) and the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) have seen their legislative offspring legitimated by subsequent adoption by the Government. Notwithstanding its new-won respectability, they seem to have reservations about its status. I hope that they will eventually become reconciled to its position and will not, like disappointed fathers, as they seemed to suggest at one stage, either disinherit it or show their disenchantment any further.

I wish to speak not about that aspect but about part I. I am one of those people who have reported a solicitor to the Law Society. The last time I sat as a recorder at the Old Bailey a case was not ready for trial due to the incompetence of a solicitor. He had been similarly incompetent a month earlier in the same case. On that occasion another judge had granted an adjournment and had ordered him to pay the cost thrown away. After I heard what he had to say in chambers, I once again ordered him to pay the costs thrown away and reported him to the Law Society. I await the outcome ot that complaint.

I shall say nothing about the individual case, but it highlights a number of problems that can occur. First of all, defending counsel is unlikely to feel that he is in a position to report a solicitor to the Law Society. Prosecuting counsel and the prosecuting solicitor would hardly feel it appropriate to do so. The defendants were only too pleased to see yet again that their case had been adjourned. If a judge is not to report a solicitor, who can? If the matter is not to be dealt with effectively by the Law Society, who can possibly consult the public interest? If at the end of the day the new procedure does not give satisfaction, I might be a more receptive audience to the private Solicitors (Independent Complaints Procedure) Bill tabled by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs).

There should be no need for dissatisfaction, provided the new provisions in part I are implemented imaginatively. The Master of the Rolls has power under schedule 1 to appoint to the new tribunal people who are not solicitors. In view of the public misgivings created by the Glanville Davies case, I hope he will not shrink from doing that. If we find that the undoubted improvements embodied in part I of the Bill do not allay public misgiving, we will have to come back to the matter, but I think the time is not yet ripe for that.

There has already been an effect on the level of conveyancing fees. As so often in respect of cutting conveyancing fees, Leicester leads the way. We have heard of fees elsewhere being cut by 30 per cent. My inquiries reveal that in Leicester conveyancing fees have been cut by as much as 50 per cent. That is by no means uncommon. I am sure that the hon. Member for Great Grimsby would like to be able to claim that his Bill was responsible for that. If I could give him credit for achieving that objective, I would assuredly give it, but my researches among solicitors reveal that their view is that it is a change in the rules about advertising that has caused a fall in conveyancing fees. When one of their regular customers comes in wanting to have them act for him in house conveyancing, he says, "You have been my family solicitor for years but I see from reading the Mercury last week that Mr. Jones round the corner can do it for £145. I don't expect you will be charging much more, will you?" That sort of argument is very difficult to reject, and I understand that it has been one of the principal reasons for a fall in conveyancing fees, which the public find so acceptable.

I can say to anyone who is thinking of evaluating the joys of Leicester that not only do we have a large reservoir of owner-occupied housing available; we also have some of the cheapest conveyancing fees in the country.

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): I oppose the Bill, and in doing so I want to concentrate on part II, which deals with the reform of conveyancing. But before I do that I should like to respond to the right hon. and learned Member for Southport (Sir I. Percival) and also to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer). They both said, "Since you have lost the issue about banks and building societies, please don't go away and sulk about it." Let me assure them that I intend to do no such thing. My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and I will be back to argue the case. This House is a democratic forum. Although things have gone against us on this occasion, that is not the end of the matter, because in the next Session of Parliament there will be a building societies Bill, and the argument will come up afresh.

When the right hon. and learned Member for Southport says to my hon. Friend and myself, "What you both need to do is to come back to this House with your arguments sharpened to present to us", that is absolutely right. We shall be back to argue that case at a later date, because this is the proper place to do it. I for one accept the challenge: I shall be back.

Sir Ian Percival: I take it that the second half of what the hon. Gentleman said is correcting the first half. I certainly did not say, "Don't go away and sulk." I meant to, and did, throw out a challenge: "Come back with the answer about this conflict of interest and it will be very seriously considered."

Mr. Weetch: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is as courteous as ever, and I accept that.

I wish to concentrate on part II of the Bill. As the House knows, I have had a specialist interest in conveyancing matters in the 12 years that I have been in this House. I have fought the old monopoly very hard because I quickly came to the conclusion, when I thought about it years ago, that what was needed in this area of legal services was a good dose of free competition, and that the sooner we had it the better. I believed that that would find a responsive echo on the other side of the House, but not in all places, for there is a dichotomy of philosophy. There are many hon. Members who believe in free enterprise and many others who believe in the old restrictive practices that the legal profession had yesterday, and still has today. That is an interesting situation in itself.

Before I come to part II, I want to say that I am not at all satisfied with part I, and particularly clause 1, which centres on the discipline of solicitors. Broadly speaking, I believe that clause 1 has missed a very good opportunity to bring about some valuable and far-reaching reform. That clause has missed the boat.

We should now be looking for an approach that separates professional disciplining of solicitors from the framework of the Law Society. It is no longer a satisfactory state of affairs that the solicitors' own professional body, which can be expected to take a partial approach in these matters, should be the body responsible for adjudicating what are adequate professional services and whether certain actions of professional conduct should be disciplined in the public interest. I shall have a great deal more to say about that in Committee. I do not want to develop the argument at this stage. Let me just say that this part of the Bill is totally inadequate as it stands.

The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, South talked about respectability. The efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby have achieved respectability. As we are on the theme of respectability, I want to do the respectable thing and choose for the theme of my speech on part II, part of the editorial of The Times of Friday 3 May. One cannot be more respectable than to quote The Times leader in one's favour. It states:

"with the exception of some aspects of trade union behaviour being subjected to new legal inhibitions, the professions and all those other vested interests carry on largely intact."

I wish to oppose part II. Paradoxically enough, in opposing it, I agree with the main aims of the Government, underlying the whole of part II. Broadly speaking, the Government propose to bring more competition to bear on the current conveyancing system, so that house transfer is more cost effective, cheaper and expeditious. In detail, that is to be done by widening the categories of persons who can conveyance property. Having widened the source of supply, prices will eventually come down. That will occur in tandem with encouraging the use of computer technology and structural reform. Those matters are outside the scope of the Bill. Nevertheless, they are widely understood.

Let me concede at the start that in trying to bring that about, the Government have had a difficult task. Such legislation inevitably has to strike a balance between protection and competition, between the old world of legal professionalism and the new opportunities of beneficial commercialism. Unfortunately, the Government have struck the balance in the wrong place. The Bill has too much of the old world and not enough of the new, so much so that it offers very little reform at all.

Let me analyse why that is so. I was not trained as a lawyer; I was trained as an economist, and I look at the problems like that. I look at bringing about a reduction in costs and prices for the benefit of the consumer. I have read the Bill carefully. In the first place, it does nothing to create, promote or safeguard any meaningful competitive structure in conveyancing services. In the long run it does not. Quite the contrary. The Bill has done much to reverse the gains painfully made at common law to break section 22 of the Solicitors Act 1974 which, when I was beginning my struggle against it, was section 20 of the old Solicitors Act 1957. While on the one hand it narrowly widens the class of persons who can provide conveyancing services for fee, gain or reward, that means nothing other than allowing a limited number of outsiders to join the club. In return for that largely illusory improvement, there are very real disadvantages.

The most overwhelming disadvantage is that whereas the solicitors' monopoly currently applies to just one small link in the purchasing chain—preparing and drawing up the transfer deed — under the Bill the monopoly provisions will cover the preparation of the contract for sale and all the other ancillary procedures. A few years after I came to the House in 1976, the famous case of the Property Tranfer Association v. the Law Society decided that all ancillary procedures were free from the monopoly and that only the transfer deed, which often amounted to no more than filling in the blanks on a standard form, was covered by the monopoly. Under this loud-sounding nothing of a Bill, the consumer will have cut the monopolistic ropes only to acquire chains. The Benson proposals, widely regarded as whitewash at the time, have come to pass.

Secondly, there is too much professional superstructure in part II. There is too much clutter, too much regulation and not enough simplicity. If the Department of Trade and Industry is following the Bill at all, for God's sake let it step in now and try to make some alterations. The new Council for Licensed Conveyancers is a pale copy of the old Law Society. We have seen it before. Its better half is just down the road in Chancery Lane and it has been responsible for many years for the unjust burden of conveyancing charges which has been a blight on owner-occupiers for far too long. I note in passing that there is to be no common council for all who do conveyancing. A conveyancing council ought to cover all conveyancers, but there are to be separate arrangements for licensed conveyancers and for solicitors, thus ensuring that the new council is not just a carbon copy of the Law Society but a permanent poor relation. No doubt that was the intention from the start. I have no doubt, however, that the new poor relation will soon be aping its professional better and entrenching its own restrictive practices as quickly as possible, as professional councils always do. I have always regarded professional bodies of this kind as, in part at least, conspiracies against the layman.

My third criticism relates to a more basic weakness. The Government have put the cart before the horse. They have created a ton of professional machinery before there is any adequate job description or any settled idea of what conveyancers will be asked to do in the future. Everyone is saying that change is in the air with wider use of computers and information technology and improved procedures. Even more fundamental changes may be on the way. I know that the Government are seriously considering how Departmental practices can be changed to achieve greater expedition in these services. As an eternal optimist, I am absolutely certain that in the course of time this will lead to a technical simplification of the whole process of conveyancing so that the qualification needed will be minimal. The absurdity is that in the Bill the Government have built up a monolith of machinery, with all the bits and pieces that go with it, which technical change will render completely irrelevant within a fairly short time.

My fourth criticism — the crowning irony — is that, having erected this elaborate superstructure to ensure that everyone is properly qualified, the Bill sells the pass even before it gets into part II. Clause 5 actually makes it easier for unqualified people to do the work than was the position previously. Unqualified people can now do the work provided they are employees, partners or employers of those entitled to transfer property.

One of the abiding abuses of conveyancing over a long time has been the fact that one has paid for a qualified solicitor to do the work while up and down the country one gets his clerk instead. I would like to count the number of letters from solicitors' clerks who tell me that they have been doing the job for 10, 15, 20 and 30 years without supervision.

There has never been any case law on this subject. A friend of mine, who will now be called a licensed conveyancer, brought a case but it was stopped half way because one of the parties died. As a result, no case law exists on the record to say whether or not it is legal for an unqualified person to do the job. But I can now tell everyone who is unqualified, "Do not worry. They will no longer catch up with you because it is now legal under clause 5."

Two things have emerged from this. First, the consumer has paid monopolistic conveyancing charges to a solicitor but got the services of ancillaries in return. Secondly, and this is one of the great ironies, although the Law Society has always argued that properly qualified people should do the conveyancing, it never really cared whether Joe Soap did it so long as the qualified people took the profit from the transaction. That accounts for my cynical view of conveyancing over the years.

I am not the only person who suspects this legislation. On 5 April, The Sunday Times carried an article on the Director General of Fair Trading, who is legally charged with looking at competitive conditions, and I know that over the years he has been interested in conveyancing. That report stated:

"Sir Gordon backed up complaints by the non-lawyer conveyancers themselves that the Bill will not do much to increase competition. This is because the mechanism for licensing conveyancers will be so rigid"—

That is the word I have been looking for since rising to my feet. The Bill is not flexible enough—

"that few non-lawyers will qualify. While he applauds the Bill's aim to protect the consumer he said that this was being achieved at 'the potential cost of erecting barriers which might be high enough to prevent many adequately qualified conveyancers from entering the field'."

That is particularly relevant given that conveyancing as a technical practice will become simpler rather than more complicated.

I wish to answer two points that have emerged from the debate. This is a debating chamber, and I listened carefully to what was said. First, scores of people have written to me since I had a letter published in The Times in which I set out my objections to the Bill. I felt that I had to do so because I have supported reform for so long that when it came, and it was the wrong sort, I thought it was incumbent on me to explain myself. I had scores of letters saying, "You are wrong. You have got the wrong end of the stick". The same has been said today, so I shall try to explain myself.

It is said that there already is more competition. I agree, but for how long will it last? The price of conveyancing used to be about 1·25 per cent. of purchase or sale. The fees have dropped. Conveyancing for any size of house can now be £120. I have even seen fees below £100. That is not altogether healthy. There should be a fair price for the job, not a ruinously low one.

I have been told not to worry and that, like spring, competition is in the air and that things will never be the same again. Prices have come down, I admit, but because of factors utterly outside the Bill. The Bill does not safeguard the competitive future. Trying to predict the future is always hazardous, but I believe that present competition is unlikely to last. The scale of charges was abolished in 1972 — the Statutory Instrument was considered in January 1973. When it came in at the end of the last century, the scale of charges was heralded as a competitive miracle. Nobody would be overcharged, it was said, as maximum charges were set down by law. What started as a maximum became a minimum because of restrictive practices and those who went outside the minimum were hammered under the professional rules.

The long-term results of this reform will not be the safeguarding of competition either. I follow changes in the conveyancing world closely, and wonder whether competition really is in the air. Two of the most promising approaches to bringing conveyancing into the 20th century by solicitors have come from groups of youngsters anxious for change and to reduce costs. Good luck to them. I refer to the Homebuyers Group and the Conveyancing Exchange. I have read their literature, learnt their aims, examined their ideas and spoken to some of the people involved. I am impressed by how they have tried to harness the benefits of marketing, attractive packaging and streamlined organisation and advertised benefits for the consumer. That is how the profession should respond to the new position.

What of the Law Society? Apart from the fact that the Bill started in bad faith which has soured my attitude to it, it depresses me. In a debate in the other place the Lord Chancellor, who was talking about clause 1, but who could have been talking about any part of the Bill, because his speech on part II was exactly the same, said that clause 1 "was demanded by the solicitors' profession itself through the Law Society, which is its accredited representative with my office."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 January 1985; Vol. 458, c. 824.]

I detect the influence of the Law Society in almost every stage of the Bill. I shall produce chapter and verse in Committee to argue that the consultation that took place with consumer organisations was perfunctory.

The Law Society has not only had a malevolent influence but is, at this very moment, trying to stifle the competition being created. The New Law Journal of 10 May refers to the Homebuyers Group and the Conveyancing Exchange, which represent people who are looking for new ideas, and trying to make an entry into the market in a controlled streamlined and low-cost way. It states:

"The Homebuyers Group are complaining that they have received no response from the Law Society since submitting details of its scheme over ten weeks ago. This bodes badly for any speedy resolution of outstanding questions."

We may talk of competition, but outside there are powerful counterforces. The same counterforces have had a deadening effect on the Bill.

If I have not made an argument against the Bill in the time that I have had at my disposal, it is no one's fault but my own. I sit down, as I stood up—I oppose the Bill and I shall do so, if I am fortunate enough to be selected for the Standing Committee.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): I give a cautious welcome to the Bill. Perhaps I should say that I have no current financial interest to declare. My interest is based on past experience.

I have some sympathy with the comments on part I by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). My only regret is that part I does not extend to other so-called professions, such as estate agents and accountants. Hon. Members may receive many complaints about the behaviour of solicitors, but I am sure that many hon. Members will agree that those complaints are matched by complaints about estate agents and accountants, especially when they have managed to get their hands on a deposit or money belonging to a client from another source and have deducted exorbitant charges from it. I accept that the Bill cannot deal with that, but it is a comment worth making.

The impression given earlier was that part II was the first stage of trying to break down the solicitors' monopoly on conveyancing. It is not a first stage, but a further measure in a long series of events and happenings.

Restrictions on undertaking conveyancing on property for reward were introduced in the early part of the 19th century. My recollection does not go back that far, but I remember speaking to an experienced solicitor in 1967, who related a story about conveyancing in Leicester before the second world war. He was an articled clerk at the time. His principal had a completion to do in Loughborough, which is about 15 miles from Leicester. The completion was in the afternoon, so the solicitor took the morning train to Loughborough, booked into a nearby hotel, had lunch, did the completion in the afternoon, stayed the night in the hotel, and got the train back to Leicester the next day. Of course, the client footed the bill for his journey and expenses, as well as paying his fee.

We have moved a long way since then. When I started as an articled clerk, scale fees were in force. Their effect was that charges were high and profits from conveyancing —there is no need to beat about the bush on this—were also high. But with the abolition of scale fees, an element of competition was introduced. Although solicitors were then free to charge as they wished, although they could not advertise, this started the practice, which has accelerated ever since, where by clients would telephone all the solicitors in an area and find out what their prices were. They would even quote the price obtained from one solicitor to another in the hope that he could meet or undercut it. For at least 10 years, conveyancing fees have been decreasing.

The problem is that, for a long time, many solicitors have used conveyancing work to subsidise other areas of activity. Although I accept that the bill is not the vehicle to put things right, I hope that in due course it will be noted that solicitors are still grossly underpaid for court work. After I was admitted in the early 1970s, I remember clearly a man coming in off the streets, bringing with him a summons for speeding, and asking me whether I would represent him. His family solicitor had said that he did not do court work, which was unprofitable; he did only conveyancing. To some extent, that is still the case today. Many solicitors are not paid an adequate return when undertaking court work, especially court work that is paid for by the state under the legal aid scheme. Far too many solicitors still see conveyancing as a means of subsidising other work. I hope that that will not continue.

The greater freedom of recent years, whereby solicitors are allowed to advertise, has given a further impetus to competition. I do not share the views of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch), who said that the Bill had done nothing to lower solicitors' costs. Of course it has not. It is still a Bill, and not yet an Act of Parliament. History will show that his conclusion on this point was wrong. If, as I hope, the Bill is enacted, the setting up of licensed conveyancers will inject an additional element of competition. I hope that it will do so without sacrificing consumer protection.

It is right to sound a warning. We are talking about protecting the public and ensuring that they get a reasonably priced service and a job done properly. After all, buying one's home is probably the biggest transaction in one's life. It is not correct to draw the analogy of a shopper going from one supermarket to another and buying a tin of beans at the lowest price. We are talking about a transaction that requires skill, judgment and ability, and those who seek to dismiss the fact that those who carry out conveyancing must have some training and expertise are making an incorrect judgment.

I notice that many of the detailed safeguards are left to be dealt with by rules to be made by the Council for Licensed Conveyancers, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor. It will be important to ensure, for the protection of the public, that conveyancers are both experienced and qualified to carry out the work, and I am concerned to see that this is what happens. Will my right hon. and learned Friend tell the House whether the final scheme will ultimately come back to the House for parliamentary approval? I hope that that is to be the case.

I have serious reservations about banks and building societies being allowed to undertake conveyancing work. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby, who unfortunately is not here, and the hon. Member for Ipswich have said that we should not be concerned about this because many solicitors already carry out work for their client and for the building society at the same time. The fact that a solicitor may be getting two fees on what is essentially the same transaction does not necessarily mean that there is a conflict of interest.

The danger in allowing banks and building societies to undertake conveyancing work is that their prime aim is to see that a loan is taken out at the rate of interest that they are charging. If someone is employed full-time for a bank or building society, the interest that he is looking after on its behalf will conflict with the interest of his client. The client needs to be advised not only as to whether good title can be deduced to the property, but on whether he can afford to take out a loan of that size, and whether the property is what he wants, and all sorts of ancillary questions. There is a real danger of a conflict of interest if banks and building societies are allowed to carry out that work.

With those reservations, I welcome the Bill.

10.57 pm

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I listened carefully to the Attorney-General when he dealt with part I. I thought that he was altogether too full of praise for the Law Society. His attitude was so uncritical that he described a Law Society rather far removed from the experience of many hon. Members and members of the public.

The Law Society is obviously aware that it is the subject of a great deal of public criticism. That must be why it commissioned the Coopers and Lybrand report. Therefore, I wonder why we are dealing with legislation instigated by the Law Society to make changes to the methods by which complaints are looked at, and the powers of the Law Society in relation to that.

It is likely that the further work that Coopers and Lybrand is carrying out will overtake what we shall do through the Bill. We may wish that we had not embarked on part I until the investigation carried out on behalf of the Law Society has been completed. Would it not be better to wait for the Law Society to complete this process before deciding on reforming legislation on the complaints procedure?

I cannot help feeling that it might be better to drop part I and await the results of the full investigation by Coopers and Lybrand, and then decide how to proceed. I do not suppose that the Attorney-General will accede to that request, but he must agree that there is at least some logic in it, as he may find it embarrassing to put this legislation through and find it overtaken by events.

I would have thought that the Law Society did not have that impressive a track record in this area. A few months ago I introduced a Bill under the ten-minute procedure to deal with complaints against solicitors and to set up an entirely independent system. The publicity that the Bill attracted resulted in my being swamped by an avalanche of letters from people throughout this country and abroad. They were concerned about how the Law Society had handled, or failed to handle, their complaints.

Although I am sure that some of the complaints had little or no foundation, others appeared to be compelling in their criticisms. They came from the rich and the poor and from those whose very lives had been shattered by their experiences. They had an enormous sense of grievance and injustice. It made me feel that the results of the survey, which was quoted earlier, were amply backed by those letters. Quite unusually, not one person wrote to me complaining about or disagreeing with my stand in the Bill. The measure was approved by the House, but it is now stuck in the system—as is the fate of so many private Members' Bills introduced under that system.

However, there was one rather amusing by-product. Sir David Napley, an eminent member of the legal profession and a past president of the Law Society, gave a lecture in February this year for the 1985 Conkerton memorial lecture at the University of Liverpool. It was abbreviated in the Law Society's Gazette on Wednesday 20 March. It is the only answer from anyone to do with the Law Society to the request for an independent method of dealing with complaints.

Sir David Napley said:

"The latest attack on the profession comes from some left-wing Member of Parliament."

I take that as a compliment. He went on:

"He has promoted a Private Member's Bill designed to take the powers to deal with complaints against solicitors away from the profession and into the hands of a statutory independent body."

That is accurate so far. He then said—and he goes on the attack:

"Would his time not be better spent in promoting such a body to deal with the public's complaints against Members of Parliament?"

He is talking about all of us, including you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. He continued:

"Here is a body of people, of whom, on entering politics, no training, skill, learning or expertise is required; who are not required to demonstrate or maintain particular standards of integrity; who are subject to no disciplinary process for the management of either their constituents' affairs, or the public generally."

In other words, if it is impossible to answer the case against the Law Society, why not attack the people who are making it and have a good go at Members of Parliament? We are pretty thick skinned, so that does not really matter. All is fair in this activity.

However, Sir David went on to say:

"One recognises that the affair of Glanville Davies and the mistakes which were made poured ammunition into the laps of our enemies."

He can say that again:

"But that apart the profession's record for integrity, probity and ethical conduct generally stands very high. Just as one swallow does not make a summer, so one storm does not make a winter."

I suggest that there he has pretentions to enter the world of literature. He continued:

"The professions' record for doing the right thing should, when they are attacked, be compared by the public with the politicians' record for doing the wrong thing."

No doubt our debate this evening will attract similar attacks.

I welcome the fact that part I contains some improvements in the methods of investigating complaints and the public being given redress. In particular, I welcome the provision for the repayment of fees. Nevertheless, I want to make six criticisms of the proposed system. The first has been mentioned by other hon. Members, but I make no apology for referring to it again. It is that the Law Society inevitably must have a conflict of interest between its duty to defend the profession and its duty to help members of the public when they have a sense of grievance against the profession. I do not see how that conflict of interest can be reconciled, and it certainly is not reconciled in part I.

Secondly, I regret that the powers given to the Law Society in part I are permissive. The society will still have the option of deciding not to proceed with a complaint, and it may take that decision on very wide grounds indeed.

Thirdly under the Bill—this point has not been made so far—the Law Society is given no general obligation to help the complainant. It does not have that obligation now, and the society's booklet is not particularly helpful. When writing to me about the matter generally, people have commented time and again that they feel that the Law Society has not helped them.

Complaining against a member of a profession is difficult, because the average person does not have the necessary skill or knowledge and the Law Society can too easily dismiss a complaint. If the society is to be left with this responsibility—I would prefer it not to be left with it—it should accept a general responsibility to give advice and help to complainants.

Fourthly, the Bill still leaves too many points at which complaints will be handled, if they are handled at all. I should prefer to have one focus for complaints so that the average person may know that if he or she goes there, the complaint, under whatever heading it might be categorised, will be investigated.

Fifthly, I regret that there is no provision for an arbitration scheme dealing with negligence when the sums involved are relatively small. My Bill suggested £2,000. It is too difficult and costly for the public to go to law to try to sue solicitors for negligence when the sums involved are small. They may be important to the people concerned, but they can be described as relatively small in the context of claims of this type. the procedure is too cumbersome when it permits the public simply to be told, "You have the right only to go to court." A simple arbitration scheme would be beneficial.

Sixthly, the Law Society should have a general responsibility to be more forthcoming about the complaints that it receives and what it does with them. The council's report for 1983-84 contains, at page 21, a brief mention, under the heading "Professional Purposes Committee," of the number of inquiries and complaints received. The Law Society has a duty to us and the public to be more forthcoming about the nature of complaints, the way in which they were handled and the outcome.

Although I am no supporter of the present method of dealing with complaints against the police, at least the Police Complaints Board—the successor body to which will, I am sure, do the same—analyses complaints and gives some information about what is going on. The law Society should do likewise, otherwise we shall continue to argue in the dark, as it were, not fully knowing the nature or outcome of complaints.

I would prefer, however, an independent system. I am not certain that we shall manage to achieve that by tabling amendments in Committee. At the very least, the Law Society should be more responsive and sensitive to the criticisms that have been expressed, and I hope that some of the points that I have made will find favour with the Minister.

11.8 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I welcome the Bill, with some reservations. I shall confine my remarks to part II, which deals with licensed conveyancing, and at the outset I declare my interest. I am a solicitor, and for about 10 years I have been a legal adviser to the Institute of Legal Executives. I played some part in the preparation of evidence to the Farrand committee. I am also a legal adviser to the Society of Company and Commercial Accountants Limited.

The Institute of Legal Executives and its members have played a significant role in the practice and development of the law for decades. It can trace its origins back as far as the 1890s. For almost 100 years, by competent practice, experience and examination, members of the institute have been involved in and engaged in the conveyancing of land in solicitors' offices. The institute was represented on the Farrand committee. For decades it has provided high standards of education, training and examination. The institute welcomes the Bill in principle and its general objectives, but hopes that in Committee it will be amended in a number of respects.

Part II will allow persons who are not solicitors to convey land. The protection of lay members of the public seeking advice from the new licensed conveyancers will depend upon the balance which the Bill strikes between the virtues of competition—but not a free-for-all—and the requirement of competence. The more home owners there are the better, but they must be sure that the purchase of their homes is properly conducted and with effective and full title. Conveyancing is not by any means as simple a transaction as some advocates of licensed conveyancing may suggest.

Part II provides for the establishment of a council for licensed conveyancers. Of concern, however, is the lack of criteria to be laid down by or through Parliament as to what the standards of competence and professional conduct of the licensed conveyancer should be in order to secure adequate protection for the consumer. Should this be left simply to the council and the Lord Chancellor under clause 34, as the Bill provides, or should Parliament retain more direct control over the rules, prescribing standards of training and education by way of statutory instrument?

The radical nature of part II is perhaps overlooked. The house buyer and, at present, purchasers of other interests in land, will be significantly at risk if the standards are found to be inadequate. Insurance will be no compensation, if things go wrong, for those who have lost their home. I am not suggesting that things do not go wrong from time to time under the present arrangements, but with this significant departure from the general rule that only solicitors may convey land. I think that public confidence must be maintaned in the new conveyancers or the Bill will fail in its main objectives.

A similar argument applies to the setting up of the disciplinary committees under clauses 20 and 21, to the code of conduct to be provided under clause 16, to the provision for indemnity and compensation under clause 17, to the accounts which are to be provided for under clause 18 and to interest on client's money under clause 19.

I accept that there must be a degree of flexibility and that it would be unnecessary for every aspect of standards and conduct to be tightly regulated by Parliament, but some retention of control, even as a long stop, is required. I have in mind provisions similar to those in section 27 of the Insurance Brokers (Registration) Act 1977, which reserves to the Secretary of State, after consulting the Insurance Brokers Registration Council, power to approve and vary by statutory instrument, subject to the annulment procedure, rules relating to the code of conduct and other matters such as the method of running bank accounts and the holding of moneys. The making of the rules under that Act is not by way of statutory instrument, but the rules come into effect only when approved by order of the Secretary of State, by statutory instrument.

It will not do for persons to argue that in practice this will not amount to much control. The scrutiny of such instruments in draft is available to the House and may be enforced, especially if the rules are pubished in draft before hand for consultation. Adopting a system along those lines will help to avoid unnecessary mistakes, especially in the initial stages of the development of the profession.

The Institute of Legal Executives already has in place a syllabus and well-developed and tried examinations. It is to be hoped that this will be found to be the most suitable course of study available to those who seek to acquire and develop the professional skills which they will be, or should be, required to have. The quality of service properly to be expected of a licensed conveyancer ought to be that at least of the average of his class, including properly qualified solicitors and fellows of the Institute of Legal Executives.

I am puzzled about why intervention by the council in a licensed conveyancer's practice is apparently unrelated to tests of competence. I accept that there are provisions to control accounts and money under clauses 18 and 19. However, undue delay under schedule 4, paragraph 3 is no more important than incompetence or negligence, and I do not see why intervention by the council should be so selective. Why should not failure to comply with any of the rules lead to intervention?

I notice that under clause 18(4) only so-called "qualified" accountants would be qualified to give accountants' reports on licensed conveyancers' accounts. Licensed conveyancers will often not be limited liability companies, and I should like an assurance that there will be no discrimination against members of the Society of Company and Commercial Accountants by a denial to those of them who are in public practice of the opportunity to make reports on the accounts of licensed conveyancers.

It is ironic that, unsupported by European Community law or anything other than apparent convenience, a provision is included in the Bill which specifically enlarges the freedom of choice to seek professional advice from the legal profession, but which at the same time restricts the freedom of licensed conveyancers to choose their accountants from any firm other than one whose members come from one of the chartered bodies, and a limited range of other authorised accountants, by employing a formula for selection derived from company legislation which will not apply to many, if not most, licensed conveyancers. I should be glad to have an assurance that such discrimination will not be enacted.

Finally, I should be pleased to receive an assurance from my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General that banks and building societies will not be allowed to provide conveyancing services.

In most other material respects I welcome the Bill and support it.

11.16 pm

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): I am sure that I shall be encouraged by both sides of the House to curtail my remarks. I have little to add to what my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said. I am grateful to the Attorney-General for his clarification of the Bill.

Part I which relates to the discipline of solicitors is welcome as far as it goes. The tragedy is that it does not go far enough. There is enormous public interest in the profession and a substantial amount of taxpayers' money — a subject warm to the hearts of Conservative Members—is infused into the profession year by year.

The Law Society is the progenitor of these proposals. I ask myself whether they represent the Law Society's thinking now or more accurately its thinking 18 months ago.

The impression I have is that, in addition to the fact that the proposals contained in the Bill are inadequate, the timing is inopportune, because since the Lord Chancellor won a place in the legislative timetable — I suspect sometime last July — for one of his little ewe lambs, matters have moved forward. We have had the interim paper commissioned by the Law Society from Coopers and Lybrand. I shall not weary the House by retailing the nuggets of information that have been revealed from that report. It is clear, however, from a perusal of paragraph after paragraph, that the majority view of people and organisations which have been interviewed by Coopers and Lybrand is that a radical rather than a cautious approach is required.

There is a substantial view that whatever process of investigation of complaints is set up, it should be seen to sufficiently independent of the representational role of the Law Society. That is the point which remains unsatisfied.

Without repeating the points that have been made time after time in the debate, I must pose again the question that will still be asked by the general public — how can a body like the Law Society, which has as its first and bounden duty to look after the professional interests of its members, have an adjudicatory role regarding complaints against its members?

Those roles are incompatible. The public will never be satisfied unless and until there is a division between the trade union function and the investigatory function of the Law Society. One of the matters Coopers and Lybrand pinpoints is how different are the arrangements in the medical profession, for example, where there is a division between the investigative and adjudicatory role and the representational role.

These proposals are untimely. Circumstances have changed. The proposals will satisfy no one. We will be coming back before many more years to set up yet another piece of machinery. Given that the Law Society maintains its concern and has commissioned at great expense Coopers and Lybrand to investigate certain aspects of its position, I wonder whether it is yet too late in the day for this part of the Bill to be withdrawn, for there to be more reflection and for us to have before us a more stable arrangement under which justice could be seen to be done regarding investigation on the one hand and the representation of members on the other.

I cannot see how both functions can be carried out by the same body in such a way as to satisfy the basic criterion of justice being seen to be done. Therefore, the proposals are inopportune. They will be short-lived and as sure as night follows day we will be returning within a matter of years to discuss more stable, more permanent, more effective and more acceptable proposals to ensure that the concern which undoubtedly exists about complaints is properly met. That is my prophecy, and I stand by it.

As regards licensed conveyancers, my hon. Friends the Members for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) can feel proud of the fact that their efforts have resulted in the monopoly being broken. I set out my views in the debate on the Bill tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby. My interest is to ensure that house transfers are made cheaper and simpler. No doubt my hon. Friend is pleased that one of his ambitions has been achieved.

The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) pointed out that advertising in itself and the abandonment of the tariff have brought down costs. With the aid of those two factors and perhaps the catalyst of my hon. Friend's activities, we have gone a great deal of the way to make house transfer cheaper and simpler.

We are only beginning on this road. As in so many instances of law reform we have seen what has happened in Scotland. As I understand it, solicitors are now allowed to set up property centres. They will undoubtedly move more and more into that field. We shall see whether solicitors enter it or whether the Government eventually endorse the commitment repeatedly made by the Solicitor-General in the House, and in particular on 16 December last.

But whether solicitors enter into the property field and the property shop, or whether the provision is eventually extended to banks and building societies, my prime concern, as I said on the Second Reading of my hon. Friend's Bill, is that the conflict of interest remains. It is not a point that is canvassed in the interests of solicitors; it is a point to be canvassed on behalf of the consumer. Having said that, I welcome the work that has been done by the National Consumer Council to try to resolve that problem. The difficulty it faced was in preparing its work in a vacuum. Until one knows the Government's proposals it is difficult to reach a proper judgment on whether the issue is resolved or not; but it is an important issue.

I praise what has been done already to make house transfers cheaper. I welcome the breaking of the monopoly. But on the most important commercial transaction affecting most people in the land, it is of the utmost importance that as consumers they are well served. I look forward to seeing how the Government deal with that question. I understand that the consultations have been about method. Many of us were not entirely clear about what the Attorney-General said. I am sure that the Solicitor-General will want to add something to make it clear. There have been conflicting reports in the newspapers. It is the Government who made the commitment, and we shall be interested in seeing and studying the results of the battle that is going on between the Lord Chancellor on the one hand and Industry and Environment Ministers on the other.

One of the results of the deliberations in the other place has been the dropping of the original clause 43. The purpose of the clause was to deprive those who sought the help of the courts in judicial reviews; they would have lost their right of appeal. In the other place their Lordships rendered signal service, as they did the other day in regard to the Attorney-General's reference on sentences.

The two proposals emanating from the Lord Chancellor's Department have lacked friends, therefore one wonders at the judgment of those in the Department. These are not party political issues but issues that have been canvassed and found wanting after considerable deliberation.

We shall look closely at the proposals concerning legal aid. The Bill has not, however, dealt with the funding of law centres and their plight. The Lord Chancellor tries to wash his hands of the law centres. He has stated that he has no statutory authority to fund them. With the limitation of expenditure by local authorities, we fear the closing down of the law centres; certainly we shall not see the expansion that many of us would like to see. The battle will continue as to who is to fund the law centres, whether it is the urban aid programme, the Lord Chancellor's Department or some other source. If Ministers are unwilling to take over the sponsorship of existing and future law centres, we shall return to that matter in Committee. I hope that we shall be able to get over the hurdle which seems to depress the Lord Chancellor and deprive him of the will that the needs to ensure that law centres are extended.

I could have gone on for a long time, but I think that I have canvassed some of the main issues that cause concern to me. In due course we shall return to them in more detail in Committee.

11.30 pm

The Attorney-General: I should start with the points that were made by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). I notice that his ally in practically every other way, the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch), did not share those expressions of annoyance and irritation, and even had a feeling of being let down.

Much time has been spent on what is not in the Bill, for example, the position of employed solicitors. Reference has been made not only to the letter written by the Solicitor-General but to the written answer by my hon. and learned Friend on 17 February. It is important that I should spend a moment or two going through what was set out in that long written answer to see what has been achieved.

We established the Farrand committee. The composition was agreed with the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, and, I think, the hon. Member for Ipswich, too. There were two limbs in the terms of reference. Farrand reported on time in September, which was very quick. The second limb was the report in January this year. Both reports were published. We said that we would bring forward legislation in the 1984-85 Session, and here it is in the Bill.

The second report, which was in great detail, is now being carefully considered. We said that we would discuss with the Law Society the scope for amending its rules against advertising, and advertising is now permitted, and widespread. We said that we would institute a wide-ranging review of the system of house transfer, seeking to identify ways to simplify and speed it up. That report was published today by the Department of the Environment. We said that we would speed up the extension of land registration and make additional manpower available, and that is well in train. Therefore, we have done a great deal on those matters.

I have been asked not only by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, the father of this part of the legislation, but by the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), about part II. The only way that I can make clear what the Government's and my view is, is to repeat what I said about three hours ago. It remains our intention to legislate in the next Session with regard to the position of employed solicitors working for banks, building societies and other institutions. That obviously means estate agents and such like. The form of that legislation will take into account the need to protect consumers against prejudice resulting from any conflict of interest and will be drafted in the light of our recent consultations on that subject. That is all that can be said.

I read again today the right hon. and learned Gentleman's powerful and effective speech on Second Reading of the private Member's Bill, in which he expressed the view that the Government clearly have in their mind, in saying that we have not yet reached a decision although we undertake to legislate in the next Session of Parliament. With respect, that is as far as we can go.

It is our duty to take account of the need to protect the consumer. Its importance was very much stressed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southport

[The Attorney-General]

(Sir I. Percival). But we shall legislate in the next Session. We are taking full time to consider, in the light of what we have learnt, so that we can see exactly what form it should take. There is no need for those decisions to be rushed because the vehicle for legislation will be available next year, and we want to get it right. I am sure that the anxieties that have been expressed this evening are deeply felt.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, stressed the need to have an entirely independent tribunal. It seems that various parties have been peering into crystal balls to foretell what Coopers and Lybrand will recommend. I do not know what its recommendation will be. As far as I know, it has not even reported to the Law Society as yet. If it recommends an entirely independent tribunal, it will do so against the background of the Government having a completely open mind. A fair amount of work would be involved as there is a great deal of inter-relation between the courts—negligence actions can come into court—and a professional body that is bound to be regulatory and to enforce its own rules. If the consultant's report contains the recommendation that there should be an independent tribunal, the Government will maintain their open mind.

It has been suggested by several of those who have participated in the debate that we are wasting our time with part I, as we may have to throw it overboard in the light of Coopers and Lybrand's recommendation. It would please me more than almost anyone else—I shall have the conduct of the Bill in Committee—if I could get rid of part I. Its consideration in Committee will obviously take a long time. However, I cannot do that. Even if we assume that Coopers and Lybrand will produce such a recommendation and that the mechanics can be properly formulated, as I am sure they can, it will take some time to find the right vehicle to implement it. If we abolish part I, we shall not have the less important improvements that will flow from it. Surely it is better to have them than to have nothing. Even if we have to make changes by legislating again for an independent tribunal, we shall not have wasted our time in Committee by sending to the House a Bill which provides a measure of improvement, if not the great improvement that some believe the independent tribunal would provide. I am entirely open-minded on the issue, and so are the Government.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby is especially concerned about employed solicitors—I feel that I have dealt with that matter to the fullest extent possible—and asked me to take up the issue of building societies making use of licensed conveyancers. The Government intend to table an amendment to the Bill that will facilitate the use of licensed conveyancers by building societies in the same way that societies currently use a panel of solicitors. Every building society has provisions within its rules which allow it to use solicitors. The amendment will ensure that the societies' rules can be changed quickly and easily. I hope that I have met the hon. Gentleman's point satisfactorily.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby was interrupted in the middle of his speech by the hon. Member for Ipswich. He told us that he intended to raise, on the next page as it were, the question of the solicitor who is acting for the purchaser and then acts for the building society. First, the solictor is not employed. The conflict of interest that has always concerned us arises when the employed solicitor has an overriding duty to his employer. That is a problem that we must overcome when we introduce legislation next year. If the solicitor is not employed, he will not have a duty to an employer. Much more important —this is a technicality on which I have been briefed—a solicitor does not act for the building society until the terms of the loan have been agreed. He is thus not acting for both sides when their interests may be in conflict.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) spoke of the negotiations that I have discussed and pointed to the huge powers that the banks and the building societies have upon issues that involve conflicts of interest.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) criticised the commercial law, but the Commercial Courts have been so successful as to be almost embarrassing. As the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East knows, a great many contracts made outside the United Kingdom, in which neither party is British, now specify that the contract should be subject to English law so that the parties can use our splendid Commercial Court system. This has been something of an embarrassment, in that there are now fairly serious delays as a result of the success of the system.

The hon. Gentleman said that part I was broadly on the right lines but that we might have to look at it again in the light of the Coopers and Lybrand recommendations. I think that I have said all that I can on that aspect.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) gave an interesting illumination of why conveyancing fees had gone down, particularly in his area. I can almost see the effect on the old family solicitor in his black coat and striped trousers of the comment, "Young Mr. Jones down the road will do it for £140." I am sure that that is a very effective weapon.

The hon. Member for Ipswich made it clear in his recent letter to The Times that he intended to oppose the Bill. He has said that he will be back again to argue the case, and I welcome that. I emphasise to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and to the whole House that we are not in any way seeking to hold up employed solicitors to protect solicitors. We are doing this because we are concerned about the conflict of interest and we welcome any help from anybody. My door really is always open if anyone wants to come and discuss an effective way of removing the risk of conflict of interest. For example, there is the kind of suggestion made by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General in his letter to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby.

The hon. Member for Ipswich went on to suggest that the tribunal was too much an in-house tribunal. I remind the House that the Solicitors' Disciplinary Tribunal, as opposed to the one that deals with less serious offences, is entirely appointed from members designated by the Master of the Rolls, one third lay people and two thirds from the solicitors' profession.

The hon. Member for Ipswich also said that the Bill did nothing to create a competitive structure, that it was too rigid and cluttered and lacking in simplicity. Interestingly, however, that part of part II was based entirely on the recommendations of Professor Farrand and his committee, which was widely representative of various consumer bodies, including the Consumers Association and the National Consumer Council and a number of very interesting people. That committee's report set out the very terms that we have put into part II and the work of that committee was entirely approved and agreed by the sponsors of the original House Buyers Bill.

There is one thing that one can always say about the hon. Member for Ipswich. There is no way in which his sincerity on this can ever be doubted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) wanted me to undertake that the final scheme would be submitted for parliamentary scrutiny. I am afraid that I cannot give that undertaking, but there is the safeguard that all the rules made by the council must be approved in terms by the Lord Chancellor.

The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), who succeeded in introducing a Bill which then got locked up somewhere, perhaps in the drains of the House, asked me again and perhaps more clearly than anyone else what will be the position if Coopers and Lybrand says that we have to go down a different route, and suggested that we should drop part I and wait for that report. I should love to do so, but I believe that there are advantages and improvements in part I and it would take some time to work things out even if such a recommendation were made by Coopers and Lybrand. Everyone seems so sure that that will be the case, but I certainly do not know what Coopers and Lybrand are going to say and I do not think that anyone else knows either.

I agree about the conflict of interest between the defence of the profession and the individual, but we must make it clear, as did the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon, that there is no duty on the Law Society to defend the solicitor. It has a duty to defend the profession, and that should be done by enforcing the rules on conduct. That is how the profession is properly defended.

The hon. Gentleman's six points were extremely well thought out. Most of them require no legislation, and I shall personally ensure that they are drawn to the attention of the president of the Law Society.

I have already spoken about the rules and how they can be enforced and, indeed, tightly controlled by the Lord Chancellor. I notice that the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon and his Front Bench colleagues could not resist twisting my tail about clause 43. That is not in the Bill, and it will not go in, but I suppose it was an opportunity which was much too good to resist. We need no longer worry about that.

I thank all hon. Members who have participated in an extremely interesting debate which went completely across party lines. I look forward to the Committee and to seeing as many of those hon. Members as possible with me. In the meantime, I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second Time and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE [LORDS] [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Administration of Justice Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) any sums required by the Lord Chancellor—

(i) for making grants to the Council for Licensed Conveyancers established by the Act, or

(ii) for making payments by way of reimbursement of additional costs incurred by parties to proceedings in consequence of the incapacity or death of any judge or other person presiding or assisting at the proceedings;

(b) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable under the Legal Aid Act 1974 out of money so provided.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

Highway Code (Bicycles)

Motion made, and question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

11.46 pm

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): This debate, taking place during national bike week, provides the opportunity to call for greater awareness of the needs of cyclists, and in particular to ask that much more reference should be made to bicycles in the Highway Code when it is next revised.

The House will be pleased that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will be responding, as she has demonstrated over several years her obvious professional and personal interest in road safety generally and her concern for the welfare of cyclists in particular. Her achievements were recognised by the organisers of this year's National Bike Week when she was given an award for being "the person who has done most to bring cycling into the public eye".

It was not only as a result of the £1 million safety poster campaign last autumn, but her persistent and long-term commitment to cycling.

National Bike Week this year marks the centenary of the modern bicycle. It has been organised by six national cycling and transport organisations — the Cyclists' Touring Club, the Cycle Campaign Network, Friends of the Earth, Transport 2000, the British Cycle Federation and RoSPA. More than 400 events have been organised, including fun rides, competitions and cycle maintenance sessions nationwide to encourage people to take up cycling and to cycle in safety. I am sure that hon. Members will be aware of the activity over the years of the all-party Friends of Cycling Group to draw attention to the needs of cyclists at Westminister, especially the efforts of the hon. Member for for Easington (Mr. Dormand) and my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen).

My experience of cycling is not as extensive as my hon. Friends'. Like others, I bicycled to school in my youth, although I am told that I covered many more miles in my childhood years as a passenger on my mother's bicycle. Sadly, she has now hung up her bicycle clips, having remarkably passed her driving test at a distinguished age to the delight and, I confess, great surprise, of her family.

Hearing my mother discuss the Highway Code with a granchild who satisfied the Department of Transport's driving test examiner at at similar time provided me with a clear example of the difference between the generations in their awareness of cycling based largely on their own experiences.

A lost generation of motorists who grew up in the 1960s and early 1970s never learnt to ride a bike, and, therefore, do not fully appreciate the hazards which cyclists face in, for example, avoiding a pothole in the road or negotiating large roundabouts. There is a special need to educate that group.

The present edition of the Highway Code was published in 1978. It was prepared earlier in the 1970s when cycling was at a low ebb. That might partially explain why, in the current edition, there is not one bicycle in any of the pictures and diagrams of everyday situations. Earlier editions gave greater prominence to bicycles—the 1946 and 1959 editions show bicycles on the cover. It is only fair to add that the 1949 version has several horses and carts as well. Highlighting bicycles provides a forceful message that the Highway Code is intended for cyclists like other road users and draws the existence of cyclists to the attention of motorists as having equal rights and needs while being specially vulnerable.

There has been a dramatic increase in the use of cycles since the low point in 1974. According to Department of Transport statistics, cycle mileage for 1974 was 3·84 billion km and was almost 50 per cent. greater 10 years later at 5 billion km. Cycle sales have virtually quadrupled in 15 years to 2·05 million in 1984. That makes encouraging news for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry and for Employment. In 1983, more bicycles than cars were sold. It is estimated that there are 15 million bicycles in the country.

Growing concern about personal health, fitness and heart disease in the past 10 years have contributed to the growth in the use of cycles, as did the 1974 oil price shock which caused many people to reconsider their travel arrangements. The bicycle is now widely used as a quick and effective form of personal transport as well as for leisure. There is a clear appeal to conservationists—the bicycle has been said to be the most efficient means yet devised of converting human energy into propulsion. There has, however, been a corresponding increase in cycle casualties. Whatever might be the rights and wrongs of an incident, the cyclist is most at risk. Each year, some 300 cyclists are killed and 6,000 are seriously injured—one third of them under 15. There is good reason to believe that Government statistics based on police records significantly under record the problem.

A recent report by the Cyclists Touring Club, which has its headquarters in Godalming in my constituency, established that cycling accidents are greatly under reported. It found that only one in four accidents are reported to the police and that only one half of accidents involving hospital treatment are reported.

Much can be done in a local community to make cycling safer. In my constituency, I have been most impressed by the work of the Farnham Committee for International Youth Year, which has taken a constructive and practical approach to drawing the needs of cyclists to the attention of the public and those responsible for transport policy. Surrey county council has recently adopted a new policy containing measures to assist cyclists. The policy aims to reduce accidents involving cyclists and motor vehicles through the introduction of a variety of schemes such as the provision of cycle routes, dual cycle/pedestrian paths, recreational cycle routes and traffic management schemes.

I welcome programmes such as the national cycle proficiency scheme and RoSPA's "Cycleway" to increase education and training and to remind parents of their responsibilities. Families should be aware that giving a child a bike at Christmas, like a pet, requires their ongoing supervision and commitment. The encouragement of high standards of cycle safety and practice are crucial. Quite apart from the need for a sympathetic attitude from transport authorities and for education and training for cyclists, much more needs to be done to provide advice for motorists. A comprehensive study of the responsibility for cycle accidents was carried out by the Metropolitan police, who found that, in two out of three adult cycling accidents, the motorist was at fault. The all too frequent explanation of the motorist is, "I just did not see him." Safety for all road users is centred on the Highway Code. A number of simple proposed amendments to the Highway Code could redress the balance in favour of cyclists. I congratulate the Cyclists Touring Club on its preparatory work drawing up those proposals. The short section in the Highway Code consisting of a mere nine paragraphs entitled "Extra Rules for Cyclists" should be strengthened. Equally important, is the provision of advice to increase motorists' awareness of cyclists and guidance on how to treat cycles.

At present that is almost entirely lacking. For example, when overtaking cyclists, motorists should be advised to give them at least one metre's clearance, and more, if they are travelling at speed. Particular driving circumstances in which cyclists should be considered should be highlighted. For example, on roundabouts motorists should be especially watchful for slow-moving traffic already on the roundabout. Too frequently a motorist notices a fast moving car but fails to see a cyclist. Similarly, when joining or leaving major roads and long slip roads, or when turning out of minor roads, a bicycle is too easily overlooked.

A motorist should not overtake a cyclist and immediately turn left. The bicycle is probably going faster than he thinks. That is particularly dangerous and the cause of too many accidents. Motorists should be reminded that at night cyclists are especially vulnerable. Many motorists fail to realise that cyclists can be blinded by oncoming undipped headlights. Motorists need to be reminded to leave space for cyclists, for example, between lanes of traffic on busy one-way streets.

Following the recommendation of the Transport Select Committees and the practice in earlier editions of the Highway Code, the reintroduction of a foreword to the Highway Code is required to remind all road users of their responsibilities for the safety of others, especially the more vulnerable groups—pedestrians, children, cyclists and the elderly.

I shall quote two paragraphs, the first of which is from the 1946 edition of the Highway Code. It states:

"The provisions of the code are a simple summary of the best and widest experience. Each provision, whether it relates to a legal requirement or to discretionary behaviour, has been included because of its importance in preventing road accidents.

It is my sincere hope that all road users, whether pedestrians, drivers or riders, will study the Code and respect its provisions. To do so is, in fact, a moral duty. If observance of the provisions of the Code and the spirit of tolerance and consideration underlying them, became a habit, road accidents would rapidly decrease. They are a social evil which can only be overcome by the co-operation of everyone."

The 1959 edition states

"Accidents on our roads do not just happen; they are caused —sometimes by a faulty vehicle, sometimes by road conditions, but nearly always by simple human error. These mistakes, which take lives, are made because in most cases we simply do not realize what we are doing until it is too late.

In other words, our conduct on the roads is not what it needs to be for present-day traffic. This H Code is for the ordinary road user: it sets out in the simplest language the code of behaviour which is a 'must' if we are ever to make an impression on the totals of road accidents. If we could ensure that for the coming year every road user obeyed the Code, we should save a great many lives—perhaps our own."

The Highway Code is a set of provisions containing advice on how to travel safely on the roads, and how to allow others to do the same. Everyone has a duty to care for all other road users as well as himself.

There is an urgent need to revise the code, to remind road users of their responsibility for the safety of others, to reassert the need for mutual respect and tolerance on the road and, above all, to redress the balance giving greater emphasis to cyclists and their needs.

11.58 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) on her choice of this important and topical subject. It is important because cycling is a growth area, and topical because this is national bike week. I was pleased to receive the handsome chain wheel, to which my hon. Friend referred, and was sorry not to be able to go to receive it in person. I hope that we shall all continue to do what we can to ensure that safe cycling is well promoted.

The debate gives me the opportunity to consider the cycle content of the Highway Code. I must tell my hon. Friend that the Highway Code is but a part of the wide range of measures and advice that can be given. First, let me set out some of the background to our approach to cycling and cycle provision. Cycling has always been popular with the young. In recent years, it has become more popular with adults. I am told that bike sales now outnumber car sales. The reasons are clear. Cycling is a cheap, personal and healthy way to travel. For many local journeys, it can be the quickest. On those grounds alone, I am glad to see the increase in cycling popularity.

However, there is a price. As cycling becomes more popular, so the accident toll increases. It is a major road safety problem. My hon. Friend drew attention to the depressing casualty figures. The numbers of those killed have remained at similar levels for some years, but injuries are increasing. As my hon. Friend said, injury figures are under-reported. That is why the Transport and Road Research Laboratory is carrying out a hospital-based study of cycle accidents for the Department. My hon. Friend quoted from the 1946 Highway Code. I noted with concern that in that year more than 800 cyclists were killed. We must never reach that level again.

There is no magic way to reduce cycling casualties. We are all involved in it. The Government's role is clear. We should set the framework for safer cycling, and provide information, help and advice to local authorities in developing their policies for cyclists. My starting point is the cycling policy statement in 1982. Since then, we have made good progress, including legislation for cycle tracks, regulations on cycle standards and new signs for cyclists. My Department considers the provision of cycle facilities on trunk roads each time it considers a trunk road scheme. There are cycling officers in all the regional offices, and we encourage local authorities to provide cycle facilities on their roads. There is a programme of innovative local schemes.

My hon. Friend paid tribute to last year's successful national publicity campaign. I also want to see cycleway encouraged further; that is why I am considering it with my right hon Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. The more young people who are properly trained as cyclists, the safer they will be as adult cyclists.

We know that there is still much more to be done. I was delighted to host the recent conference on "Ways to Safer Cycling". There we reviewed progress and considered possibilities for the future. I hope that the report on the conference will stimulate further discussion. What I said then still applies. We need more initiatives. My

[Mrs. Lynda Chalker]

Department has given the lead, but, as cycling is a local activity, so the local authorities will wish to develop new initiatives.

But we need ingenuity, too. Many of the 21 innovatory cycling schemes now being introduced show great ingenuity, and tackle the problems to which my hon. Friend referred, including provisions to cross busy roads, negotiate junctions and cope with roundabouts, and the shared use of cycle paths. They all tackle local problems with local solutions. I shall always remain ready to consider proposals for new schemes and new ideas that will improve cycling safety.

Beyond those more straightforward measures are the five cycle demonstration projects, which offer comprehensive provision of routes for cycling in urban areas. I am pleased to say that the first scheme will be officially opened tomorrow by the mayor of Stockton-on-Tees. Others will follow in Canterbury, Nottingham, Bedford and Exeter.

Although we are doing much more now than we used to, and much of what I have said offers better and safer means of travel for cyclists, we must see what more can be done. But at the end of the day, what is better and safer depends on better and safer behaviour by all road users. We cannot say, as some cyclists do, that motorists must take all the blame for cycle accidents; and we certainly cannot say, as some motorists do, "If only there were no cyclists." We must live together on our congested streets, and there must be more give and take, perhaps not only between cyclists and motorists but among all road users, whatever their vehicles, or even if they are on foot. That will not be achieved by Government alone. It depends on each of us as an individual road user.

We need to do more than update the Highway Code. I know that my hon. Friend fully recognises this. Tonight she put a case for an up-to-date Highway Code with clarity. I am aware of the revisions proposed by the Cyclists Touring Club.

I shall say a few words about the Highway Code. In recent years, it has been revised about every 10 years. On past performance, we would be due to make a revision around the end of the decade.

The code is addressed to all road users. My hon. Friend makes a plea for more references to motorists' responsibilities to cyclists. She is right to say that in past editions of the code, there have always been such references. Indeed, in the current edition there are more than in earlier editions, although I accept that cyclists did not get a picture to themselves.

There is also more detailed advice in the Department's manual "Driving", and a picture, and in the advice to motorists planning their driving test.
